DNCD president Rafael Ramirez made the announcement this morning. “The arrest of those individuals was possible because of follow-up given for more than one year, jointly with the DEA (the U.S. Drugs Enforcement Administration) on these for being linked to the network that introduced thousands of kilos of cocaine to the United States,” through Puerto Rico, he said

He said that for 6 months simultaneous operations were conducted in the U.S. Virgin Islands, Puerto Rico, Saint Martin and Dominican Republic, as well as in British possessions in the Caribbean, with the arrests of more than 50 narcotics traffickers, which used speedboats to take drug shipments to the neighboring island, from were they were sent to different points of the American territory.

From the members of the international ring were seized 1,900 kilos of cocaine, US$3 million, 6 boats and 131 large bank accounts with high sums in dollars were frozen, in just one operation. They will face charges of conspiracy, drugs distribution and import, in addition to money laundering.

The Dominican detainees, who in the next hours will be given in extradition, were part of that band which directed and controlled the transport of cocaine to the U.S., coming from Colombia, task in which also used light boats, according to the investigation that culminated in the arrest of the fugitives. They face several charges in a San Juan Federal Court.

DNCD spokesman Roberto Lebrón said that from the exchange of information "we are convinced that those three individuals are the ringleaders in the country of that network of narcotics traffickers," which are being held in the DNCD compound. The arrests took place simultaneously in La Romana, Santiago and Puerto Plata, cities where the Agency’s special units went to capture them.

Lopez, detained in Santiago, had in his possession 8 cellphones, a pistol, two luxury SUVs, and several deeds of properties worth millions, whereas Jiménez was arrested in his vehicle in La Romana, and was carrying a pistol. In his house there were two nautical charts and several rental contracts of buildings located in the Bayahibe resort area.

For his part, Santana de Leon, arrested in front of a restaurant in Puerto Plata's Malecon, had a pistol, among other personal documents.

"These three people will be extradited to the U.S.A. so that they face charges of drug shipments occupied in that country," Lebron said.

A federal Prosecutor in Puerto Rico, Rosa Emilia Rodriguez, and the Police confirmed that the ring was directed in Colombia by Gregorio González (El Flaco), who is under arrest in Bogota and would be extradited to the U.S.A.

Another ringleader is also the Colombian Luis Peña Peña.

Of the arrests 18 were conducted in San Juan, Puerto Rico, where the network had its operations center and 3 in Santo Domingo.

Up In Smoke (TRACYP)

By Written By Phil Hayworth

Tracy Press, October 10, 2006

Tracy joins the rank of NorCal towns with major marijuana busts, as four men are arrested for turning local houses into high-end pot farms.

Gutierrez/Tracy Press - CAUGHT:Three people were arrested at this house on Deer Run Lane this week for allegedly growing marijuana inside the house. Two other houses were also targeted by law enforcement for illegal drug activity.

Tracy police busted three sophisticated indoor marijuana growing operations this week, complete with grow lights, automatic watering systems, climate controls and ventilation systems.

The homes were nestled among some of Tracy's priciest and newest homes — and just yards from playgrounds packed with children.

"And at this point, we suspect there are more in Tracy," said Sgt. Mark Duxbury of the Tracy Police Department's Street Crimes Unit.

Investigators think the pot houses could be linked to a regional, organized pot-growing syndicate stretching from Sacramento to Tracy.

At dusk Tuesday and Wednesday, detectives from the Tracy Police Department's Street Crimes Unit swooped in on three homes in the neighborhoods of Glenbriar Circle, Whispering Wind Drive and Deer Run Lane, netting 666 marijuana plants and thousands of dollars in loose cash.

Four men were arrested and booked into the San Joaquin County Jail in French Camp for conspiracy, cultivation of marijuana and possession of marijuana for sale.

"Just based on the plants' sizes, they were growing for at least two months," Duxbury said. "The quality of the plant was very impressive, actually — well-groomed, well-maintained, to the point where they had maximum buds."

He said many of the plants were only weeks from harvest.

County officials generally estimate that a single pot plant can be worth up to $6,000 in harvested marijuana. That puts the haul from the Tracy busts at just under $4 million.

Sold on the street, potent pot can bring anywhere from $650 to $900 an ounce, Duxbury said.

Tracy police are investigating whether the Tracy operations are connected to 41 other home-based pot operations busted from late June through late September in Sacramento, Elk Grove and Stockton.

"It was so obvious," said a Deer Run neighbor. "The windows were all blacked out and they had water hoses coming out their front doors out onto the lawn."

The neighbor, who wished to remain anonymous, said that Tracy police knew about the pot operation and figured police were biding their time until they could make physical arrests, not just seizing plants.

The first house hit by police Tuesday evening was a new house in the 1600 block of Whispering Wind, where 260 plants were recovered and a 2006 Chevrolet panel van was seized.

The second search warrant, executed on the 400 block of Glenbriar Circle, turned up 249 plants and about $1,000 in cash. A 2004 Audi was also seized. Wathanack Suon, 23, of Tracy, was arrested there and booked into county jail for the cultivation of marijuana, possession of marijuana for sale, and theft of utilities.

The third search warrant was executed on the 1500 block of Deer Run Lane where 157 plants were recovered and a Honda Civic was seized. Tung Nguyen, 30, of San Jose, was arrested inside of the residence; Christopher Truong, 18, of Sunnyvale and Hiep Tran, 19, of San Jose, were arrested after they fled the residence on foot and were located while hiding in nearby yards.

Nguyen, Truong and Tran were booked into San Joaquin County Jail for conspiracy, cultivation of marijuana and possession of marijuana for sale. Nguyen was also charged with violation of parole.

Tracy detectives are working with investigators from neighboring jurisdictions and agents from the Drug Enforcement Agency. A DEA agent from Sacramento told local media last month that recent growing operations were the most organized crime syndicate ever investigated in this area.

The past two months, eight people have been arrested and more than a thousand pounds of marijuana have been seized from the houses in Stockton, Elk Grove and the Natomas area of Sacramento.

Meth arrest

In a separate incident, Street Crimes detectives arrested 45-year-old Alfred Santana on Sept. 29 for possession of a half-pound of methamphetamine at his home in the 300 block of Yosemite. Street value of the drug was about $10,000, Duxbury said.

Detectives also seized $2,655 in cash and Santana's methamphetamine price sheet. Santana was booked into county jail for possession of a controlled substance for sale and for committing a felony while out of custody on a pending felony matter. He is being held on $1 million bail.

It was the third time in a year that Street Crimes detectives arrested Santana while possessing more than a half-pound of methamphetamine during each incident.

Medical Pot Has Cities In A Bind (RPE)

By Paige Austin, The Press-Enterprise

Riverside (CA) Press-Enterprise, October 10, 2006

As Norco Mayor Pro Tem Harvey Sullivan voted for a 45-day moratorium on medical-marijuana dispensaries this month, it was with mixed emotions.

Sullivan is battling prostate cancer. More than ever, he understands the pain that drives patients to cannabis for relief. At the same time, he leads a city battling to deal with the drug and alcohol abuse that has led to an increase in traffic fatalities -- particularly among youths. Conflicting state and federal laws on the legality of medical-marijuana use further complicate the matter for city leaders.

"I'm not sure what to think," he said. "I could go either way."

His dilemma is not unique. It's playing out throughout the region and the state.

Last week, Riverside County supervisors imposed a ban on marijuana dispensaries in unincorporated areas and joined other counties such as San Bernardino, Merced and San Diego in a court challenge of state medical-marijuana laws. California voters approved marijuana use for medical purposes in 1996, but it is still illegal at the federal level. The federal government has not determined that marijuana serves a medical purpose and views it as a "gateway drug," enticing users to harder drugs.

District Attorney Grover Trask has said he won't prosecute patients who use marijuana in accordance with state laws. A handful of Inland cities, including Palm Desert and Palm Springs, are considering ordinances to restrict or regulate cannabis distribution. Other cities such as Corona have already enacted moratoriums and have gone so far as to seek a restraining order against a dispensary within the city.

"The state has mandated cities and counties to find a way for it to be distributed without having illegal drug houses," Sullivan said. "The people voted on it. Now we need to find the right way for it to be dispensed under a doctor's supervision. I'd rather see it sold somewhere like Sav-on than some tattoo parlor on the corner."

No one has currently sought a business license for a dispensary or cannabis co-op in Norco, but city officials hope to establish guidelines before one tries to come in.

Cities were looking to the county to establish regulations they could also adopt, but now that the county is challenging the state, the cities are left on their own to figure it out, said Ryan Michaels, of Inland Empire Patient Advocates. The group has worked with several Inland cities on ordinances that regulate while protecting patient rights.

Michaels is also the director of Healing Nations Collective, a Corona medical-marijuana dispensary fighting the city in court to stay open.

A lot of cities don't even know it's legal for patients with a medical-marijuana prescription to grow their own cannabis, he said. Michaels wants cities to encourage open communication between law enforcement and dispensaries. He advocates requiring business licenses for co-ops with seven or more members.

However, city leaders fear that such places attract crime, are difficult to regulate and are vulnerable to abuse.

Last week local authorities working with the federal Drug Enforcement Administration raided a medical-marijuana dispensary and seized drugs and cash as part of an investigation into illegal distribution linked to Palm Springs Caregivers.

Norco resident Pat Overstreet said she has trouble accepting the idea of medicinal-marijuana distribution because of the potential for abuse.

"As a (registered nurse), I know there are some situations where marijuana will help people with acute pain and nausea," she said. "But the potential for abuse is truly what's so scary about this."

$58,000 A Quarter For Electricity? (TIMESO)

By LA Notebook By Chris Ayres

Times Online, October 10, 2006

Stone me, now I remember why . . .

THE SMELL was musty and sour, enough to make your eyes water. “I think there might be a skunk in here,” I said, trying not to breathe.

“Not quite,” coughed the owner of the office building in which I was considering renting a cubicle. “We have the other kind of skunk here: marijuana. The medical stuff.” There was a long, pungent silence. Before I could ask for urgent clarification, my future landlord cut me off: “There’s a licensed dispensary on the floor below. Don’t worry: it’s completely legal. You might enjoy the odour after a while.” I took the cubicle.

And so, for a few relaxed, hungry, and generally unproductive months, my workspace was directly above one of LA’s hundred or so medical marijuana dispensaries, also known as clinics or “clubs”.

It has been exactly ten years since California made it legal for individuals to grow and use marijuana for medicinal purposes, thus creating the dubious legal no man’s land in which the dispensaries are tolerated. Owners of these outlets argue that growing pot plants (not to be confused with potted plants) is a difficult business, and that their 150,000 or so customers, many of them with terminal cancer, have little energy for horticulture.

Nevertheless, they’ve demonstrated considerable savvy in their marketing of the weed, such as marijuana-laced snacks and drinks with strangely familiar brand names: Pot Tarts, Munchy Way, Toka-Cola, Stoney Rancher. Not everyone believes they are in it entirely to help the infirm.

The problem, of course, is that while California might be all funky and liberal on this issue (Governor Arnold Schwarzenegger used to smoke marijuana openly before going to the gym) the Feds are not. This has created a tricky state-federal stand-off in which the Drug Enforcement Administration has raided five dispensaries in the past fortnight, bringing the total number of busts this year to more than thirty. In an uncanny parallel with the popular TV sitcom Weeds (the protagonist is a dazed suburban mum who sells pot to maintain her Land Rover lifestyle), one of these raids took place at a house in the posh San Francisco suburb of Elk Grove.

Outside, the house looked like any other suburban box. Inside, it had been gutted to make way for an indoor pot farm: the skunk odour was vented and filtered in the attic, while electricity for the grow-lights was tapped illegally from the grid. The latter strategy was necessary because the Feds are often made suspicious by humungous electricity bills (another growhouse was raided last week after a quarterly meter reading showed that $58,000 was due).

It's tempting to see all this as a typical case of the Bush Administration versus the Left Coast. But predictions of a culture war are probably overdone. California's pot clubs have resulted in virtually zero extra demand overall for the drug. According to the Government's 2005 national survey on drug use and health, about 8 per cent of Americans aged 12 or older use illegal drugs, a figure that has remained unchanged over recent years. Meanwhile, the use of marijuana among kids between 12 and 17 is actually falling. Sociologists need only watch Weeds to see why: pot smokers are middle-aged; sometimes beyond middle-aged. Stoners are the new real ale bores. Marijuana is so inoffensive, you can find copies of High Times magazine in your dentist's waiting room.

Here's my theory: even conservatives now accept the theory that brain chemistry can be altered by just about anything, from a three-mile run to a slice of chocolate cake. And as the wealth, leisure time and age of the US population grows, so too does the desire to tinker with that chemistry, especially if it can make life more pleasant.

Aldous Huxley predicted all this in Brave New World, in which it was "soma" that kept everyone feeling hunky-dory. So why the raids by the Feds, or the lawsuits by certain counties to overturn California's liberal policy? The former is a case of going after the most obnoxious profiteers (one dispensary was making $2 million a year). The latter is usually a simple case of Not In My Back Yard.

Which brings me back to that cubicle I rented. I've never found much appeal in marijuana, so the novelty of the stink wore off quickly. I didn't stay long. Does that make me a Nimby? I like to think not. The People of California can get as baked as they want in my back yard.

But please, not under my desk.

Med Marijuana Moratorium Will Stay In Palm Springs, Dispensary Open (PSDS)

The Desert Sun, October 10, 2006

Springs Caregivers, the medical marijuana dispensary located next to Toucan's in North Palm Springs, is back open today after being closed by a Drug Enforcement Administration raid earlier this week.

About 30 medical marijuana activists and patients attended a Medical Marijuana Task Force meeting this evening at city hall to voice their support for continued access to the drug legalized for medical use in California in 1996 by Proposition 215.

Palm Springs Caregivers reopened today about 11 a.m. DEA agents had served a search warrant on the dispensary after someone they say is connected to the dispensary left a "tip" of a marijuana edible for a worker at the Spa Resort Casino in downtown Palm Springs.

The Palm Springs Medical Marijuana Task Force is meeting to consider the city's approach to an ordinance regarding the drug. Currently, a moratorium in effect until March prohibits any new dispensaries from opening but "grandfathers in" the two existing Palm Springs sites, one on North Palm Canyon and one, Collective Apothocary of Palm Springs (CAPS) closer to the heart of downtown at 333 Palm Canyon Drive.

Inside The Beltway (WT)

By John McCaslin

The Washington Times, October 10, 2006

A battle for the title of the finest neighborhood is brewing -- historic Georgetown versus suburban McLean -- although it's starting to smell of politics.

We turn to the current issue of the Georgetowner, a local newspaper that didn't take kindly to the New Republic's recent magazine headline: "So long, Georgetown. McLean is the new home of America's ruling class."

Wouldn't you know The Washington Post next ran with the story "and all but declared it official," the Georgetowner notes in an editorial.

Not to be outdone, the editors of the local paper are offering their own partisan perspective on the two diverse communities, stating in part: "When you enter McLean, Va., ... one of the first things you see is a huge green sign declaring, 'George Bush Center for Intelligence.' This is your clue to turn around and go no further. ...

"When you grocery shop at the McLean Safeway, you run into Newt Gingrich, Ken Starr and Bill Kristol. When you shop at the Georgetown Safeway, you run into the likes of George Stephanopoulos, Elizabeth Taylor, Kitty Kelley, and Madeleine Albright. Now, I ask you, whom would you rather say hello to?"

The editors go on to recall that John F. Kennedy once lived in Georgetown, while "Dick Cheney and his wife lived in McLean when he was a top official at Halliburton. Colin Powell, secretary of state under George W. Bush, lives in McLean. Madeleine Albright, secretary of state under Bill Clinton, lives in Georgetown."

Finally, nobody should be surprised to read that Georgetown has a population of 14,000, 12,000 of whom are Democrats.

US Worries Opium From Afghanistan Will Enter US Market (VOA)

By Stephanie Ho

Voice of America, October 10, 2006

A top U.S. counter-narcotics official says U.S. drug agencies are working with other international drug enforcement agencies to try to prevent heroin from Afghanistan from reaching drug users in the United States.

Afghan boys tend a poppy field while their father supervises on the outskirts of LashkargahThe figures speak for themselves. In the past few years, as opium poppy eradication efforts in other countries have met with a measure of success, post-Taleban Afghanistan has emerged as the world's leading, and nearly only, supplier of heroin.

The U.N. Office on Drugs and Crime published a survey in September on opium poppy cultivation in Afghanistan, which it said has risen 59 percent since 2005. The report called the 6,100 tons of opium harvested in Afghanistan this year "unprecedented," and said revenue from the harvest will exceed $3 billion.

Opium is used to make the drug heroin. The White House drug control policy director, John Walters, said opium poppy eradication efforts have been fruitful in Mexico and South America, the main sources for heroin in the United States. But he added that U.S. agencies, such as the Drug Enforcement Administration, are worried that those suppliers could replaced by Afghanistan.

"It is a danger," said John Walters. "It is a danger we have not seen in large amount recently. In the past, Southwest Asia has been a source of heroin in the United States. And, there are world markets. So, we are trying to work carefully, DEA [Drug Enforcement Administration] and other international enforcement agencies, in watching this."

He spoke in an interview shown Sunday on C-SPAN, a private, non-profit network that broadcasts Congressional proceedings and other Washington political events on cable television.

Walters said the United States has a two-pronged approach in dealing with heroin from Afghanistan.

"What we are trying to do is both be vigilant to cut off efforts to move it here, but, over time, if we are not successful in reducing supply, you would expect there would be some increased flow here - and there can be some flow here - but we are going to both try to cut off that flow and, of course, first and foremost, cut off that production source," he said.

Shortly after the U.N. report was released, the State Department's Thomas Schweich told reporters in Brussels that U.S. officials believe aggressive eradication of opium poppies in Afghanistan is crucial. He added that "it is very difficult to interdict heroin and opium paste," which he described as "hidden cargo" that moves through "porous borders" and through "rough, desolate terrain."

U.S. officials say the Taleban is encouraging opium growing in the southern Helmand Province, where American and NATO troops are battling a persistent insurgency.

The assistant secretary of state for narcotics and law enforcement, Anne Patterson, told Congress last month that the Taleban is also protecting drug routes and traffickers. She said, whether the Taleban is getting revenue from the drug trade, or just encouraging an anti-government statement is not clear.

Meanwhile, the White House's John Walters says the good news is that, as global eradication and interdiction efforts have been successful, the purity of heroin available worldwide has gone down. At the same time, another factor he pointed to as a positive sign is that prices for opium actually have gone up, suggesting diminished supply. E-mail This Article

Court Tests Await Cities' Laws On Immigrants (USAT)

By Laura Parker, Usa Today

USA Today, October 9, 2006

Cities and towns that have passed local laws aimed at driving out illegal immigrants are gearing up for court fights over whether they will be allowed to enforce them.

The key battles are being waged in Hazelton, Pa., Riverside, N.J. and Valley Park, Mo. Civil rights and business groups sued after each of those cities made it illegal to employ or rent housing to illegal immigrants. The lawsuits say the ordinances are discriminatory.

The court action has put the small communities at the forefront of a national debate over what to do about the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants in the USA at a time when Congress is considering a range of border security initiatives. If Hazelton, Riverside and Valley Park prevail in court, dozens of communities from Massachusetts to California are poised to follow their lead with similar ordinances.

More than 30 city councils have passed or are considering local measures aimed at curbing illegal immigrants' access to housing, voting and jobs. At the state level, lawmakers in 33 states have passed 78 bills, most of them imposing restrictions similar to the city measures, the National Conference of State Legislatures says.

The laws challenge a principle established by the U.S. Supreme Court, which has long held that immigration policies fall under the authority of the federal government, not that of cities, counties or states. Local and state officials have pushed these measures because, they say, illegal immigrants are straining the budgets of local schools, hospitals and police.

"I am prepared to fight this to the highest court in the country if we have to," says Hazelton Mayor Lou Barletta.

He says he gets calls every day from officials in other cities who want a copy of Hazleton's new law. "It's a good ordinance that other cities can model themselves after. The message is: Illegal aliens are not welcome here."

Barletta says he proposed Hazelton's new ordinance after a series of crimes allegedly involving illegal immigrants. "Our police department is stretched beyond its limits. I've had enough."

The ordinance penalizes business owners and landlords — not the immigrants they employ or rent to — by revoking their licenses to do business.

To defend Hazleton's law, Barletta put together a legal team that includes a Philadelphia law firm and lawyers from conservative groups such as the Mountain States Legal Foundation and the Federation for American Immigration Reform.

Michael Hethmon, a lawyer for the Immigration Reform Institute in Washington, D.C., helped Hazelton rewrite the ordinance that was passed in July to give it a better chance of surviving in court. Valley Park has since adopted the Hazelton model, and Riverside is considering whether to do so.

Hethmon says he thinks the revised ordinance will pass muster in court because it "respects the powers and authorities" of local and federal governments.

The original law was vague about how a resident's immigration status would be determined. Under the revised law, the city would determine immigration status by submitting information to the federal government for verification. The revised ordinance also gives landlords and business owners three to five days to correct violations before fines and other penalties are imposed.

Some legal experts say the cities face an uphill fight.

"The line of cases stretches back 150 years in a range of situations that are analogous to what is happening now," says Michael Wishnie, a Yale Law School professor who specializes in immigration law. The Supreme Court "has made it very clear that the regulation of immigration is exclusively a federal function."

N. Korea: Nuclear Test Was Success (USAT)

From Staff And Wire Reports

USA Today, October 9, 2006

Nearby nations denounce action

North Korea said today that it had successfully conducted its first nuclear weapons test, an underground explosion that, while unconfirmed, sent neighboring countries scrambling into emergency meetings.

DOJ_NMG_0076777

U.S. and South Korean intelligence detected a seismic event at a suspected nuclear test site in North Korea, White House spokesman Tony Snow said just before 2 a.m. ET today.

Snow declined to speculate on a possible U.S. response to a North Korean nuclear test.

"At this point we are not confirming a nuclear test. At this point we're still assessing the data and trying to figure out what happened," Snow said.

"We expect the U.N. Security Council to take immediate actions to respond to this unprovoked act," Snow said. "The United States is closely monitoring the situation and reaffirms its commitment to protect and defend our allies in the region."

The U.S. Geological Survey detected a magnitude-4.2 tremor late Sunday in the country's northeast region, about 240 miles from Pyongyang, the capital, according to the USGS website.

South Korea's Defense Ministry raised the alert level for its military upon hearing the news. South Korean stocks plunged following the announcement.

North Korea's official state-run Korean Central News Agency called the test "a stirring time when all the people of the country are making a great leap forward in the building of a great, prosperous, powerful socialist nation."

"It marks a historic event as it greatly encouraged and pleased the … people that have wished to have powerful, self-reliant defense capability," it said.

The report of the test came as Japan's new prime minister, Shinzo Abe, was in China to discuss security issues. Japan said today that it would push for a tough resolution at the U.N. Security Council to force North Korea to end its nuclear program.

"If it is proven, it will be a grave threat to stability in northeast Asia, and we will file a strong protest," Chief Cabinet Secretary Yasuhisa Shiozaki said.

China said today that it firmly opposed North Korea's test, denounced it as "brazen" and demanded that the government in Pyongyang stop any action that would worsen the situation.

North Korea "has ignored the widespread opposition of the international community," China's Foreign Ministry said on its website.

Several countries have been holding talks to get the North to end its nuclear ambitions. The United States, South Korea, Japan, Russia and China had been urging North Korea to return to the six-nation talks it abandoned a year ago. The Security Council last week urged North Korea not to carry out a test.

The country pulled out of the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty in 2003 after U.S. officials accused it of a secret nuclear program, violating an earlier nuclear pact between Washington and Pyongyang.

Looking Over The Wall (NYT)

The New York Times, October 9, 2006

Congress has adjourned to plead for its re-election, having bequeathed to the nation a giant fence-building project as its official strategy for fixing the immigration problem. No doubt some voters will be reassured by the idea that covering 700 miles of the 2,000-mile southwestern border with razor wire and floodlights will solve this thing once and for all. But many others will continue to suspect that it is more complicated than that.

With a better start, this election year could have featured a rational debate about immigration policy that went beyond xenophobia and the fear of disorder caused by the presence of immigrant day laborers on suburban street corners. Americans — particularly those struggling to find decent jobs themselves — have a reasonable concern about what effect the presence of so many unplanned-for workers has had on the economy. They deserved to hear that talked about in a realistic way.

Last month the Center for Immigration Studies, a group that wants to reduce immigration, released a study that found that a sharp immigration increase in the last five years corresponded with a steep decline in the employment of young native-born Americans, particularly black men without high school diplomas. Last week in The Times, Rachel Swarns reported on the ways the booming population of Latinos in the Deep South — particularly Georgia — had left many black Americans resentful of the immigrants' comparative success.

But there is compelling evidence that instead of harming the economy, unskilled immigrants prop it up, filling jobs that better-educated Americans do not want and giving everyone access to cheaper goods and services. The case made by the Center for Immigration Studies is rebutted by other studies that have found that there is no nationwide pattern of job displacement by illegal immigrants, and that immigration has broadly been a net plus to the nation. In Georgia, immigrant labor has kept textile mills, farms and service industries humming.

Right now across America, fruit is rotting on the ground because the crackdown along the border has created a shortage of immigrant workers needed for the harvest. Nevertheless, it is impossible to ignore stories of poor American workers who believe that their livelihoods were undermined by immigrants willing to work for below-subsistence wages, and of honest employers who could not compete with unscrupulous competitors using undocumented workers.

These serious problems will not be solved at the border with Mexico. Setting things right means adopting policies that fence-obsessed members of Congress have not exactly championed, like raising the minimum wage, improving public education, having a progressive income tax and making sure that workers' rights are protected.

These are only a few reasonable solutions. A host of others is offered in a new report by the Migration Policy Institute, in which Lee Hamilton, the former congressman, and Spencer Abraham, the former senator and energy secretary, argue that immigration needs to be seen as an integral element of a national economic policy. It is a resource to be embraced and managed, with a lawful, orderly flow of workers governed by flexible quotas set by a national commission advising Congress.

It's a comprehensive approach and then some. It offers a new way of framing a stalled debate. The wall builders have made their point, and it's a lousy one. Now it is time for those who want serious immigration reform to look beyond them.

Study: South Texas Leads In Taking Violators To Trial, But Hasn't Always (MON)

Monitor, October 10, 2006

McALLEN — Federal prosecutors in South Texas are taking immigration violators to court more often than prosecutors in any other part of the country, according to a recent study.

The next closest numbers come from California's Southern District, which covers San Diego, the busiest port of entry in the United States. That district had 112 immigration prosecutions in June, compared with 155 for the Southern District of Texas.

The majority of the local cases come from Department of Homeland Security agencies, such as the U.S. Border Patrol and U.S. Customs and Border Protection, for people apprehended on charges like illegally re-entering the country, impersonating a U.S. citizen and human smuggling.

In fact, Texas' Southern District, based in Houston, has led the country in the number of immigration prosecutions for five years, according to the study from the Transactional Records Clearing House.

TRAC, a research center that focuses on how government operates, specifically agencies like the FBI, Drug Enforcement Administration and the Department of Homeland Security, regularly looks at immigration data it requests from the government and analyzes it for patterns.

The latest numbers available are for June 2006.

The number of immigration cases taken to court could be even higher by next year.

President Bush recently approved $2 million to hire up to 25 new federal prosecutors who would exclusively deal with immigration violations in border districts.

The Southern District has about 150 assistant U.S. attorneys who at any given moment manage as many as 100 cases.

When and how many will be added to Texas' Southern District is unclear, according to its spokesman, John Yembrick.

He referred all calls about immigration statistics to the Department of Justice.

But a high number of immigration convictions has not always been the case in South Texas.

According to TRAC, fiscal year 2004 proved to be a turning point for the district. The number of convictions in the district that were tied to immigration violations went from 304 in fiscal year 2003 to 13,778 in fiscal year 2004.

The majority of immigration cases originated with the DHS. As other federal agencies contribute fewer cases that lead to prosecution and conviction, DHS is contributing a growing number of cases, according to TRAC.

DHS referred 18,092 cases to federal prosecutors in South Texas — four times as many as Texas' Western District, which had the next largest number.

Mexico May Take Fence Dispute To U.N. (AP-Y)

DOJ_NMG_0076779

By Jenny Barchfield, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 10, 2006

Mexico's foreign secretary said Monday the country may take a dispute over U.S. plans to build a fence on the Mexican border to the United Nations.

Luis Ernesto Derbez told reporters in Paris, his first stop on a European tour, that a legal investigation was under way to determine whether Mexico has a case.

The Mexican government last week sent a diplomatic note to Washington criticizing the plan for 700 miles of new fencing along the border. President-elect Felipe Calderon also denounced the plan, but said it was a bilateral issue that should not be put before the international community.

Derbez said Monday after meeting with French Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazy that it was a "shame" U.S. immigration policy had been used for what he claimed was a short-term political gain in the lead-up to midterm elections in the U.S. in November.

He said he discussed the issue with Douste-Blazy, and planned to bring it up in meetings with his Spanish and Italian counterparts during visits to Madrid and Rome. He vowed to work on the case until the "very last day" of President Vicente Fox's term, which ends Dec. 1.

The U.S. Senate approved the border fence bill last month and President Bush has said he will sign it into law — despite last-minute pleas from the Mexican government for a veto.

"What should be constructed is a bridge in relations between the two countries," Derbez said.

A Public Frustrated With Judges Who Use Their Benches As Thrones (WSJ)

WSJ, October 10, 2006

If "the breadth and intensity of rage currently being leveled at the judiciary" is "unmatched in American history," there is more than likely a reason, and that reason is more than likely expressed by Sandra Day O'Connor's praise for judicial minimalism in "The Threat to Judicial Independence" (editorial page, Sept. 27). Surely the judiciary's mission is broader than "checking the other two branches and protecting minority rights"; but from the perspective of heartland America, the courts have long abandoned that broader mission to engage in partisan advocacy against the majority's interests. It is simply disingenuous to argue that anger against judges is being stirred up by fanatics and opportunists while dismissing the judiciary's persistent undermining of fundamental constitutional protections, such as the right to life in Roe or private property rights in Kelo, as mere "erroneous decisions."

Justice O'Connor's argument ultimately rests on the false assumption that only the executive branch, legislature or public might pose a threat to "the complete independence of the courts." A more reasonable reading of Hamilton is that the responsibility for maintaining the distinction between the judiciary and the two other branches rests at least equally upon the judiciary. That has certainly been the opinion of the Supreme Court itself at least since Jefferson requested its advice on foreign policy and the court demurred, explaining to President Washington that there is a constitutional prohibition against such advisory opinions because they usurp legislative and executive powers.

Such reticence is hardly to be found in the commerce clause, religion clause, abortion rights or eminent domain doctrine of liberals on the current Supreme Court, or that of their most dependable ally, Sandra Day O'Connor. The result has too often been opinions like Kelo in which the rights of minorities or special interests are held to be pre-emptive and the usurpation of legislative and executive powers by the judiciary the means to a socially desirable end. Perhaps the public's anger toward the bench is simply a reasonable response to decades of unprincipled jurisprudence.

Edward H. Stewart Jr.

Austin, Texas

Justice O'Connor sets up a straw-man argument when she decries the intimidation of judges and quotes federal appeals-court judge David B. Sentelle as saying that "'Judges must be free to make judicial decisions without the fear of physical harm to themselves or to members of their families.'" Of course. Only those beyond the pale of reason would disagree.

But there is a deeper issue embedded in her recognition that there is an all-too-pervasive lack of trust in judges -- both state and federal. All too many judges have lost sight of their responsibility of interpreting law, not making it. And, all too often, the appointing powers -- presidents, governors, and, in many states, the electorate -- select judges precisely because they expect those judges will "make law" favorable to appointing powers' political agendas.

True, it is frequently a fine line between improperly making law and interpreting it, especially when legislative dictates are purposely vague (so legislators can be all things to all people), or when judges fulfill their rightful responsibility of developing the common law, which, as the name denotes, grew out of what the community believed were proper rules for society.

While I join Justice O'Connor's decrying of threats to judges, I also recognize that many of those threats are largely -- and irrationally -- born of a frustration with judges who use their benches as thrones from which to impose their own social, religious or economic views.

I am a retired U.S. Bankruptcy Court judge. What has set this country apart from many other less free countries in the world, and has given us an unparalleled measure of prosperity, is the fact that we have a judicial system that has protected personal and property rights and enforced contractual obligations. I heard a former Nobel laureate in economics state that he declined to further consult in Russia because of that country's lack of a judicial system to enforce property and contract rights, calling Russia a "kleptocracy." In the U.S., groups such as the one discussed by Justice O'Connor in her commentary -- JAIL 4 Judges -- and members of Congress who seek to upset the delicate balance forged by our founding fathers attack the very thing which has set us apart from less successful societies. This proposed "cure" is much more dangerous than the imagined "malady".

Judge William T. Bodoh

Justice O'Connor sounds a trenchant alarm about modern threats to judicial independence, a bulwark of American democracy. She accurately admonishes that when judicial independence is compromised so is our system of government. One major threat in the federal system comes from the coordinate legislative and executive branches, a phenomenon witnessed by frayed relations between the courts and Congress. On Sept. 19, the judiciary took important steps to improve those relations. The Judicial Conference, the courts' policymaking arm, issued rules on "judicial junkets" and on computerized conflict of interest checks. The Breyer Committee simultaneously issued a thorough report on the judicial misconduct and discipline system, which included constructive suggestions for improvement. The judiciary must continue to institute measures for policing itself. If judges do not undertake self-regulation, Congress will enter the breach and legislate in ways that could jeopardize judicial independence.

The reality is that plenty of judges have taken on a lawmaking duties to shape the world to conform to their beliefs, opinions, and values. Ms. O'Connor fails to describe that the founders did not intend this, nor did they write it into the constitution. The activities of JAIL 4 Judges seem like a natural reaction to judges gone wild.

Justice O'Connor cites Federalist No. 78 and Alexander Hamilton for the proposition that the Framers intended an independent judiciary. Maybe so, but I defy her to find in the Constitution a provision that states that the Supreme Court has the final say on what is constitutional. That power was arrogated to the Supreme Court by the legerdemain of John Marshall in McCullough v. Maryland. That was the first hole in the dike.

Ms. O'Connor finds it particularly troubling that other judges are critical of the Supreme Court. When the Supreme Court allows the use of race to achieve balance in an otherwise color blind society (University of Michigan case), and when the court cites foreign law for the proposition that it is uncivilized to execute a person under age 18 (Roper v. Simmons), the justices are not making judicial decisions but rather legislative ones.

Build a Wall Big Enough to Keep the Illegals Out

In your Sept. 21 editorial "The Great Wall of America" you opposed my proposal for a wall on our southern border stating, "Nor will a wall deter illegal workers, who are drawn here by the powerful magnetic pull of economic opportunity and plentiful jobs." How do you know that? We have never tried to build an effective barrier across the border that is difficult to tunnel under or scale.

The way the system works now, various federal agencies must sort the needles called terrorists and violent criminals from the massive haystack of illegal humanity. The system doesn't work. The fact remains that four million people a year illegally cross our southern border.

The U.S. has no shortage of labor and would not have one if all illegals went home. Department of Labor statistics show that there are 69 million Americans between the ages of 16-74, who are simply not in the workforce. They represent 10 Americans for each illegal worker.

According to a research report compiled by the Pew Hispanic Center last March, the illegal workforce numbers 6.9 million. Illegals, then, represent 4.9% of our workforce of 141 million people, according to Labor. Because of lack of education and low skills, only 2.2% of our GDP is produced by illegal labor.

You took issue with my statement that we should install wire on top of the wall and electrify it as a deterrent because I said, "We do this with livestock all of the time." You contend I've equated "people with cattle." No, I've equated an effective fence with an effective wall. We already do this with livestock and people. There are installations of electric wire on fences and walls all across America -- water treatment plants, salvage yards and car dealerships, to name a few. If electric wire is an acceptable deterrent to American citizens, then it's acceptable as a deterrent to those who would steal the benefits of American citizenship.

Congress Accomplished More Than You Realize

Your Oct. 2 editorial "The GOP Record" says the 109th Congress didn't get much done. But from the business community's perspective, it was one of the most productive sessions in recent memory. Consider: transportation reauthorization directed much-needed resources to the nation's infrastructure; the Class Action Fairness Act discouraged frivolous lawsuits; the Dominican Republic-Central American Free Trade Agreement lowered trade barriers for U.S. companies; and legislation was passed that increased small business expensing, strengthened the pension system, stiffened anti-counterfeiting laws and reformed the bankruptcy code.

While achieving a great deal, this Congress did leave a lot on the table, including comprehensive immigration reform, extension of vital tax cuts and implementation of a national energy strategy. But on the whole, it was more "can do" than "do nothing."

Group Formed to Stop Politicization of Science

Your Oct. 6 editorial "Under the Microscope" (Taste page, Weekend Journal) regarding Scientists and Engineers for America (SEA), a new 527 organization committed to restoring integrity to science policy, confuses nonpartisan with bipartisan -- SEA is a bipartisan group. The central thesis of the organization is that science has an established method of determining fact through an open process of debate and that no fact or theory is unassailable.

We agree that the best science flows from questioning. Yet your editorial suggests that SEA's real mission is to close debate on science when the truth is exactly the opposite. That is why SEA's membership soared to more than 1,000 members in the first 24 hours of the group's launch. You are also dismissive of allegations that members of the White House and Congress are guilty of unscientific, special interest-driven policymaking on global warming, stem cell research and the "Plan B" morning-after pill. It complains that scientists have become political in their effort to stop the assault on fact-based decision-making at all of levels of government.

SEA was formed to stop the politicization of science and ensure that the scientific voice is heard in policy debates and not marginalized, misstated or censured.

College Fracas Over Minuteman; Questions About Paying For Wall (WSJ)

By Jennifer Johnson And Aaron Rutkoff

Border Lines is a regular look at the best writing on the immigration debate from around the Web. (Some links may require registration or subscription.) * * *

BAD EDUCATION: The appearance of Minuteman Project founder Jim Gilchrist was met with violence last week at Columbia University when the pro-enforcement hardliner attempted to address a Republican student group. The melee began just minutes after Mr. Gilchrist rose to speak, according to Columbia Spectator reporter Laura Brunts1. "Two students in the International Socialist Organization unfurled a yellow banner reading, 'No human being is illegal!'" she reports -- which in turn prompted other protestors and Minuteman supporters to rush the stage. (See video of the event here2.)

Mr. Gilchrist was ushered off before he could finish his speech, but he did manage to taunt the hostile audience before the riot began. "Who's a racist now?" he asked, while hugging an African-American Minuteman member. "I love the first amendment!"

After the riot, one unnamed protestor told Ms. Brunts that the disruption was planned: "I don't feel like we need to apologize or anything. It was fundamentally a part of free speech.... The Minutemen are not a legitimate part of the debate on immigration." Subsequently, as the student newspaper also reported, Columbia officials said they were using postings on the social-networking site Facebook.com as part of their investigation3.

New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg chastised Columbia President Lee Bollinger, a lawyer and free-speech scholar, for failing to provide an open atmosphere on campus. "Bollinger's just got to get his hands around this," Mr. Bloomberg said on his weekly radio show4. "There's just too many incidents at the same school where people get censored." (Previously, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad was forced to cancel a speech at Columbia when school officials said they couldn't coordinate his security.)

In a statement released5 by the Minutemen afterwards, Mr. Gilchrist described the incident as "yet another indication that those who support illegal immigration are happy to use communist tactics in their intolerant determination" to deny his group their First Amendment rights. * * *

BARRIER BAIT-AND-SWITCH? Opponents of the proposal for a fence on the U.S.-Mexico border widely predicted that the initiative would not see full funding. Now, according to a report in the Arizona Republic6, Sen. John Cornyn (R., Texas) believes those critics were right. "It's one thing to authorize," he said. "It's another thing to actually appropriate the money and do it." Instead, Mr. Cornyn speculated, the fence legislation would probably be used to create a "virtual fence" comprised of increased border patrols and high-tech sensors. Why the switch? The senator explained "that 700 miles of fencing would not solve the problem of illegal immigration because it would still leave about 1,300 miles of unfenced border," according to reporter Eunice Moscoso.

In the Washington Post, staff writer Spencer S. Hsu provides details on the gaping loopholes7 surrounding the $1.2 billion set aside for border security by the new law. "[T]he House and Senate gave the Bush administration leeway to distribute the money to a combination of projects -- not just the physical barrier along the southern border. The funds may also be spent on roads, technology and 'tactical infrastructure' to support the Department of Homeland Security's preferred option of a 'virtual fence.'" To win over some Republican votes for the bill, Mr. Hsu also reports, "congressional leaders pledged in writing that Native American tribes, members of Congress, governors and local leaders would get a say in 'the exact placement' of any structure."

Mr. Bush, for his part, made no reference8 to anything like a 700-mile fence while signing the Department of Homeland Security Appropriations Act in Scottsdale, Ariz.

What's going on here? Fence supporter Mickey Kaus thinks he sees a pocket veto coming9. An Associated Press report flagged on Mr. Kaus's blog makes it clear that a second bill, the Secure Fence Act, which categorically calls for 700 miles of double-layered fencing, has not yet received Mr. Bush's signature10. * * *

OLD TOWN, NEW RULES: An influx of moneyed Northern Virginia residents are moving into the once small town of Culpeper, Va. But Steve Jenkins, a longtime Culpeper man, is more concerned about illegal immigrants. "For me, it's been like a three-year root canal -- really horrible," says Mr. Jenkins in a Washington Post piece11 by Metro columnist Marc Fisher. "I'm just an old country boy who really liked going into the grocery and knowing who was who. Not like now, when the illegals are off to themselves."

The growing population is creating more traffic and luring big-box retailers such as Target and Lowe's to the countryside. "Those who've moved here from Northern Virginia -- to them, this immigration thing isn't something of great significance," Mr. Jenkins says. "They're not concerned about the urbanization of Culpeper, but for those of us who've been here a long time, well, it's driving people away..." While Mr. Jenkins knows he can't get rid of his new neighbors from the north, he does believe something can be done about those from the south. "It's a much easier issue, because it's black and white," he says. "You're either legal, or you're not. We need to help them be legal. I'm not for anything harsh. If they're willing to come forward and go through a process, we have an obligation to assist them in every way. But I'm about rules." * * *

MIXED FEELINGS IN MEXICO: South of the border, despite the common perception in the U.S., Mexicans are ambivalent about the northward migration of their fellow countrymen -- and, as a result, have mixed feelings about plans for a U.S. border fence. "Mexicans feel helpless before the migrant exodus, and talk about it the same way they talk about the weather," reports L.A. Times staff writer Héctor Tobar12. "Everyone complains about it, but there's not much you can do about it." Some took the 700-mile fence authorized by the U.S. Congress as a "slap in the face that highlighted the failure of their country's leaders," Mr. Tobar reports.

There is also a widespread view that the fence initiative represents a rejection of Mexican cultural contributions to life in the U.S. And, as Mexican historian Lorenzo Meyer tells Mr. Tobar, some believe the plan runs counter the spirit of North American Free Trade agreement: "We see now that the idea of a united North America is fiction," Mr. Meyer says. "The reality is the wall."

Others, however, have expressed a more positive response to the fence plan. Guillermo Ortiz, the head of Mexico's central bank, made front-page news in his country after telling the editorial board of the Dallas Morning News13 that a fence "would not be altogether bad. It would certainly be better over the long run." The economist added: "I think Mexico needs its people." * * *

THE 'MUCHAS' MEME: Republicans have found a novel way to try to stick it to their Democratic rivals: thanking them in Spanish. Mac Collins displayed his sarcastic bilingual gratitude for incumbent Rep. Jim Marshall (D., Ga.) in this television ad14. Mr. Marshall, the ad's female announcer observes, "voted to waste our tax dollars printing election ballots in Spanish." Then, an accented male voice intones: "Muchas gracias Señor Jim Marshall."

The National Republican Senatorial Committee took the "gracias" gimmick one step further by creating an entire Web site15 devoted to thanking incumbent Sen. Debbie Stabenow (D., Mich.) in Spanish. Visitors to MuchasGraciasDebbie.com see Ms. Stabenow, decked out in a cartoon sombrero, respond to this profusion of Spanish praise with a "no problema" speech bubble. What's more, the NRSC's facetious Spanish-language Stabenow tribute site includes links to French16 and Chinese17 versions, each taking issue with different dimensions of the senator's purported voting record. * * *

CASELOAD CRUNCH: As the nation's immigration judges struggle to manage an ever-growing caseload, some judges are facing criticism over how they manage their crowded dockets. Studies highlight stark disparities in judgment, like 90% of asylum cases granted by one judge and 9% down the hall, writes New York Times reporter18 Nina Bernstein. One judge, Sandy K. Hom, is so quick and predictable in his denials of asylum that lawyers regularly advise people assigned to him to move to another state, the article says.

"In asylum cases, the wrong decision can be a death sentence. In others, banishment hangs in the balance, with the prospect of families split up or swept into harm's way," Ms. Bernstein writes.

"But before they can consider the merits of a case, judges must cope with an intricate web of laws, changing conditions in distant lands, and a mix of false and truthful testimony in 227 tongues vulnerable to an interpreter's mistake..."

The nation's 218 immigration judges face 350,000 cases a year, with New York's 27 judges taking on about 20,000, the article says.

SOUND BITES

President Bush at a White House celebration of Hispanic Heritage Month on Friday: "We must understand that you can't kick 12 million people out of your country -- that we must figure out a way to say to those that if you're lawful and if you've contributed to the United States of America, there is a way for you to eventually earn citizenship."

Enrique Morones, president of immigrant rights group Border Angels, on Arnold Schwarzenegger's immigration stance: "We always have to remember that he's an actor and ... without a doubt he is putting on an Academy Award-winning performance that he cares about the Latino community, when we know he does not."

Good Fences And Such (USNEWS)

By Angie C. Marek

U.S. News and World Report, October 9, 2006

It was a telling moment. Last week when Speaker of the House Dennis Hastert faced a battering of press questions about the congressional page scandal, he reached for a life raft: President George W. Bush's promise to sign a bill that would create 700 miles of metal fencing on the U.S.-Mexico border. "A lot of people wanted us to address the issue about the border," he told reporters, "and we did exactly that."

Really? As is so often the case in Washington, the reality wasn't as tidy as the rhetoric. Congress passed the Secure Fence Act, requiring the Department of Homeland Security to build 700 miles of steel fencing, but critics say backdoor deals have denied the project the necessary funding. In fact, the bill's fine print-and a flurry of last-minute compromises that paved the way for its passage-raise questions about what, if anything, will eventually be built. "This isn't the answer to our problems," says Angela Kelley of the National Immigration Forum. "It's empty symbolism."

On the face of it, the fence bill looks like an aggressive response. The measure adds 700 miles of fencing-split into five segments-to the roughly 75 miles of solid metal border walls already lining parts of the 1,951-mile U.S.-Mexico border. A 390-mile segment would stretch from mid-California across most of Arizona. Other chunks would block a cocaine-trafficking route near Laredo, Texas, and close a path through the Lower Rio Grande Valley once popular with Brazilian migrants. The fence is modeled on a stretch of 15-foot-high double fences-with a high-speed-access road running between them-that Rep. Duncan Hunter says slashed the number of attempted border crossings in his San Diego district after they were built in the mid-1990s. The number of arrests dropped there by almost two thirds.

Details. But what happens now isn't entirely clear. Although the Congressional Budget Office estimates it will cost $3.2 million a mile, Congress voted to hand DHS just $1.2 billion in fiscal year 2007 for construction; that would cover the cost of about 370 miles of fence, not 700. What's more, a congressional deal gives DHS the flexibility to use money for other purposes besides the wall itself, most notably technology and roadways. Some of the money could go to a project DHS was already working on: a plan to dot the border with up to 1,800 massive observation towers equipped with cameras. Michael Jackson, the No. 2 official at DHS, says the department plans "to refine and assess how much [steel fencing] we need with the new technology tool kit." DHS, he adds, will most likely build "somewhere in the ballpark" of 370 miles of San Diego-style fence.

The bill offers DHS other kinds of wiggle room on the fence as well. In a last-minute effort to appease two Republican holdouts-including Texas Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, who had concerns about local input on the location of fencing - congressional leaders committed in writing to changing some specific aspects of the legislation after the November elections. Those changes will ensure that local governments and American Indian tribes will be consulted "regarding the exact placement of the fence," according to a letter signed by Hastert and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist. The letter also says DHS will have the "flexibility to use alternative physical infrastructure and technology when fencing is ineffective or impractical." Some say that means large portions of the fence bill are basically moot. Others disagree. "A letter is just a letter," says Carolyn Weyforth, Frist's press secretary. "What comes to the floor and passes is what matters."

TAX:

As Religious Programs Expand, Disputes Rise Over Tax Breaks (NYT)

By Diana B. Henriques

The New York Times, October 10, 2006

The similarities between Holy Cross Village at Notre Dame, on the north side of South Bend, Ind., and Hermitage Estates, south of town, are almost disorienting. The two retirement communities have the same simple gabled ranch houses, with the same touches of brick and stone, clustered around a pond with the same fountain funneling spray into the air and ducks waddling down the grassy bank.

But the retired residents of Hermitage Estates pay an average of about $2,300 per unit in property taxes. The management of Holy Cross Village, the Brothers of Holy Cross, says that development should be exempt from property taxes, and it has taken that argument to court.

As the Brothers of Holy Cross, a Roman Catholic religious order, sees it, providing the elderly with the amenities of the village — a sense of security, social opportunities and various services to make independent living easier — is a charitable activity rooted in its pastoral mission to serve others.

Members of the St. Joseph County Property Tax Assessment Board of Appeals, all but one of them lifelong Catholics, see it differently. To them, a charitable ministry does not consist of providing lovely retirement living to affluent people. The current residents of Holy Cross Village have an average net worth of $1 million. Those with deposits on the units under construction are even better off, averaging $1.6 million.

If Holy Cross Village is not taxed, members of the assessment board point out, a heavier burden will fall on the working families in the county that are struggling to pay the taxes on their small homes in careworn communities like the west side of South Bend.

“I was educated by the Brothers of Holy Cross” at St. Joseph’s High School, “and I have a great deal of respect, love and affection for them,” said Dennis J. Dillman, a longtime board member. “But I think what they’re doing is just not right. And that is based on the values they taught me at their schools.”

The conflict in South Bend echoes disputes from Alaska to Florida that raise the following issue: As religious organizations of all faiths stretch their concept of mission far beyond traditional worship, should their traditional tax exemptions expand as well? Increasingly, government at all levels is answering yes.

The property tax exemption is one of the oldest tax breaks granted to religious organizations, but it is not the only one. Lawmakers and judges have also approved what amounts to special tax treatment for religious organizations and some of their employees, including exemptions on personal-income and payroll taxes, and have made it easier for them to get tax-exempt construction loans for purely religious projects.

Like the exemptions from federal and state regulations that have proliferated for religious groups in recent years, these tax breaks are widely defended both as an acknowledgment of religion’s contributions to society and as a barrier to unjustified government limitations on the liberty that religious organizations enjoy under the First Amendment.

But in some communities like South Bend, tolerance of religious tax breaks is fraying as local governments struggle to provide basic services with limited resources.

There are no national figures on how much money these tax breaks save religious organizations and on how much extra cost is shifted to other citizens. But a typical state, Colorado, reported that religious real estate valued at more than $1.1 billion was exempt from local property taxes there last year. Nationally, tax-exempt financing for religious organizations totaled at least $20 billion during the decade that ended last year.

Congressional budget records show that just the income tax breaks uniquely available for ministers, rabbis and other clergy members cost taxpayers just under $500 million a year.

And the price is almost certainly increasing, experts on taxation and congregational growth agreed, because today's larger congregations need more land, employ more clergy members and pay them more money. Moreover, the definition of a religious mission is expanding beyond schools and hospitals to include operations as obscure as a biblical theme park in Florida and as upscale as a retirement community at Notre Dame.

Every state affords some type of property-tax exemption to churches, synagogues, mosques and other religious landowners, typically through statutes that also cover charities, libraries, museums, private schools and other secular nonprofit groups. Indeed, when the Supreme Court ruled on the constitutionality of this tax break in 1970 it noted approvingly that the benefits did not fall exclusively on churches.

But those venerable tax statutes did not envision the reality of modern congregations that operate athletic programs in their own gymnasiums or fitness centers, as well as bookstores, music and video production units, coffee shops, counseling services, ice cream parlors, child care programs and multimedia ministries that beam their messages from satellite dishes or television transmission towers.

Leonard A. Wychocki, president and chief executive of the Franciscan Sisters of Chicago Service Corporation, a Catholic organization hired to manage Holy Cross Village, says religious groups should not have to defend property tax exemptions. "When there were old people on the streets of New York City and Chicago, our sisters took them in," he said. The exemption recognizes "the service such groups provide to society."

No residents of Holy Cross Village will be coming in off the streets, of course. "People pay a lot of money to live in these places," Mr. Wychocki acknowledged. "But they have a need beyond just a place to live. It's around that need that we catalyze our services."

Financial projections show that the project, if managed well, could eventually generate a surplus. That money, the project's executives said, could help support other mission work of the Brothers of Holy Cross, including a ministry in Africa.

"If the county wants to argue that those dollars should go to west South Bend rather than West Africa, I can see their point," Mr. Wychocki said. "You may agree or disagree — but then it's your judgment, as opposed to the brothers' judgment."

He added, after an emphatic pause: "This is probably where religious freedom kicks in."

Breaks on Property Taxes

Neat homes in landscaped clusters make up the first phase of what will be 256 units at Holy Cross Village at Notre Dame. Among the new units will be additional assisted-living and skilled-nursing units to expand the existing "continuum of care," its management said. Three adjacent colleges, the University of Notre Dame among them, expand the cultural opportunities.

In style and luxury, the project compares favorably with competing retirement communities built by national developers nationwide. But there is a difference: Holy Cross Village describes itself as "a ministry of Brothers of Holy Cross." As such, it is seeking a property tax exemption from the Property Tax Assessment Board of Appeals for St. Joseph County.

That rankles Ralph J. Wolfe, an assessment board member who is a resident of Hermitage Estates, a 49-unit neighborhood of retirees whose homeowners association provides services including maintenance and lawn care.

Mr. Wolfe, 77, is a retired tax assessor and a longtime veteran of the close-knit appeals board. He said his community, like Holy Cross Village, offers its retirees some amenities. "So maybe we should get ourselves a property tax exemption."

He seemed to be teasing Terrance F. Wozniak, the deputy county attorney for St. Joseph County, who was listening. One of Mr. Wozniak's biggest worries about losing the pending battle with Holy Cross is the ripple effects on the retirement communities in the county that do pay taxes.

The Indiana courts recognize a broad definition of charity, and exemptions already have been granted to a few much smaller religious-affiliated projects that care primarily for less healthy people, Mr. Wozniak said. But this case is different, he said: "It's a case of escalation." An exemption for the charitable care of needy older citizens is being stretched to cover "more and more luxurious facilities for people who, by and large, can pay their fair share."

Each case lowers the hurdle for what constitutes a tax-exempt retirement community, he said.

The management of Holy Cross Village thinks the project's mission fits well within both the Indiana definition of a "charitable purpose" and the federal standards for tax-exempt housing providers. The federal test requires, in part, that the project

"be committed by established policy" to maintaining people as residents even if they become unable to pay, as the project's investment documents explain.

There is nothing in writing that guarantees the project will keep indigent residents in place, said Lori McLaughlin, general counsel for the Franciscan Sisters management group. "It becomes a case of those guarantees bankrupting you," she said.

But in lieu of a guarantee, the management has "nuns or brothers on the board saying, 'We insist you provide care,' " Mr. Wychocki said. "It would be very rare for anybody to be asked to leave."

Holy Cross Village initially paid the taxes the county demanded, but subsequently got court permission to hold off on future payments while its appeals go forward, according to Kevin Rose, a spokesman for the project's management.

When the Brothers of Holy Cross appealed the county's ruling to the Indiana Board of Tax Review last year, it lost. "A charitable purpose involves something beyond merely successfully marketing one's services to seniors," the review board said. "It implies some level of sacrifice on the part of the entity providing those services. It is this sacrifice that separates an 'obviously charitable act' from the everyday purposes and activities of man in general."

The fight has now moved to the courts, where the project's management hopes to fare better. "We thought we were within the orbit of what was considered to merit that exemption," Mr. Wychocki said. "Now we just stand and shake our heads."

While local tax authorities have been inconsistent in their rulings, many untraditional uses of land by disparate religious organizations of many faiths have already qualified for property tax exemptions somewhere in the country.

In June, for example, the Florida Legislature passed, and Gov. Jeb Bush signed, a law that ended a five-year effort by Orange County tax authorities in Orlando to collect about $300,000 a year in property taxes from Holy Land Experience, a biblical museum and theme park that had sought exemption as a religious ministry but had been repeatedly turned down by the county.

The park, where a pass good for a week costs $35 for adults and $23 for school-age children, advertises itself as a place that "brings the world of the Bible alive." Its features include replicas of Calvary, the tomb of Jesus and the caves where the Dead Sea Scrolls were found. It also includes a period re-creation of a Jerusalem street market, with actors in costume as the merchants and buyers; and the KidVenture area, with a wilderness rock-climbing wall, a "misting station" and toy and gift shops. A cafe and two snack bars serve "real Middle Eastern fare" from couscous and falafel to Goliath Burgers.

The county property appraiser's office had insisted that the park, despite its biblical motif, was taxable, just like Disney World. The park's founder, the Rev. Marvin J. Rosenthal, argued that it was a religious mission from start to finish, aiming to introduce religion to people in an entertaining and enlightening way.

In July 2005, a local judge ruled against the county, saying the biblical park's intent was to "spread what it considers to be God's word," while the intent of Disney World "is indisputably to make money." When the county decided to appeal that decision, the ministry that operates the park lobbied successfully for relief in Tallahassee.

A spokeswoman for Governor Bush said he signed the bill "merely to prevent future legal action and provide clarification of the law" on exemptions for religious property.

In 2003, the Minnesota Tax Court granted an exemption to an elaborate fitness center owned by the Country Bible Church in Ashby, explaining that the center — which included a weight room, tanning bed, video arcade and bookstore, as well as a small auditorium and prayer room — was used to attract new church members.

The church, with about 250 members, has a broad range of programs for children and teenagers, including a day school and toddler program. But it decided in 1996 that its rural location simply did not offer enough for young people, and it conceived the Destiny Center as a place where young people could form healthy habits and "strong, godly friendships," according to its pastor.

"We've spent close to $1 million, including the building and staff, and we've never broken even," said the Rev. Steven R. Quernemoen, who founded the church 25 years ago. "But the goal is not to run a for-profit business. The goal was to open a facility that is a safe environment for young kids and families."

The two-story center, with a center gable soaring high over the entrance, opened in October 2000 a few miles from the church. Besides its fitness facilities, it has a gymnasium that offers room for rock concerts and for family events like wedding receptions, reunions or birthday parties. A day pass costs $4.69, including shower privileges. An annual family membership costs

$500, but the elderly pay about half that. It is open most mornings and after school through the week, but is closed all day on Sunday.

Similarly, in 2002, the Washington State courts granted a tax exemption for the site of a religious broadcaster's transmission tower. And in January the Pennsylvania Supreme Court reversed a 1959 decision that had denied tax exemptions to parking lots that serve houses of worship.

Legislative Success

Some religious organizations have had equal success with state legislators.

The Anchorage Baptist Temple, which has grown to 4,500 members during the 35-year tenure of the Rev. Dr. Jerry Prevo, is a big, muscular church on a 20-acre campus in eastern Anchorage. Its complex includes a 2,100-seat auditorium, several gymnasiums, a television station and the Anchorage Christian Schools, which serve about 750 students from preschool to 12th grade. The church also owns an assortment of individual properties, 10 of them tax-exempt.

In April 2004, city tax assessors revoked the exemption for four church-owned homes they said did not qualify as "parsonages" because they housed church day-school teachers, not the pastors or other "spiritual leaders" specified by law.

"We are a high-profile church," said Pastor Prevo. "We were being picked on to make a public statement against tax exemptions generally."

Any group as large as Anchorage Baptist Temple would probably have no trouble getting help from state lawmakers, even if its pastor did not have his own television show and even if one of the 16 men on its pastoral staff were not treasurer of the state Republican Party. Last May, after vigorous lobbying by the congregation, the Republican-controlled Alaska Legislature passed and Gov. Frank H. Murkowski signed a bill that extends the parsonage exemption to church-owned residential property occupied by educators at private religious or parochial schools.

The exemption, which does not cover faculty housing at secular schools, has been challenged in court by the local American Civil Liberties Union.

It is a tough fight, a lawyer for several big churches said, because a legislature that can constitutionally exempt a parsonage from the tax rolls can surely extend that exemption to homes a church provides to its schoolteachers.

And back in St. Joseph County, Ind., the Granger Community Church, a large United Methodist group, took exception to the county's enforcement in 2001 of a long-overlooked law that limited the amount of tax-exempt acreage around a church to 15 acres — which left the church with 14.54 acres still on the tax rolls.

It lost in the courts but carried its fight to Indianapolis, and helped push through changes that eliminated the 15-acre cap.

Breaks on Borrowing

The Rev. Russell Lievers of the First Southern Baptist Church in Clarksville, Ind., a town of 22,000 across the Ohio River from Louisville, Ky., is understandably excited about the new fellowship hall his church is building.

At a price of roughly $2.5 million, the facility will contain a "middle-school-sized" gymnasium, he said, as well as a kitchen, meeting areas and classroom space. It will ease crowding at the 57-year-old church and open possibilities for new athletic ministries and outreach, he added.

Pastor Lievers is not familiar with the details for financing the new facility — but he knows the church has received a good interest rate on some of the money it is borrowing. That's important, he said, because "our people are giving sacrificially" to support the new facility.

"There are people who are delaying their retirement for a few years to help us build this," he continued. "Others are postponing purchases so they can give more."

The explanation for the church's low-cost financing is simple. It is relying on $1 million in tax-exempt revenue bonds sold on its behalf by the town of Clarksville, through its economic development commission.

"It is the first time we've had a church apply," said Samuel K. Gwin, the town attorney. "But most of us here on the town council and economic development commission were familiar with the church, and the folks in the church. It's a small town."

The church bond issue is structured like any economic development deal: the town sells tax-exempt bonds to an investor — in this case, a local bank — willing to accept a lower yield because the interest is tax-free. The town lends the lower-cost money to the church. The bank gets tax-free interest income, the church gets a lower-cost loan and the town gets — well, at the least, a new gymnasium the community can use when the church's calendar permits.

"That will be good," Mr. Gwin said. "Even the Y is pretty crowded."

In the evolving view of the courts, tax-exempt bonds for churches and other religious organizations do not involve any public money or government subsidy and do not run afoul of the First Amendment ban on government-sponsored religion.

But in fact, the subsidy provided by all tax-exempt bonds, while indirect, is real: buyers of the bonds do not have to pay income taxes on the interest they earn, which shifts some of the overall tax burden to other taxpayers. And the final beneficiary of the bond issue — in this case, the church — can hold on to money it would otherwise have paid in interest.

Of all the tools that an accommodating government can use to make life easier for religious organizations, perhaps none has changed more and been noticed less than tax-exempt bond financing.

State and local governments have long used tax-exempt bonds to finance public works like bridges and schools, pledging future tax income to repay the debt. In the 1970's, they began to rely heavily on revenue bonds, debt backed not by taxes but by the future revenues of the projects they were sold to finance, which ranged from airports to stadiums. Through economic development agencies, revenue bonds also were sold for the benefit of private businesses to finance factories or office buildings that would foster economic development.

In 1973, near the high-water mark of the doctrine of strict church-state separation that dominated the postwar decades, the United States Supreme Court gave its limited blessing to public revenue bond deals to benefit private religious colleges — so long as they were not "pervasively sectarian" and regarded education, not the promulgation of religion, as their primary purpose.

In a landmark case called Hunt v. McNair, the court reasoned that "aid normally may be thought to have a primary effect of advancing religion" — which would be unconstitutional — if it went to "an institution in which religion is so pervasive that a substantial portion of its functions are subsumed in the religious mission, or when it funds a specifically religious activity in an otherwise substantially secular setting."

As recently as 1991, the Virginia Supreme Court refused to approve tax-exempt financing for Liberty University in Lynchburg, Va., founded and run by the Rev. Jerry Falwell, because of its overarching religious purposes.

Then, over the next eight years, judicial and government policy made a U-turn.

Gradually, state bond statutes became less restrictive toward religious institutions and federal and state appeals courts started to permit tax-free financing at unabashedly religious universities — and later, religious high schools — so long as the money was used for firmly secular projects, like dormitories and dining halls. (California courts have held on to the "pervasively sectarian" standard, but three religious schools are currently challenging that approach before the State Supreme Court.)

Does Financing Count as Aid?

And the courts began to widely question whether tax-exempt financing even counted as government aid to religion at all, because the schools themselves had to repay the bonds and no public money was involved.

In June 2000, Justice Clarence Thomas, writing for himself and three other justices, expressed second thoughts about denying tax-free financing to institutions based on how religious they were. "There was a period when this factor mattered, particularly if the pervasively sectarian school was a primary or secondary school," he conceded. "But that period is one that the court should regret, and it is thankfully long past."

A few months later, the Virginia Supreme Court reversed the position it had taken nine years earlier in the Liberty University case and approved tax-exempt bond financing for the construction of a campus for Regent University, a thoroughly sectarian institution founded by Pat Robertson, the religious broadcaster who also founded the Christian Coalition. The Virginia justices did balk at permitting Mr. Robertson to use public bond financing for his department of divinity; that would have to be financed in some other way, they said.

But that reluctance seems quaint these days. Early 2005 brought the sale of $28.5 million worth of tax-exempt bonds issued by Cook County, Ill., to finance the construction of an academic center for the Catholic Theological Union, the largest Catholic graduate school of theology in the United States.

The new building, which a seminary spokeswoman said would open this fall, includes space for the world-class Bechtold library of theology, spacious classrooms for religious study and "a worship area that has a sacred space for the entire community to gather," according to the news release about its grand opening.

According to Jeffrey O. Lewis, a lawyer with Ice Miller in Chicago and the seminary's bond counsel for that deal, "The 'pervasively sectarian' restriction began to fall apart in the late 1990's, and quite a few firms are very comfortable doing seminary financing now."

So it was perhaps inevitable that a local government would provide tax-exempt financing to an institution as indisputably sectarian and devoutly religious as the First Southern Baptist Church in Clarksville. "Nobody raised any questions about it at all," recalled Mr. Gwin, the town attorney.

A search of the Municipal Securities Rulemaking Board's database shows that more than $20 billion in tax-exempt bonds have been sold since the late 1980's on behalf of religious institutions or their affiliates, including deals benefiting a Jewish vocational workshop in Michigan, a Baptist retirement home in Arizona, a Presbyterian housing project in Missouri, Lutheran nursing homes and day care centers in Minnesota and Catholic schools in Rhode Island.

In one recent deal, the city of Olathe, Kan., agreed to sell more than $83.5 million in tax-free bonds to help an affiliate of the Archdiocese of Kansas City finance Santa Marta, described as a Catholic "continuing care retirement community" with 162 units for independent living, 32 assisted-living units, a 32-bed nursing home and a swimming pool.

Except for the swimming pool, Santa Marta sounds a lot like Holy Cross Village at Notre Dame, whose property tax status is being disputed by the tax assessment appeals board in St. Joseph County. They certainly have this in common: Most of the money needed to build Holy Cross Village has been borrowed at favorable interest rates through the sale of a $40 million tax-exempt bond — issued by the economic development commission of St. Joseph County.

A Tax Reprieve For Americans Working Abroad (WSJ)

By Tom Herman

NEW YORK -- Some Americans working in countries with high housing costs have won a partial reprieve from a recently enacted tax increase.

The Treasury Department issued a notice Friday that raises the amount of housing costs that some Americans working and living abroad may deduct or exclude when they are filing their U.S. income-tax returns. As a result, although numerous U.S. expatriates still face significantly higher taxes for this year, the increase won't be as steep as initially feared for workers in some places, such as Hong Kong and Singapore.

The new Treasury notice also included revised housing-cost numbers for many places in Europe. But these changes may be less significant for many U.S. workers there because of high taxes imposed by numerous European nations.

The housing-cost numbers, which are based on a complex formula, vary widely from place to place. For example, the maximum amount of housing costs that an American working in Hong Kong may exclude for this year works out to $101,116, according to one Washington tax specialist. Previously, American expats in all overseas locations were allowed to exclude just $11,536. The Treasury says its table will be updated annually.

The tax increase stems from a law enacted in May that is retroactive to the start of this year. That new law mainly hits high-income Americans working in countries with a combination of low taxes and high housing costs and whose companies don't help cover the additional tax costs of living abroad.

The impact can vary widely depending on where someone lives and the details of their pay package. It isn't known exactly how many U.S. citizens work abroad. The Senate Finance Committee has said Americans working abroad filed about 306,000 individual income-tax returns for 2003 claiming what is known as the foreign-earned income exclusion. Of those, about 126,000 returns had a U.S. tax liability.

A congressional committee has estimated the new law's changes affecting U.S. expatriates will raise an estimated $2.1 billion in revenue for the U.S. Treasury over the next 10 years.

Part of the new law slashes the maximum amount of housing costs that workers abroad could exclude or deduct when calculating their taxes. That new law also gave the U.S. Treasury Department authority to change those amounts for workers in nations with high housing costs.

After lobbying by U.S. expatriate groups, Treasury officials issued "Notice 2006-87," which gives new housing-cost limits for U.S. expatriates in some nations, but not all.

Under the new law, Americans working abroad are eligible to exclude as much as $82,400 of their foreign-earned pay this year, plus certain foreign housing costs, when filing U.S. taxes. Income above that level now is subject to much higher tax rates under what is known as a "stacking" rule. That provision isn't affected by the new Treasury notice.

It's Taxing To Recruit Top Law Grads To IRS, But A New Push Betters Returns (WSJ)

By Robert Guy Matthews

NEW HAVEN, Conn. -- Donald Korb, chief counsel of the Internal Revenue Service, sits in a high-back chair in a meeting room lined with law books and prepares to talk to a small gathering of Yale Law School students about tax shelters.

But before delivering his lecture, he delivers a sales pitch -- for jobs at the IRS: Work a 40-hour week (more or less). Get into a courtroom within the first month. Choose the city where you work. "I can't say enough about the value to your career," he concludes, breathlessly. "And that's my commercial."

It isn't subtle, and it seems to work. A couple of students reach for the informational folders and CDs stacked on a coffee table.

For decades, the IRS, employer of 1,500 lawyers, failed to draw freshly scrubbed graduates from the country's top law schools. It recruited in the spring, instead of the preceding fall when the private firms did. "All the good ones were gone by then," Mr. Korb says. When it did find promising candidates, it left many of them in limbo for months; private firms usually respond within weeks. And then there's the pay: about $65,000 to $70,000, depending on location, for a first-year lawyer at the IRS. That's half the starting rate at private firms.

It's no wonder few of the smartest young minds in tax law considered starting their careers at the IRS. As a result, the IRS frequently finds itself out-manned and out-maneuvered by corporations or rich individuals, who hire pricey private lawyers to craft and defend sophisticated schemes to dodge taxes.

Mr. Korb -- J.D., Case Western Reserve University School of Law; LL.M., Georgetown University Law Center -- is out to change that. He says a few early years at the IRS is a big boost to a tax lawyer's career. His message seems to be sinking in. A wave of new graduates from law schools at Yale, New York University and the University of Southern California begin work next month, the first stream of new lawyers from those top-tier schools to join the IRS in years. In all, the IRS has 1,500 applicants so far for the 50 spots it wants to fill over the next 12 months.

Deborah Egurrola, 28 years old, who graduated from Yale Law School in June, says she turned down a $125,000-a-year offer from a Washington D.C. law firm, and a $105,000 offer from a Miami law firm, to take a $66,000 offer to work in the IRS's chief counsel's office.

"The IRS really throws you right into the thick of things," Ms. Egurrola says. "At a lot of law firms, you have to start with more behind-the-scenes work. Here you start interacting with attorneys from outside." She says she can afford to take the lower-paying job because her parents have agreed to help her pay back her $75,000 in student loans.

Nina Kang, 26, a third-year USC law student, decided to join the IRS's Los Angeles office after working there as a summer intern. "For me, I didn't think that it was worth it to suffer for two years at a private firm and never see the light of day," she says. "I have heard of some people billing 15 to 20 hours a day for weeks on end. I have outside interests instead of working non-stop."

Ms. King, who has $140,000 in student loans, says the IRS would have an easier time recruiting if it offered ways to help students pay their debts. Some law schools give graduates more time to pay back loans if they go to work for a nonprofit; some private firms, as part of hiring packages, help recruits pay their loans. The IRS can't afford such largesse.

Mr. Korb's campaign has a few kinks. Lindsay Clayton, 24, a third-year law student at Yale, says Mr. Korb interviewed her last fall and sparked her interest. But the private firms where she interviewed called her back within a week for subsequent interviews. It took the IRS five weeks, and even then the agency wanted her to go to further interviews for a job that wasn't the one Mr. Korb had described. She declined. Another division within the IRS called her a few weeks later offering interviews for another job. Again she declined.

Brian Jenn, 29, is a third-year Yale law student with a graduate degree in economics who did a stint working on tax policy on the staff of the White House Council of Economic Advisers. He says he applied for a job with the IRS Chief Counsel's Office two years ago. When he called to inquire about his application after a few weeks, he recalls, "I was told if anyone was interested that they would have contacted me." He refused to apply again when the new-and-improved IRS came calling. He plans to join the Washington office of Skadden Arps Slate Meagher & Flom when he graduates.

Mr. Korb says it is true that a tendency to bungle applications caused the IRS to lose many promising applicants. He says he has hired a full-time recruiter and has set up a hiring committee to make sure no one else falls through the cracks.

Mary Maher, associate director for the Masters of Law in Taxation program at Northwestern University Law School, says the IRS is turning around its image. Last year, three graduates of the program took IRS jobs. "I heard back...and they have no regrets," she says. "All the marketing is sort of paying off."

Mr. Korb is especially proud of the IRS's slick marketing campaign and recruiting material. The bright green-and-purple folders and CDs contain something only tax geeks may find appealing: A list of famous -- at least in tax circles -- IRS alumni, including Jerry Reinsdorf, owner of the Chicago White Sox and the Chicago Bulls; Pam Olson, a former Treasury Department official and now a partner at Skadden Arps; and Ronald Pearlman, a former Treasury Department and congressional tax official and now a Georgetown professor.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

'06 Federal Deficit Likely To Be Lower (WT)

By Stephen Dinan, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 9, 2006

The federal deficit is expected to be lower than projected for fiscal 2006 when official numbers are released this week, which likely will lead to finger-pointing about why earlier estimates were so off target.

Income and corporate taxes have surged so much that the Treasury Department is expected to announce that the federal deficit for the fiscal year, which ended Sept. 30, has declined to about $250 billion -- almost $175 billion less than the administration had predicted in February.

It also is about $68 billion less than the 2005 deficit, and although still the seventh highest annual shortfall in history, it gives the Bush administration and congressional incumbents something to talk about this campaign season.

"They overstated the deficit on the front end to claim success later in the year," Sen. Kent Conrad of North Dakota, the top Democrat on the Senate Budget Committee, said in July, according to McClatchy newspapers.

The projections put the administration close to meeting its goal of cutting the 2004 deficit in half, three years ahead of schedule.

"If you look at the numbers this year, they are already very close to the president's goal that he set out in 2004," Rob Portman, director of the Office of Management and Budget, told reporters Friday after the Congressional Budget Office gave its unofficial $250 billion estimate. The Treasury Department's figure, expected to be released this week, is considered the official tally.

Overall, spending increased by $185 billion, but revenue grew even faster -- by $253 billion, according to the CBO -- accounting for smaller deficit. That's a revenue increase of more than 11 percent over 2005.

The driving force has been a 27 percent increase in corporate income taxes, coupled with a 13 percent increase in individual income taxes.

"We've seen this recovery be characterized by corporate profitability that is very strong, so the economic forecast, I think, is hard to do, and the government analysts are not the only ones who didn't predict profitability staying this strong this long," said former CBO Director Douglas Holtz-Eakin, who is with the Council on Foreign Relations.

"The White House is often accused of starting with a big deficit and having it come down later," he said. "The reality is the CBO, which has no particular interest in highballing the deficit and then having it come down, has about the same difficulty in forecasting the deficit as the Treasury did."

In the past 25 years, the February estimates have been off by an average of nearly $70 billion, or 2.2 percent.

On four occasions in that period, the estimates were off by at least $100 billion. They were off by 15 percent or more for three straight years during the Reagan administration.

The errors aren't always good news -- the 1983 and 1985 estimates were more than $100 billion higher than actual revenues.

And although this year's smaller deficit may sound positive, Mr. Holtz-Eakin said the long-term budget problems -- a fix to the alternative minimum tax and Medicare doctor fees, the costs of the war in Iraq and the impending retirement of the baby boomers -- still remain.

"Nothing has changed on the fundamentals," he said.

Inside Politics (WT)

By Greg Pierce

The Washington Times, October 10, 2006

Dean's mistake

"One-time 2004 presidential front-runner Howard Dean, now chairman of the Democratic National Committee, visited with us last week and made an unusual confession about why his White House bid soured: He failed to grow up during the campaign," Paul Bedard writes in the Washington Whispers column of U.S. News & World Report.

" 'My biggest mistake was something that Bill Clinton actually told me, but it was too late down the track to do it,' he says. 'That I had to make a conversion from an insurgent candidate to a candidate who acted like a president.

" 'People won't elect you president if they don't see you as a president. They saw me as an insurgent, they loved me, I was able to push the party into standing up for itself again, but I never made the conversion into what people expected of a president of the United States, and I needed to make that conversion around September [2003], and I didn't do it.

" 'Part of it was we were too successful too fast. I was leading the polls in September, so the argument was, well, you should continue to do what you're doing. But that wasn't sufficient.' "

Still smarting

Sen. John Kerry, Massachusetts Democrat, lashed out at a group that campaigned against him during his previous run for the White House.

Swift Boat Veterans for Truth, financed by Texas conservatives, ran commercials questioning his Vietnam record -- the centerpiece of his 2004 presidential campaign. Those conservatives have formed another group this year -- Economic Freedom Fund -- to campaign against Democrats across the country, the Associated Press reports.

"We're not going to give them an ounce of daylight," said Mr. Kerry, who was campaigning in Iowa and is considering a run for the Democratic presidential nomination in 2008.

The senator said his response to the commercials in 2004 was not strong enough.

"We thought the fact that the truth was out there was enough," he said. "Clearly it wasn't."

Jet-setting greens

"They sit in economy class occasionally wiping their clammy hands. Their eyes dart furtively about. They wonder whether the stewardess or passenger next to them might have become suspicious. Some even grow moustaches or beards -- to cover the 'giveaway' sweating top lip," Peter C. Glover writes at www.tcsdaily.com.

"But they are not terrorists. At least not in the modern sense of wanting to blow up the airplanes they travel in. Far from it, for they love nothing more [than] the sense of self-importance international jet-setting offers. Traveling that delivers them in far-flung destinations where they can evangelize their ascetic ordinances to thousands of fellow worshippers. But while travelling their chief fear is that they will be found out. Who they are, what they preach -- and expose their moralistic hypocritical behavior," Mr. Glover said.

"They are the Green Bigots, leading environmentalists, those at the vanguard of the fight to change our lifestyles, restrict our foreign flights, who insist we do our 'bit' to cut greenhouse gas emissions while they rack up thousands of airmiles on business and pleasure trips.

"As the UK's The Sunday Times has recently revealed, 'In the past year the directors and chief executives of groups such as WWF, Greenpeace, Friends of the Earth and the Soil Association have crisscrossed the globe, visiting the Falklands, Japan, Africa and Brazil.' The ST's environment editor points out, 'All are running high-profile campaigns to persuade people to change their lifestyles and cut emissions of carbon dioxide.'

"The article identifies a number of well-known examples. They included Bob Napier, chief executive of WWF, who through jetting to various destinations in Asia, the Americas and Europe helped generate more than 11 tons of carbon dioxide (CO2) last year."

In trouble

Worried California Democrats said Sunday that Phil Angelides failed to achieve the breakthrough he needed in the sole gubernatorial debate and expressed fear that his campaign's trajectory threatened others on the statewide ticket, the Los Angeles Times reports.

Fellow Democrat John Garamendi, in a tight race for lieutenant governor against Republican state Sen. Tom McClintock, has started to distance himself from Mr. Angelides. Mr. Garamendi said in a television interview that aired Sunday that he disagreed with an Angelides plan to raise taxes on corporations and the well-to-do.

"I don't think it's necessary," the insurance commissioner said on KNBC's "News Conference."

Though few thought Mr. Angelides did poorly in the debate, there was wide agreement that Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, a Republican, benefited the most from Saturday night's allotted 55-minute session, largely because nothing occurred to change the essential dynamic of the race.

Mr. Angelides, the state treasurer, entered the evening desperately needing to redefine a contest that by all measures -- polling, fundraising, party morale -- was going badly for him.

Turner's doubts

Former media mogul Ted Turner says he has a hard time deciding whether he is for or against the war on terrorism.

"There are a lot of things about this war that disturb me, and one of them is the attitude that was well-expressed by our president. He said it very clearly; he said, either you're with us or you're against us. And I had a problem with that because I really hadn't made my mind up yet," Mr. Turner said yesterday at the National Press Club.

"I mean, what if you haven't made your mind up? What if you're thinking about it, doing some studying, doing some reading? Because it's an important decision on whether to go to war or not to go to war. I mean, you're either with us or against us -- that's pretty black and white."

Blanco's plan

Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco, a Democrat, proposed a $1 billion plan yesterday to ease the post-hurricane insurance burden on Louisiana homeowners by sending them refund checks to cover recent rate increases.

Mrs. Blanco's plan requires legislative approval and a change in the state constitution, in part because some of the money would be raised by selling off what remains of Louisiana's share of a 1998 nationwide tobacco settlement.

The plan calls for the state to essentially refund the rate increases, averaging 15 percent, that private insurance companies imposed on Louisiana's 1 million policyholders after Hurricanes Katrina and Rita, the Associated Press reports.

Under Mrs. Blanco's plan, homeowners would be sent checks next year. A homeowner who pays $1,000 per year for property insurance would receive $100 to $150.

"We need insurance-rate relief, and we need it now," Mrs. Blanco said.

No Cabinet Member Left Behind In 'Jeopardy!' Challenge For Charity (USAT)

By Greg Toppo, Usa Today

USA Today, October 9, 2006

I'll take "Cabinet Members on Quiz Shows" for $200, Alex.

DOJ_NMG_0076795

This U.S. Education secretary on Sunday became the first sitting Cabinet member to buzz in on an episode of Jeopardy!, taping a one-game appearance for charity.

Who is Margaret Spellings?

Spellings, 48, a former lobbyist and longtime education adviser to President Bush, is sworn to secrecy about how well she did — as are all contestants on the long-running syndicated game show, hosted by Alex Trebek.

She did say after the taping in New York: "I held my own … it wasn't a wipeout." The episode of Celebrity Jeopardy! on which she appears will air next month on ABC.

The Education secretary, who oversees the schooling of nearly 77 million U.S. students, went up against Hill Harper of CSI: NY, and actor/screenwriter Michael McKean, best known for his performances in the ensemble comedies This Is Spinal Tap, A Mighty Wind and Best in Show.

Unlike contestants on typical Jeopardy! episodes, celebrity contestants appear only once per tournament, and charities receive their winnings. Those charities selected by the runners-up receive $25,000 (or more if the players earn more); the winner's charity gets at least $50,000. Spellings' beneficiary: ProLiteracy Worldwide.

The invitation came after Spellings, in a May 2005 New York Times Magazine interview, said she was "a big Jeopardy! fan. Love it!" She added that she was annoyed that former Environmental Protection Agency administrator Christine Todd Whitman and former White House spokesman Ari Fleischer had appeared in a Power Players edition of the show.

A quiz show may be a walk in the park for Spellings, who, alongside the president, first lady Laura Bush and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, will preside Tuesday over a summit on school safety.

It takes place after three deadly school shootings in the past few weeks. And next year, Spellings gears up for congressional hearings on both the Higher Education Act and No Child Left Behind, Bush's signature elementary and secondary education law.

No inside information was available about Spellings' game show debut. Unlike in Washington, leaks are frowned upon in the Trebek administration.

Asked repeatedly for details about the taping, executive producer Harry Friedman on Sunday finally said, "I can tell you she did fine and I can tell you … no, I really have to stop there."

Added Spellings: "I'm glad I did it. … Now I need to get back to business."

OMB Paper Aims To Clear Up Bush's Management Agenda (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, October 9, 2006

As federal employees understand all too well, it's sometimes hard to sort out myth and fact in Washington.

Last week, the White House budget office posted a paper on one of the Bush administration's Web sites (http://www.results.gov) that, from its perspective, tried to set the record straight on the president's management agenda for the government.

That agenda has been controversial since it began five years ago -- in part because it promotes contracting out federal work and more rigorous approaches to measuring the performance of employees and programs. It's safe to predict that a number of the "facts" in this new paper will be disputed by federal unions and in some quarters of Congress.

Federal employees also will bring their workplace experiences to bear when assessing the Office of Management and Budget's paper, which pulls together the administration's explanations on contentious sections of the agenda. Among the paper's points:

Â· Changes to the federal personnel systems are not intended to cut payroll expenses. "The amount of money spent overall on raises will not change, and employee benefits will not change," according to the paper. "If an employee is a good performer, he or she will attain higher pay levels faster."

Â· Additional money has been proposed for training and implementation of new personnel systems. (The paper does not stipulate how much, but officials said two departments -- Defense and Homeland Security -- plan to spend several million dollars.)

Â· Projected savings from job competitions between federal employees and contractors, often in dispute, will be tracked and verified. "Agencies are establishing internal processes to independently validate results from completed competitions," according to the paper.

Â· Program assessment ratings, conducted by the OMB, are not used to eliminate federal programs that are out of favor with the administration. Ineffective programs, the paper noted, "may well need more money."

Asked if the paper had been posted with an eye to the November congressional elections, Robert Shea at the OMB said no. The paper had been in the works for some time, said Shea, who serves as counselor to Clay Johnson III , deputy director for management at the OMB.

The management agenda was drawn up shortly after President Bush took office, when administration officials assumed they could count on widespread support in Congress. But a series of events, including questions about the government's sluggish response to Hurricane Katrina, have slowed the administration's ability to overhaul key systems.

Federal unions and the OMB have battled annually over outsourcing, with Congress sometimes supporting unions. A pending House appropriations bill would block some funding for the OMB program assessment ratings. Federal court rulings have blocked personnel system changes that would sharply limit union rights.

Johnson and OMB Director Rob Portman , speaking at a recent luncheon sponsored by the IBM Center for the Business of Government, said that they plan to pick up their efforts to sell Congress on the president's management agenda.

"One of the reasons we are focused on this, and Clay and I are working a little bit more deliberately with Congress and trying to institutionalize more of this, is that we know these committees, some of the staff, some of the members, are going to outlive this administration," Portman said.Buying and Spending

In responding to the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, the government has increasingly relied on contractors for support and solutions, the Government Accountability Office reported Friday.

From 2001 through 2005, federal acquisition spending increased more than 65 percent, to $388 billion in 2005, the GAO said.

But the government's acquisition workforce has remained steady, at about 106,000 employees. "Many have raised concerns that the increased workload has stretched this workforce to its limit," the GAO said.

The surge in spending also has renewed worries about contract abuse and mismanagement, and Charles Peters , the legendary editor of the Washington Monthly, has kicked off a debate on contracting issues at http://www.understandinggovernment.org . The Web site provides federal employees with a forum where they may remain anonymous.

Federal employees interested in government spending also might want to check out http://www.fedspending.org , sponsored by OMB Watch, an advocacy group founded in 1983 to promote increased government accountability. That site, which will contain data on $12 trillion in spending from 2000 to 2005, launches tomorrow.

Dr. Mark McClellan (CSM)

By David Cook

The Christian Science Monitor, October 10, 2006

Dr. Mark McClellan, who will step down Saturday as administrator of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, met with reporters at a Monitor-sponsored breakfast on Friday.

As head of an organization that dispenses some $610 billion in healthcare payments, Dr. McClellan's vision and management savvy have gotten positive reviews from such dissimilar editorial pages as The New York Times and The Wall Street Journal.

The questioning began with the financial challenges an aging population poses for the healthcare system in general, and Medicare in particular.

McClellan said, "I want to distinguish steps to make our healthcare system work better at the lowest possible cost for aging Americans, and steps to make ... our Medicare and Medicaid sustainable. The aging of the baby boom is putting big pressure on both."

Turning first to the healthcare system as a whole, McClellan said, "the best thing that we can do is to take further steps to improve the efficiency in the way that it works, of getting more for the dollars that we spend. Steps like paying more for value, shifting benefits so that they are up to date and stay up to date, getting patients more involved because care is increasingly about prevention ... all of those steps can help us get the overall cost of care down...."

There is substantial waste in the healthcare system that can be eliminated, McClellan said. "Because of medical errors, misuse of treatments, overuse and underuse, by many estimates up to 30 percent or more of our healthcare spending is going for the wrong thing. We need to be making much more progress on getting that right."

McClellan, the older brother of former White House press secretary Scott McClellan, then turned to steps that could put the Medicare program on a sounder footing for the future. "Anything we do to avoid unnecessary spending, to get overall costs down, is going to help with sustainability," he said.

But McClellan said he favored "reduced subsidy levels" from Medicare "for wealthier Americans."

"I do think we need to continue to take a close look at what Medicare can support for the long term. In 2007 we are implementing an income-related premium in Medicare. What that means is that the wealthiest beneficiaries will still get a significant subsidy for their Medicare benefits. The overall Medicare subsidy next year is going to be worth more than $7,000 a person, and even the wealthiest beneficiaries will continue to get most of that subsidy. But steps toward having people with the most means use their own savings and their own resources to pay for part of their care, while keeping the whole Medicare program up to date, making sure it is available and providing effective coverage for everyone, can be a very important step toward making the program sustainable," he said.

The challenge of making Medicare sustainable was a key part of a speech last week by Federal Reserve Board Chairman Ben S. Bernanke. The Fed chairman stressed the country's need to boost saving to pay for the effects of an aging population. He noted that Medicare's cost is projected to rise from 3 percent of gross domestic product (GDP) today to 9 percent in 2050. That is more than the country now spends on both Social Security and Medicare.

Bernanke said the choices for dealing with the financial costs of an aging population are higher taxes, less non-entitlement spending, a reduction in outlays for government programs, a sharply higher budget deficit, or some mix of all these.

McClellan cited the recently enacted Medicare prescription drug benefit as an example of the gains that can come from competition and from consumers making frugal choices.

"The average costs that the [providers] say they need for 2007, or their bids for providing the drug coverage, turned out to be about 10 percent lower on average than had been the case for 2006. So drug costs to taxpayers will be on average about 10 percent lower in 2007 than in 2006," McClellan said.

"Another way to look at it is that the bids the plans made for 2007 are about one third lower than had been predicted a little bit over a year ago in the middle of 2005 because of ... very strong and aggressive competition and people choosing low-cost plans," McClellan said. He noted that, "something like 75 percent plus of our beneficiaries chose plans which cost less than the average."

McClellan brings a strong academic background to his work. He earned his bachelor's degree from the University of Texas, his master's degree from Harvard University, his medical degree from Harvard-MIT Division of Health Sciences and Technology, and his PhD from Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

Not surprisingly, McClellan is optimistic about the role medicine will play in the country's future. "If you look ahead in the 21st century, this really should be what many experts have called and the economists have called the biomedical century. Healthcare and biotechnology and innovation in medicine are areas where the United States can lead the way for the world in innovation, can lead the way for the world in helping people live much longer and much better lives," he said.

Defense Managers Give New Personnel System A Good Grade (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, October 10, 2006

The Pentagon has rolled out the first phase of a new pay and personnel system to a dozen agencies in the Defense Department, and Donna Vaughn , a budget officer at Fort Belvoir, likes what she sees.

A year ago, she found it difficult to recruit employees for her staff at the Defense Threat Reduction Agency and had lost younger employees to consulting firms and contractors that paid more. But the new personnel system, which gives managers more discretion to set starting salaries, has made her office more attractive and more competitive in the job market, she said.

"We have been recruiting in the last six to nine months, and the quality of the individuals we are getting is much higher than a year ago because they are willing to apply to an agency that is pay banding," Vaughn said.

As part of its move to the new National Security Personnel System, Vaughn's agency adopted pay bands -- typically three broad salary scales for most occupations -- and tossed out the 15-grade, 10-step General Schedule, the decades-old system used across the government.

The shift to the NSPS, however, is about more than the mechanics of setting salaries.

The new system has emerged as the Bush administration's most promising effort to overhaul how civil service employees are paid, promoted and held accountable for their work. Rather than reward an employee's length of service, a feature of the General Schedule, the NSPS will reward superior job performance, according to Defense Department officials.

The NSPS calls on supervisors and employees to link their work to their agency's mission. At the DTRA, the goal is to safeguard the country from weapons of mass destruction. Employees and supervisors write up job objectives tied to the strategic plan of their agency, and employees are evaluated on how well they meet those objectives. The evaluations are turned into job ratings used to determine pay raises and bonuses.

Shari Durand , in charge of personnel policies and business-related activities at the DTRA, said the NSPS will help employees "get even more focused on specific outcomes. In the past, there wasn't a disciplined process to make that happen."

The first phase of the NSPS began in late April and covers 11,000 civil service employees in the Defense Department. The second wave of conversions, involving more than 66,000 employees, began this month and runs through January. Over time, the Pentagon hopes to move about 700,000 employees into the NSPS.

The new system has created some anxiety in the Defense workforce. The American Federation of Government Employees and other unions have questioned whether performance-based pay can be administered fairly and whether Congress will provide adequate funding for the NSPS.

The unions filed suit to stop implementation of some parts of the NSPS, including a provision that would limit contract negotiations, and won a court injunction. The Pentagon has filed an appeal and is converting only non-union employees to the NSPS until labor-management issues are clarified.

Like other agencies in the first wave, the DTRA held a practice run to help supervisors and employees understand the personnel system.

At the start of the dry run, supervisors and employees spent time together defining job objectives and expectations, Durand said. At the end, employees received information showing how they stacked up against co-workers for the rating cycle, she said.

"The mock has produced, I think, more realistic evaluations of employees and you see a better equity across the board," Durand said. "Dollar-wise for some folks, there could be a significant increase for them from what they got under the GS system."

The switch to a new system also has required several hours of training for supervisors and employees.

Mirna Flowers , a management analyst and aide to Vaughn, said the training was "overwhelming," adding that "I have to pull out my little reference book to make sense of it." She continued: "Just a lot of new language and terminology that we all have to get used to."

Still, Flowers called the NSPS "a good tool" and predicted that poor-performing employees will be held more accountable under the NSPS. "As harsh as it may sound, you have seen people get pay increases for just being in the system," she said. "And I think this system is going to allow us to be able to separate the performers from the non-performers."

An Inspector General? (WP)

The Washington Post, October 9, 2006

Rep. James Sensenbrenner's proposal to create a watchdog for the judiciary is a bad idea come too soon.

BEFORE LEAVING town for recess, the House Judiciary Committee reported out a bill to create an inspector general for the federal judiciary. The bill, given the nod in a 20 to 6 bipartisan vote, is both premature and ill-conceived.

Committee Chairman F. James Sensenbrenner Jr. (R-Wis.) is not wrong in believing that the system for investigating misconduct allegations against federal judges needs work. Just the other day the judiciary itself acknowledged as much; a commission led by Justice Stephen G. Breyer examined the recent history of judicial self-policing and found that the judiciary had mishandled a large percentage of high-profile misconduct cases. The Breyer commission made a series of recommendations for improving the management and investigation of such matters.

In addition, the administrative arm of the courts mandated the use of computer software to cross-check a judge's financial holdings to flag conflicts of interest. And it imposed new disclosure rules on judicial attendance at privately funded educational seminars. While we continue to think that the judiciary needs to do more, it makes no sense to create an institutional mechanism for investigating judicial misconduct before knowing how much of the problem these recommendations will fix.

This is particularly true because an inspector general is likely to be the wrong mechanism for the judiciary in any event. Under Mr. Sensenbrenner's proposal, the office would investigate "waste, fraud and abuse" -- though the judiciary has little of these. It would also look into misconduct charges against judges of lower federal courts and report to Congress on them. It would have the power to subpoena documents and testimony in conducting these probes. To avoid running afoul of the constitutional separation of powers, however, the inspector general would be removable from office by the chief justice. It could not investigate the merits of a judge's decision or initiate an investigation before the judiciary's normal misconduct procedures had run their course. The result would be an office at once intrusive and too weak to be of much use, more likely to impinge on the independence of the judiciary than ferret out misuse of funds or uncover misdeeds.

An institution that could serve to harass judges who issue politically unpopular opinions with subpoenas for document production and testimony would be problematic under any circumstances. Mr. Sensenbrenner's habit of using his committee's powers to investigate federal judges -- some of whom merely acted in ways he did not like -- creates a particularly troubling context. While the judiciary ought to take bolder steps to get its house in order, no pattern of judicial conduct justifies this experiment.

Good New Rules For Judges (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, October 9, 2006

Measures will increase impartiality and stave off congressional intrusion.

IN A VARIATION ON THE BIBLICAL exhortation "Physician, heal thyself," critics of ethical lapses in the federal judiciary have long been saying, "Judges, judge yourselves." The Judicial Conference of the United States has done just that with welcome new rules to raise ethical standards and make it easier for citizens to monitor judges' compliance with them.

Useful in themselves, the initiatives also should discourage critics of the federal judiciary in Congress from encroaching further on the independence of a co-equal branch of government that often antagonizes lawmakers with its rulings.

The first initiative is designed to make it harder for judges to inadvertently sit on cases in which their impartiality might be questioned. The conference will require federal courts to use computer software that sifts through cases in search of overlap between the parties and judges' financial holdings.

The second initiative addresses a malodorous practice in which federal judges attend seminars — some of them funded indirectly by corporate interests — at which they have the opportunity not only to bone up on trends in law and economics but also to swim, play golf, ride horses and otherwise frolic with captains of industries who have a lot at stake before courts. The Community Rights Counsel, an environmental watchdog group, has documented hundreds of such "judicial junkets."

New rules announced by the Judicial Conference will not do away with judges' participation in educational programs but will impose new disclosure requirements. Except for those offered by bar or judicial organizations, seminars that reimburse judges for more than $305 in expenses (greens fees included, presumably) must disclose sources of financial support. Information about which judges participated in which events will be available on the Internet.

Judges who take part in these programs are adamant that they aren't swayed in their rulings by the hosts' hospitality. But what matters is how the public might perceive the preferential access that flows from these junkets and the motivation — presumably not just charity — of those footing the bill.

Welcome as they are in themselves, the new rules should also temper a movement in Congress to create an inspector general for the judiciary, an innovation that would needlessly entangle the legislative branch in the supervision of judges. It's easier for the judiciary to fend off encroachments from other branches when it's willing to judge — and heal — itself.

Fed Official Sees Easing Inflation, But Concerns About Prices Remain (WSJ)

By Michael S. Derby

NEW YORK -- Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco President Janet Yellen said Monday that while she remains concerned about the current level of inflation, she believes the present stance of monetary policy appears well suited to bring those pressures back in line over time.

"I do want to see inflation move down, but I believe policy may now be well-positioned to foster exactly such an outcome while also giving due consideration to the risks to economic activity," Ms. Yellen said in comments prepared for delivery before the California Independent Bankers 16th Annual Convention in Laguna Beach, Calif.

She noted that "monetary policy makers again are doing a balancing act, seeking the best way to temper inflationary pressures while not exposing the business cycle expansion to undue risk." And against those risks, "holding the stance of policy steady for a time makes sense to me," especially since "we appear to be within range of the moderately restrictive policy," she said.

Ms. Yellen is currently a voting member of the interest rate-setting Federal Open Market Committee. Economists and financial markets widely expect the Fed to hold what is currently a 5.25% overnight target rate steady through the remainder of the year, although markets generally believe the economy is poised to weaken enough for the Fed to start easing rates next year.

Ms. Yellen, who has been a frequent speaker on the economic outlook over recent weeks, offered views in her speech that were consistent with her past statements. Ms. Yellen's address Monday wasn't open to the press.

"Core consumer inflation has been uncomfortably high recently," she said. "I believe it is critical that inflation trend in a downward direction over the medium term" and "my expectation is that this is the most likely outcome," she said.

Ms. Yellen did acknowledge that she is "somewhat encouraged" by recent evidence of slowing price pressures. That said, "I am keenly aware that this pattern has yet to show up in the data on any sort of a sustained basis," she said.

And in a world where the outlook for price pressures is "highly uncertain," Ms. Yellen said that "until we actually see inflation begin to slow down, I will be focused on the upside risks in the outlook." Still, the official pointed to "well anchored" inflation expectations as a reason to be optimistic.

Ms. Yellen said that the Fed decided to hold rates steady in August in large part because of rising evidence that past rate increases were beginning to slow the economy. "Since then, there have been further signs of slowing," which allowed the Fed to again keep rates steady when it met in late September.

"The data we've been seeing in recent months point to a noticeable slowdown for this half of the year, with growth running at only a modest pace and clearly below the rate that is sustainable in the long run," Ms. Yellen said. Supporting the economy are a number of factors on the business side of the equation, while headwinds include energy prices and the cumulative impact of past interest-rate incresases, she said.

Ms. Yellen added to the list of factors weighing down growth the housing sector, where the pace of the slowdown there has been "a little surprising." She said "we have already seen that the pace of house-price appreciation has clearly moderated, and there are signs that it may continue." This will likely weigh on the consumer sector, Ms. Yellen said, as she warned that banks should be particularly wary of the impact of this shift on their industry.

Ms. Yellen also said "it has been something of a relief to see that oil prices have receded quite a bit in recent months," and if they stabilize, "the restraint we've felt this year should evaporate over 2007" and "would actually contribute to a pickup in growth next year."

Dow, Nasdaq Shrug Off North Korea, While Dollar Increases On The Yen (WSJ)

By Peter A. McKay

The Wall Street Journal, October 10, 2006

The U.S. stock market quickly learned to stop worrying about the nuclear bomb that North Korea said it tested, as major indexes edged higher to end a seesaw day of trading.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average gained 7.60 points, or 0.1%, to end at 11857.81, up 11% on the year, just shy of its recent record.

The modest rally represented a comeback from an initial move lower yesterday morning, prompted by North Korea's announcement, analysts said. The blue-chip Dow was off nearly 37 points at its intraday low around 10:30 a.m. EDT.

Other indicators also eked out small gains in light trading due to the observance of Columbus Day in the U.S. (The bond market was closed entirely.) The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 0.1%, or 1.08 points, to 1350.66, up 8.2% on the year. And the Nasdaq Composite Index rose 0.5%, or 11.78 points, to 2311.77, up 4.8% on the year.

Reacting to its neighbor's reported nuclear test, South Korea stocks dropped. The benchmark Kospi stock index tumbled 2.4%, or 32.60, to 1319.40, and is now off 4.4% on the year.

The dollar rallied on the yen, as the nuclear test added to pressures on the Japanese currency. The Japanese stock market was closed.

Robert E. Weissenstein, managing director at Credit Suisse Securities LLC, said that geopolitical events -- even dire ones -- have had decreasing influence on U.S. shares lately. He likened yesterday's reaction to the North Korea news to the market's relatively subdued moves following last year's transit bombings in London and this summer's conflict between Israel and Hezbollah.

"Investors' focus is on, 'What direction is economic growth headed?' " said Mr. Weissenstein. "At the same time, the market is growing less reactive to some of the other event-driven 'noise' that's out there."

He added that stocks had one less catalyst to generate significant moves yesterday, with the bond market closed. As trading resumes today, the 10-year Treasury yield stands at 4.7%.

In recent weeks, many investing pros have commented on the interplay -- and apparent disagreement -- between the bond and stock markets. Bond prices have generally been low, a possible sign that investors are worried about recession, according to some analysts' reading of the market.

By contrast, the Dow rallied last week to records, and stock investors generally remain confident that the economy is vibrant enough to sustain a strong run of corporate profits.

That theory will be put to a test today when the aluminum maker Alcoa, one of the Dow's 30 component stocks, releases third-quarter earnings after the market close. The company's profit announcement traditionally kicks off the earnings season, with a flurry of companies following suit.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks rose; bonds were closed. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 1.98 billion shares, as 1,976 issues rose and 1,275 fell.

The dollar was mixed. Against the Japanese currency, the dollar rose to 119.12 yen, compared with 119.01. The euro rose against the dollar to $1.2601, compared with $1.2595.

Small Businesses Again Gain Ground In Overall U.S. Employment (USAT)

By Jim Hopkins, Usa Today

USA Today, October 9, 2006

Trend may mean more employees will lack insurance as a result

SAN FRANCISCO — Reversing a long-term trend, small businesses are taking a growing share of U.S. employment, with possibly negative consequences for health care coverage of millions of workers.

New government data show that small firms employed 50.9% of private-sector workers in 2004, up from 50.7% in 2003. It was the third-consecutive year of small firms gaining, and followed nearly uninterrupted annual increases by big employers since 1988, the Small Business Administration data show.

As more Americans work for small firms, however, they are less likely to get medical coverage and other benefits such as retirement plans, because small firms are less likely to offer those benefits.

For example, 60% of companies with three to 199 workers offered health benefits this year vs. 98% of those with 200 or more workers, the Kaiser Family Foundation said last month .

Driving the employment trend:

•Shifting cycles. Big companies — defined by the SBA as those with 500 or more employees — are more likely than small businesses to shed workers during recessions and slow-growth economies, says Mark Zandi, chief economist at Moody's Economy.com.

"Layoff announcements are large and numerous," Zandi says, citing the period after 2001, when a short recession spurred many corporations to slash payrolls.

•Industry mix. Big corporations are more likely to be in manufacturing, a sector ripe for replacing workers with automation through investments in technology.

Small companies are often in service industries such as consulting and health care, fields that require workers rather than machinery, says Brian Headd, SBA's head of research.

In Omaha, Medical Solutions nearly doubled employment this year, to 250 workers, as more hospitals hired its registered nurses and other health care professionals. Started in 1997, the company now has contracts with 350 hospitals in 46 states, President Scott Anderson says.

•Outsourcing. As big companies downsize, they hand work to smaller outfits such as Total Asset Services in Tulsa. It installs voice and data cables, plus other equipment for big companies such as Capital One that are opening call centers in the Midwest, owner Sharon Marrs says.

The outlook for further shifts in employment is mixed. Zandi says big corporations may have taken the lead since 2004 as the economy started growing again after the recession.

Still, planned job cuts, especially in the automotive industry, soared 54%, to 100,315, last month from August, outplacement firm Challenger Gray & Christmas said last week.

Also, CEOs of Fortune 500 companies have grown more pessimistic about hiring, according to the Business Roundtable's most recent quarterly survey.

In that trade group survey, published last month, 32% of CEOs said they expected U.S. employment would be higher in the next six months, down from 41% in the previous survey.

The Worker Rally (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 9, 2006

The Labor Department released its September jobs report on Friday, and some wags are calling it the "whoops" report. The "whoops" is a reference to the upward revision of 810,000 previously undetected jobs that Labor now says were created in the U.S. economy in the 12 months through March 2006.

So instead of 5.8 million new jobs over the past three years, the U.S. economy has created 6.6 million. That's a lot more than a rounding error, more than the number of workers in the entire state of New Hampshire. What's going on here?

Our hypothesis has been that, due to the changing nature of the U.S. economy, the Labor Department's business establishment survey has been undercounting job creation from small businesses and self-employed entrepreneurs. That job growth has been better captured in Labor's companion household survey, which reported 271,000 new jobs in September after 250,000 new jobs in August, and a very healthy total of 2.54 million new jobs in the past year.

The household survey is what is used to determine the unemployment rate, which fell in September to 4.6%, the lowest level in five years. The establishment survey, meanwhile, is used to announce the monthly "new jobs" numbers. Every year the

Labor Department revises its job estimates from the previous year, in essence reconciling the figures from the two surveys, and the missing 810,000 jobs was the result through March 2006.

Getting out of the statistical weeds, the news here is that the U.S. has a very tight labor market -- which is now translating into significant wage gains. Over the past 12 months wages have climbed by 4%, which is the biggest gain since 2001 and which economist Brian Wesbury points out is higher than the 3.3% average annual wage growth of the last 25 years.

Most of the media has ignored all this and instead focused on the disappointing 51,000 "new jobs" number from the establishment survey for September. But even in that survey, the jobs number for August was revised upward by 62,000 and the U.S. jobs machine continues to roll out an average of about 150,000 additional hires each month. Even the loss of residential construction jobs in September, due to the housing market slowdown, was nearly matched by payroll gains in commercial construction.

This boom in employment started in August of 2003, roughly coincident with the economy's growth acceleration in the wake of the Bush Administration's 2003 tax cuts on dividends, capital gains and in the top marginal income rate on the highest earners. Yet on the same day that the Labor Department discovered 810,000 new jobs, Nancy Pelosi promised that if she becomes Madam Speaker next year, within 100 hours of taking the gavel the House will vote to repeal those tax cuts and raise the minimum wage. Never underestimate the ways that Washington politicians can do economic harm.

As Price Slips, OPEC Moves Toward Production Cuts (NYT)

By Jad Mouawad

The New York Times, October 10, 2006

A consensus among OPEC members began to form over the weekend about cuts in oil production to help stem the recent decline in price, but the group's members have not yet agreed on how to share the reduced output.

While more of OPEC's members have lined up behind a proposal to pare the group's formal ceiling by one million barrels a day, significant hurdles remain before the cuts can be put in place. It would be the first time OPEC had cut its quotas in two years.

OPEC, which accounts for about 40 percent of the world's oil exports, may call an emergency meeting later this month to hammer out the deal, according to the oil ministers from Iran and Algeria. Nigeria, which holds the presidency this year, did not rule out an emergency meeting ahead of OPEC's next scheduled gathering on Dec. 14 in the Nigerian capital, Abuja.

The Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries has not formally reduced its output ceiling since the second quarter of 2004, and any talk of how to divide the lower production may lead to acrimonious negotiations as countries fight for their market share.

But concerns over slumping prices may force OPEC to act.

Crude oil futures in New York are down 24 percent since touching a record trading price of $78.40 a barrel in mid-July. Last week, even as OPEC mulled reducing its output, prices fell 5 percent as traders doubted the cartel's resolve. Oil closed at $59.76 a barrel on Friday, near its lowest levels in seven months.

In recent days, Edmund Daukoru, OPEC's president and Nigeria's oil minister, has been making calls to all of the group's representatives to find a way to stem the slide and turn market sentiment around.

"I think there is more or less consensus for one million barrels a day," Mr. Daukoru told Reuters yesterday. He indicated that the cut would be made from OPEC's current quota of 28 million barrels a day.

Excluding Iraq, which does not have a production quota, OPEC produces about 27.5 million barrels a day, slightly less than its formal output ceiling.

Saudi Arabia, OPEC's most influential member, has not made any public comment in recent days, but is understood to back a production cut if other members reach a consensus to do so. The oil-rich kingdom has already pared its output to prop up prices.

In Algeria, the oil minister described the recent drop in oil prices as serious and warned that prices might fall another $25 if nothing was done. Chakib Khelil, the minister, told reporters there was agreement among the member countries to meet and decide on production cuts to face the "new market situation."

"What is important is that the market find the OPEC position credible," he said. "That is why it is necessary to have a meeting to make a decision on the cut and to act on it."

As Oil Ebbs (WP)

The nation still needs a sane energy policy.

THE DECLINE in the price of oil from its July peak of $78 per barrel has prompted relieved sighs among policymakers. Just a few months ago there were fears that expensive oil could simultaneously slow growth and stoke inflation, resulting in the vexatious problem known as stagflation. Today, cheaper fuel is rescuing consumers from at least part of the impact of falling home prices. Oil at around $60 per barrel is one reason the Dow Jones industrial average recently broke its record.

The relief should not distract from the central policy fact about oil, which is that government must do more to discourage consumption. The past year or so has vividly demonstrated the connection between surging oil demand and high prices on the one hand and noxious political trends on the other. High energy prices pumped money into the coffers of oil exporters such as Venezuela, Iran and Russia, emboldening their leaders to challenge the interests and values of the rich oil-importing democracies. Back in the 1990s, Russia depended on Western capital and made progress in embracing Western democratic values. In this decade, by contrast, the boom in oil and natural gas prices has left Russia with a surplus of capital. Freed of any need to humor Western creditors, Russia's leaders have hobbled democratic institutions at home and bullied democratic neighbors abroad.

Deflating petro-bullies is one good reason for the United States to reduce oil consumption and so bring oil prices down. Another reason is to reduce global warming, the evidence for which continues to strengthen. Again, the past year or so has provided a revealing natural experiment: High prices began to curb sales of gas-guzzling sport-utility vehicles and generated a flood of venture capital investment into alternative fuels such as ethanol made out of agricultural waste or grass. But with oil prices now down a bit, the commercial momentum behind energy conservation and alternative fuels may dissipate.

The policy challenge can be summed up this way: How do you keep oil prices low so as to deflate petro-bullies but simultaneously high so as to stimulate alternative fuels? The answer is taxation, which could mean specific levies on gasoline and other products or a more general carbon tax. Taxation would prompt cuts in consumption, which would lower the pretax price at which petro-bullies sell crude oil. Taxation would simultaneously boost the incentive for carmakers and venture capitalists to pursue energy conservation and alternative fuels.

The chief objection to this policy is that a new tax would burden the economy. But any such burden could be offset by reducing some other tax. The secondary objection is that a carbon tax is politically unfeasible. But the defeat of President Bill Clinton's proposal for a BTU tax, commonly cited as proof that a carbon tax is unthinkable, took place more than a decade ago. That was before oil states' extremism emerged as a leading security threat. It was before the evidence on climate change became overwhelming. It's time for the nation's political leaders to get beyond the circular conviction that they can't propose a carbon tax because nobody is proposing a carbon tax. What sort of leadership is that?

Va. Parents Trying To Unadopt Troubled Boy (WP)

Mother Says Caseworkers Failed to Disclose Child's Stormy History

A talkative 9-year-old boy came to Helen Briggs on Valentine's Day 2000. She was a foster mother with years of tough love and scores of troubled kids behind her. But she grew to love this boy. Within the year, she'd talked her husband into adopting him.

Now, six years later, Briggs and her husband, James, a maintenance worker for the city of Alexandria, are taking the highly unusual step of trying to unadopt him.

In 2003, when the boy was 12, he sexually molested a 6-year-old boy and a 2-year-old girl still in diapers. She said it was only then, as she waited outside the courtroom for his sexual battery hearing and caseworkers handed her his psychological profile, that she found out just how damaged the boy had been when he came into her life.

The Washington Post generally does not name the subjects of juvenile court cases.

Briggs said she did not know he had lived in five foster homes since he was 16 months old. Nor that his alcohol- and drug-addicted biological parents had physically abused him, injuring his brain stem and impairing his ability to gauge the passage of time.

He'd been hospitalized seven times in psychiatric institutions and diagnosed as possibly psychotically bipolar. He'd thrown knives, kicked in walls, pulled out all his hair and threatened to kill himself. He'd heard voices telling him to do bad things. His confidential case file shows he most likely was sexually abused.

"I did not know any of that," Briggs said, though Virginia policy states that caseworkers should provide "full, factual information" about a child to adoptive parents. "They just told me he was hyperactive."

She said the state's failure to fully disclose the boy's background is tantamount to fraud.

State child welfare officials could not comment on the case because of confidentiality restrictions. But some caseworkers do not believe Briggs, records show. They think she wants to get out of paying child support.

Still, a Fairfax County court has granted Briggs's petition to relinquish custody. The boy, who has lived in institutions since his conviction, is now officially back in foster care. He asked to be put on suicide watch, records show, when the judge's decision came down.

Briggs hired an attorney to terminate her parental rights. But in Virginia, a child older than 14 must give consent. The boy, now nearing 16, wants Briggs to be his mother forever, according to the voluminous confidential case file and e-mail and phone records Briggs subpoenaed for her lawsuit and provided to The Post.

Briggs sought to file a "wrongful adoption" lawsuit. But under Virginia law, she needed to file within two years of discovering the boy's history. Instead, she wavered.

First, she wanted him home after he had completed his sex offender treatment. But then psychologists deemed him a "sexual predator." That meant Briggs could no longer be a foster parent, which she considers her job. Nor could she allow her three grandchildren in her house. Nor could she keep a little girl she had cared for since the day she was born.

She had to choose.

"You don't want to throw somebody away," she said. "But sometimes you have to."

Her choice has left her with none of the rights and many of the responsibilities of a parent. Caseworkers forbid her from contacting the child because he becomes so violent and angry when she does. Yet state law requires that she pay $427 a month in child support and cover court costs when he appears before judges who now decide what's best for him.

With no legal recourse, she is asking politicians to help her find a way out.

"At first blush, you think, 'What, you're trying to give up your kid? You're a jerk,' " said Virginia Del. David B. Albo (R-Fairfax). "Then you find this lady has received awards for all the foster work she's done. And that she never would have adopted the boy and put other children in danger if she had had the information that was withheld from her."

The technical term for what Briggs is trying to do is "dissolve" the adoption, as if all the bonds of love and hurt could simply vanish into thin air.A Hopeful Start

When Briggs, 57, went to visit the boy for the first time, she said she saw a cute, happy child. She recalls caseworkers telling her that he was in a psychiatric hospital because he was too much of a handful for his great-aunt.

They were nearing desperation before they found Briggs, records show. Nobody wanted him.

A no-nonsense, old-school "professional parent," Briggs figured she could handle him. When the boy acted out, she gave him limits. When he began pulling his hair out, she had it shaved. And when he kept running away from school and her Lorton townhouse, she turned him over to her husband for a whupping, just like she got as a child -- until caseworkers called Child Protective Services.

Nonetheless, caseworkers noted that the boy thrived in her care. "The Briggs foster home is the most constructive and potentially successful placement option that this child has," they wrote.

Briggs hadn't planned on adopting anyone. There was just something special about this child. He was so thankful he had his own room, with the first bed he hadn't had to share in his whole life, she remembers him telling her.

If she got sick, he'd make her soup and rub her feet. At school, if he heard an ambulance, he'd be beside himself until school workers let him call home to make sure Briggs was okay. She understood, she said. So many people had abandoned the child.

As she was signing the adoption papers, she remembers nothing about a background briefing, as required by state policy. Only a caseworker asking skeptically, "Are you sure you want to do this?"

"Yes," she recalled answering. "I love him."

When the boy came to her, he was taking medications for mental illness, depression, delusions, seizures and attention-deficit hyperactivity disorder. He was considered a "therapeutic" foster child, one that comes with extra emotional, medical or behavioral baggage and a heftier monthly subsidy.

Some case workers think she must have known, records show. One wrote that Briggs wasn't being "entirely honest." However, nothing in the case file indicates she was given an oral briefing or a written summary of the boy's background, or access to his records. In some reports, details such as his psychiatric hospitalizations and sexual abuse are left out.

There are also notations of alarm when Briggs began taking the child off his medications, that perhaps she did not understand the gravity of his condition.

Briggs said she thought the medications were for hyperactivity. When the child began complaining of headaches, she took him to a psychiatrist caseworkers recommended. She asked if the boy needed all the pills. The psychiatrist, records show, said no.

"When he told me he was hearing voices, I told him it was just his conscience talking," she said.

Records show that caseworkers are vehemently against Briggs terminating her parental rights. "At least, if his parents win the lottery and die, he will inherit," one wrote in an e-mail. Some think she has rejected the boy because she needs the money she gets from foster children.

"That's a lie," Briggs said angrily.

A religious woman and active in her Sword of Spirit Deliverance Ministry Pentecostal Church, Briggs said being a foster mother is a calling. She's on disability, she explained, so it's one of the few things she can do to supplement her husband's blue-collar wage.

"The system needs to be revised. That's why I'm doing this," she said. "I should have known about the child. Because people get hurt."

And then there is another reason, one that woke up late one recent morning and, yawning, shuffled downstairs in fluffy white slippers with bells on the toes and nestled onto Briggs's ample lap: a little girl of 5, the child of a former foster daughter and Briggs's legal ward.

"I can't take him back," Briggs said, stroking the hair of the child she chose to keep.

Wrongful Adoption

If it is true what Briggs says, that she really didn't know the full extent of the boy's difficult young life, it would not be the first time.

The first "wrongful adoption" lawsuit was won in Ohio in 1986. Parents were told the 16-month-old they adopted was a healthy infant born to a teenage mother. When the child later developed a fatal disease and exhibited mental disorders, the parents discovered he was born to two middle-age mental patients.

Since then, states have enacted a patchwork of laws and written disclosure policies. Some states, such as Texas and Ohio, give adoptive parents access to a child's entire case file. In Maryland, social workers are required to prepare a written background summary and ask adoptive parents to sign it. Virginia's disclosure policy has no written requirement.

"I have seen so many adoptive parents come back and feel so angry and cheated that we didn't tell them about a child. And we did tell them," said Judith Schagrin, a Maryland social worker. "It's just that at the time, they were so hopeful and looking through a lens of love that they couldn't hear what we were saying."

But sometimes, because of the high turnover of case workers, information gets lost, assumptions get made, mistakes happen -- especially if the child is older. Especially if they've bounced around foster care for years. And especially, Schagrin said, if their sad and broken histories might scare away potential foster or adoptive families.

That pressure has intensified since 1997 because of a federal law that rewards states as much as $6,000 for every foster child adopted.

"I have seen caseworkers. They think, 'Oh, the family won't adopt the child if they know everything," Schagrin said.

Most adoptions take, especially for infants. But for children over 12, as many of 25 percent of the adoptions don't. They simply dissolve.Separate Paths

Briggs has seen her adopted son four times since he left her home in 2003 -- three brief visits to his out-of-town institution before she decided to give him up and once in court this summer. The child, by turns angry and despondent, had smashed his hand through glass.

"He feels unloved," a counselor noted in his file. "That he doesn't belong in the world."

Caseworkers came to Fairfax juvenile court to ask a judge to send the boy to a secure facility in another state. Though she had no say in the matter, Briggs came to see him.

After the hearing, she asked him for a hug. "Well, I'm grown up now," she remembers him saying before he gave in.

"Do you miss me?" she remembers asking.

"Yes," he said.

Then she returned home, to her grandchildren, her small ward and the new foster daughter who sleeps in the boy's old room.

House Afire (USNEWS)

By Dan Gilgoff

U.S. News and World Report, October 9, 2006

Like the rest of their race, last week's debate between Connecticut Rep. Chris Shays and Democratic challenger Diane Farrell was supposed to be all about Iraq. Instead, the first question was about what should happen to the House Republican leadership in light of revelations of obscene electronic messages from ex-Rep. Mark Foley to teenage boys working as congressional pages. "This is one more illustration of what has been happening with the existing Republican leadership," said Farrell, who'd called for the resignation of House Speaker Dennis Hastert earlier in the day. "It has been one mistake or one scandal after another." Thrown on the defensive, Shays called Hastert a "very good and decent man" and argued that calls for his resignation were premature, since allegations that Hastert knew of Foley's lewd conduct for years had yet to be proven.

Then it was time to get back to Iraq. But the next questioner, a news anchor from New Haven, asked about the Foley scandal, saying, "I am not sure we have exhausted this topic." By the time the subject of Iraq surfaced, nearly a quarter of the hourlong debate was over.

That's bad news for Shays, and for Republican incumbents across the country who are trying to retain control of Congress in next month's midterm elections. As each day last week brought new questions about how the Republican leadership handled the Foley affair, the political implications came into sharper focus. An Associated Press-Ipsos Poll released late last week found that roughly half of likely voters said corruption and scandals in Congress would be very or extremely important in how they cast their ballots on November 7. The poll also found that voters trusted Democrats over Republicans to combat corruption by a margin of almost 2 to 1. Pollster John Zogby says his internal polls found a precipitous drop-off in Republican support. "When voters make a radical turnaround like this," Zogby says, "it could be the beginning of a free-fall."

"Tidal wave." Hastert stanched the bleeding at least temporarily with a press conference that managed to be both blunt and folksy. "The buck stops here," he vowed, and for the moment he seemed to get the benefit of the doubt (box). The House ethics committee quickly issued dozens of subpoenas for House members and personnel. But Republican concerns about what had already been a nasty election climate only continued to mount along with increasingly repellent disclosures of Foley's behavior toward the pages. "Our one advantage over the Democrats had been money, but just how much money does it take to overcome this tidal wave of media attention?" asked Republican pollster Tony Fabrizio. Coupled with growing voter unease about the U.S. involvement in Iraq, the Foley revelations appear to be accelerating possibly the two most important trends of this election cycle: the growing number of independent voters breaking for Democrats and the swelling ranks of conservatives who appear more inclined to stay home on Election Day than support the GOP. Some analysts said that the House might now be the Democrats' to lose and that the Senate now stands a chance of falling out of Republican control.

A Secret Life (NSWK)

By Evan Thomas, Newsweek

Newsweek, October 9, 2006

Mark Foley's explicit e-mails could bring down the GOP. His story, and the fallout.

In uptight, colorless Washington, Congressman Mark Foley, 52, Republican of Florida, was a bon vivant. He loved parties and making jokes; he did a wicked Bill Clinton imitation; he loved to talk about sex. He had to be a little bit careful, however. A gay man, he might bring a boyfriend to private parties, friends say, but when he appeared on the official cocktail circuit, he went alone or with a woman. He also hid, or tried to hide, his interest in younger men—much younger men, including the teenagers who can be seen scurrying around Capitol Hill toting the mail and taking in, at least in theory, a firsthand civics lesson. The House pages, the 70-or-so high-schoolers who spend up to a year in Washington running errands for congressmen, live in a squat red-brick dormitory at 501 First Street Southeast, less than five blocks from the Capitol. The building once housed Roman Catholic nuns who worked at a nearby hospital. The teenage pages are chaperoned by six staffers and are warned to stay away from drugs and alcohol. Only steps away from the pages' dorm is a bar called Bullfeathers, where lobbyists take Hill staffers to down martinis. Two blocks away is the Cannon House Office Building, where Congressman Foley had his office.

On one night in 2002 or 2003, an allegedly inebriated Foley showed up at the pages' dorm after a 10 p.m. curfew and tried to gain entry, according to an account provided by two congressional sources, who declined to be identified due to the sensitivity of the matter. Foley was turned away by a guard. It is not known if the pages were ever aware that Foley lurked outside their door, but word of the incident reached the House Clerk, who notified Foley's chief of staff, Kirk Fordham.

This was not the first time that Fordham had learned of his boss's behaving, in that modern all-purpose euphemism, "inappropriately." Fordham decided that it was time to go to a higher authority, so he went to see Scott Palmer, chief of staff to the Speaker of the House, Dennis Hastert. That, at least, is what Fordham is prepared to tell investigators, according to a knowledgeable source who requested anonymity in discussing the probe. Palmer has already accused Fordham of dissembling, and Washington is settling in for one of its periodic melodramas of moralizing and prurience.

The secret world of Mark Foley—and the denial and bumbling of the House leaders who possibly did not want to know too much about that world—is beginning to emerge in bits and pieces of lurid detail. What actually happened—from the moment that Hill staffers first became aware of Congressman Foley's unusual interest in teenage congressional pages—is the source of intrigue, finger-pointing, shock, fear and loathing on Capitol Hill and of endless fascination around the country. No wonder: the political fortunes of the Republican Party hang in the balance.

Voters may not understand the legalistic ins-and-outs of campaign-finance scandals or know much about an influence peddler like Jack Abramoff beyond his name. But they can follow the details of a sex scandal, especially one that they can imagine harming their own children. It was not necessary to read Foley's leering (and worse) e-mails and instant messages to former congressional pages—in one, he asks "Do I make you a little horny?"—to be disgusted by an obvious abuse of power and trust. If enough voters express their feelings about the scandal at the polls in November (or by just staying home), the Republicans could lose control of Congress.

It is too early to know exactly why the Republicans failed to heed the warning signs about Foley's interest in the pages. Staffers raised concerns, the Speaker's office was notified and Rep. John Shimkus, head of the House Page Board, was dispatched to caution Foley and warn him away from the pages. But nobody bothered to investigate further—a step that might have uncovered the broader pattern of predatory behavior now evident.

There are plenty of theories about why the leadership did not take the matter more seriously. In the Washington power culture, incumbents are generally protected from the consequences of their own actions. That's especially true in a Congress where one party has ruled both houses for years; the concept of meaningful oversight has been essentially forgotten. And in a party ruled largely by conservatives, and built with the help of evangelicals, many of whom view homosexuality as unnatural and homosexual acts as sinful, leaders may also have had a special reluctance to scrutinize the sexual behavior of their colleagues or their staffs.

Inevitably, Washington was rife with nasty rumors of a "Velvet Mafia" of gay Hill staffers conspiring to protect each other. But Foley's homosexuality should not be the central issue in the scandal. His wrongdoing was to sexually prey on teenagers. Sexual orientation has nothing to do with sexual predation, and to suggest otherwise is to dredge up ugly stereotypes that are factually wrong (according to a 2000 Justice Department study, 97 percent of adults who sexually assault 12- to 17-year-old children are male—and 90 percent of their victims are female). Nonetheless, it is relevant that Foley is both homosexual and a Republican.

A number of top GOP staffers on Capitol Hill are gay and, generally speaking, most do not advertise their sexual orientation. Some staffers may believe that their place at the pinnacle of power could be compromised if their private lives were publicly known. Republican leaders on the Hill may not want to know too much about the sexual orientation of a fellow Republican congressman, like Foley, or even their staffers. They may wish to be in a position to deny any knowledge. If there were any efforts among gay staffers to protect Foley, they may have been motivated by personal considerations, or an effort to protect the GOP's rule on Capitol Hill. "The notion that there's a cabal and they're closing ranks and protecting one another because they're gay is reprehensible," says Brian Bennett, who came out after serving as chief of staff to former congressman Bob Dornan, a fierce right-winger. "People protect each other because they're friends."

Republicans have been tripping over each other for days trying to get their stories straight on who knew what and when. The various explanations have only served to obfuscate. In the end, the Republicans may not be able to escape the irony of the Foley scandal. In 2004, the GOP helped get President George W. Bush re-elected by turning out the base, especially the Christian right, to vote for state bans on gay marriage. In 2006, the GOP may lose control of Congress because it didn't try harder to investigate a gay congressman who was also a sexual predator.

The man at the center of the scandal is, or was, by all accounts an unusually upbeat, buoyant politician. Raised in modest circumstances, Foley, the son of a Marine veteran of Guadalcanal, has been enamored with politics from the time he dropped out of Palm Beach Junior College to start a small restaurant. A moderate Republican, he became a fixture in the glitzy Palm Beach social scene, hobnobbing with the wealthy at places like Donald Trump's Mar-a-Lago estate. Foley was "just easy to like," says Sid Dinerstein, chair of the Palm Beach County Republican Party. "He loved his job. He loved waking up in the morning to find another event to go to."

Foley did not exactly hide his sexual orientation. He was often spotted with his longtime companion, a well-to-do Palm Beach dermatologist, though Dinerstein says the two were careful not to sit together at big charity functions. From time to time, however, Foley had to evade questions. Asked by a local radio host when he first ran for Congress in 1994 "Is it true you're gay?" Foley replied, "I have a girlfriend." He said the woman lived in Miami and spent time in Washington. In 2003, Foley backed out of a bid for the Senate, ostensibly to care for his sick father—but also, his friends suggested, because he did not want to withstand the inevitably increased scrutiny of his sexual orientation.

In Washington, Foley's homosexuality was an open secret. Gays active in Republican politics describe an informal "don't ask, don't tell" rule: gay staffers can be out of the closet, as long as they aren't too public about it. The party leadership apparently welcomed Foley: he raised hundreds of thousands of dollars for GOP campaign coffers. Radical gay groups sometimes try to out closeted GOP congressmen, but Foley believed he had some protection. He could not be accused of hypocrisy because he voted against a constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriage.

Still, Foley was subject to the jeers of at least one openly gay Democratic congressman. Last week Rep. Barney Frank of Massachusetts told the Advocate.com, a gay news site, "Once, at a congressional Christmas party at the White House, my ex-boyfriend Herb went up to Foley, who was with a female date, and said to him, 'Why don't you get a real date?' Foley didn't say anything."

Foley was sexually active in Washington, according to a gay Republican who declined to be identified discussing Foley's private life. Because he had a longtime partner, he told a friend, he preferred to have affairs with men who also had boyfriends. That way, he explained, they both had something to lose. Foley jokingly described this practice as "mutually assured destruction," said this friend.

Foley was looked after, at least to a degree, by Kirk Fordham, who ran Foley's first campaign and came to Washington as his chief of staff. Fordham, who is openly gay, has said he warned Foley not to flirt too openly. If Fordham is to be believed, Foley began showing undue interest in congressional pages as early as 2001. The Clerk of the House, Jeff Trandahl, advised Fordham to warn Foley about his conduct. Fordham, a skilled and ambitious political operative, left Foley's staff after he bowed out of a Senate run in 2003 and moved on, ultimately becoming chief of staff to Rep. Tom Reynolds, the head of the Republican congressional campaign committee.

Foley sent the e-mails that ultimately led to his downfall beginning in July 2005. Foley e-mailed a former page to ask, "How old are you now?" He asked the page what he wanted for his birthday. In a later e-mail, after Hurricane Katrina had hit Louisiana, Foley asked after his safety and to send a picture of himself. The e-mails were very familiar, but not overtly sexually suggestive, though in one e-mail Foley noted that he was on his way to the gym and wrote, "I am just finished riding my bike on a 25-mile journey."

The e-mails "freaked me out," the page told a staffer for his congressman, Louisiana Rep. Rodney Alexander. Foley's request for an "e-mail pic" was "sick sick sick sick sick sick sick sick sick sick sick sick sick," the page told the staffer, scheduler Danielle Savoy. Representative Alexander's staff notified Speaker Hastert's staff, who in turn went to Representative Shimkus, the congressman who runs the Page Board, which acts as a kind of all-purpose den mother to the young pages.

A former Army Ranger, Shimkus is a tall, straight-talking West Pointer. He was shown at least parts of some of the e-mails, which he thought were disturbing, but ambiguous. In the fall of 2005, Shimkus marched over to Foley's office in the Cannon Building. Shimkus had been told by Clerk of the House Trandahl that the page's parents wanted the contact between Foley and their son to be stopped immediately. Fearing a media frenzy, they also wanted the matter to go no further.

Shimkus told Foley, "This is unacceptable. Stay away from the kid and stay away from the pages," according to a Shimkus staffer. Foley looked taken aback, the aide says. Foley said that he was merely acting as a "mentor." "Am I guilty of being too friendly?" Foley asked. "Yes," he answered his own question.

At the time, Shimkus was satisfied with Foley's response. He now refers to Foley as a "slimeball," and regrets he did not push further. He says he was fooled by Foley's performance and felt constrained by the parents' desire for discretion.

The e-mails from Foley to the page did not go away. They began showing up in newsrooms—at the St. Petersburg Times and The Miami Herald in Florida and some Washington news organizations. It is not clear how they got there. (A St. Petersburg Times editor told NEWSWEEK that the paper received the e-mails from a source in Alexander's office. The congressman's office did not return calls.) Journalists at several news organizations have identified the leaker as a "Republican whistle-blower." But it is also true that liberal and gay activist bloggers picked up the scent. While the newspapers did not believe that the e-mails revealed enough evidence of wrongdoing to publish them, the blogs had fewer compunctions. On Sept. 24, a site called stopsexpredators.blogspot.com published scanned images of Foley's e-mails to the pages, and within hours, the widely read liberal blog Daily Kos provided a link to the mystery blogger.

Over at ABC news, veteran investigative reporter Brian Ross had known about the Foley e-mails for some time, but he was distracted by more pressing stories. After the story was already out on the Internet, Ross published portions of the e-mails on his own blog, The Blotter.

The ABC blog seems to have opened the floodgates. Overnight, other former congressional pages began sending Ross much racier instant messages sent out by Foley, suggesting that the congressman had engaged in Internet sex and was angling for trysts. An ABC producer called Foley's office and read his staff some of the messages.

Foley was having lunch at his Capitol Hill town house with his old friend and former aide Kirk Fordham and other campaign advisers when they heard about the ABC inquiry. The congressman had already responded to the earlier, more benign e-mails with a statement brushing them off and accusing his Democratic opponent of smear tactics. On the phone, Foley told a friend, "It's worse. There are new e-mails and they're very graphic." Foley knew he was finished. Fordham walked over to GOP headquarters and shared the information with Reynolds and Hastert, according to a source who was present (and asked for anonymity given the delicacy of the situation). Fordham brought back a draft resignation letter; Foley signed it that evening. Fordham tried to win Foley some cover by offering ABC's Ross an exclusive on Foley's resignation if Ross agreed not to print the seamier messages. But Ross wasn't buying. Foley signed a short resignation letter and was in his car, a BMW, driving south for Florida by that evening.

Saying that he had an alcohol problem, Foley checked into rehab. His lawyer, David Roth, put out a statement that Foley had been abused by a clergyman as a teen—and said his client "unequivocally" denied having sex with a minor. These assertions were greeted with some skepticism, even by Foley's supporters. No one seemed to be able to recall seeing Foley drunk—though it is interesting that Foley was reportedly inebriated when he allegedly showed up outside the pages' dorm on that night three or four years ago. Foley did attend a parochial school, but so far no evidence has emerged that he was abused there. Though the FBI has opened up an investigation into Foley's relations with the pages, it is unlikely he will be prosecuted unless evidence emerges that he tried to lure minors into physical sex, not just e-mail sex.

The questions about Foley's past were accompanied by a furious round of accusations and denials by House Republican leaders. Hastert originally said he first heard about Foley's page problem from staff as the news broke. But House Republican leader John Boehner insisted that he had talked to Hastert himself last spring about Foley's contacts with the page. Republican operatives began predicting that Hastert would have to take the fall and resign. Last week, the Speaker, who has long been viewed as a figurehead installed by former House majority leader Tom DeLay, took "responsibility" for the Foley mess—without admitting that he had done anything wrong. In an attempt to quiet the speculation about his future, Hastert vowed that he would not step down. But the questions about what the GOP leadership knew about Foley—and what Hastert & Co. did or did not do—would not go away.

Behind the scenes, attention increasingly focused on Foley's after-hours visit to the pages' dorm several years ago. If Foley were really behaving that outrageously so long ago, why hadn't more been done to stop him? The answers may start with the testimony of Fordham, the former Foley chief of staff who is now cooperating with federal investigators.

Fordham had long worried about the behavior of his friend and boss. As early as in 2001, Fordham had received disturbing reports of Foley's "inappropriate" behavior toward the congressional pages. According to a knowledgeable source familiar with Fordham's account, who did not wish to be identified discussing such a sensitive matter, Fordham is prepared to tell investigators that he was warned "on two or three occasions" about Foley's "overly friendly" socializing with young male pages.

He was informed by Jeff Trandahl, then the Clerk of the House, who oversees the page program. On one occasion, sometime in 2002 or 2003, Trandahl told Fordham about Foley's nocturnal adventure to the pages' dorm. Trandahl told Fordham that Foley "appeared intoxicated," according to the source who provided Fordham's account to NEWSWEEK.

This incident prompted Fordham to go to Scott Palmer, Hastert's chief of staff, and tell him about Foley's behavior. Fordham called Palmer and told him that he wanted to speak with him privately, the source says. The two men met in a small office on Capitol Hill. (Palmer says the meeting never took place.)

Fordham did not tell Palmer about Foley's attempt to enter the pages' dormitory, but rather that he was generally concerned about his boss's excessive friendliness to the pages, according to the source. Palmer expressed surprise and concern, the source says, and wondered what this could mean to Foley's political future. Why would he endanger his career with such conduct?

Palmer assured Fordham that he would talk to Foley. A day or two later, Fordham called Palmer to ask what happened. Palmer told him that he "dealt with it" by talking to Foley and that he "informed the Speaker," according to the source familiar with Fordham's account. Months later Fordham had an awkward conversation with Foley in which his boss indicated that he had spoken to Palmer.

Last week, as House GOP leaders felt the waves of scandal breaking over their heads, a spokesman for Hastert insisted that Fordham had never warned the Speaker or his top aide, Palmer. "What Fordham said did not happen," said Palmer in a written statement. Trandhahl, who resigned for unknown reasons as Clerk of the House in November 2005, was not returning phone calls. Trandahl, who like Fordham is openly gay, could be an important witness as the House ethics committee begins an inquiry.

Foley's alleged late-night visit to the pages' dorm came up during a fraught conference call for all House Republican congressmen last week, and various Republican leaders were demanding a full investigation. One GOP member, Ginny Brown-Waite of Florida, said in a statement provided to NEWSWEEK that she had "learned" of the incident at the pages' dorm after she initiated her own investigation. One of her staff aides said that Brown-Waite had talked to a House official with direct knowledge of what had happened. Capitol Police were saying last week that they could find no records of Foley's alleged visit to the dorm.

At the White House, aides were straining to sound optimistic. "I think we've stabilized," said one senior Bush aide, operating under the usual White House requirement of anonymity. "Unless there's another circular firing squad or new information comes out." Others were gloomier. In Rep. Ray LaHood's Illinois district, the Foley scandal has been the lead story in the local paper every day for the past week. "We had this game plan of coming home and talking about our accomplishments on border security and the economy, and nobody wants to hear about it," says LaHood. "The only thing I hear from people is Foley ... It's all anybody wants to talk about, and I don't see that changing any time soon." According to the new NEWSWEEK Poll, fully 53 percent of Americans want the Democrats to win control of Capitol Hill next month; just 35 percent want the GOP to retain power. For the first time since 2001, the poll shows, more Americans trust the Democrats than the GOP on moral values.

It's not just the voters who care about "family values" who might be driven away, said Matt Dowd, Bush's long time pollster. The brouhaha on the Hill threatens what Dowd calls "the gut values" relationship between voters and politicians they trust. "Values always determine elections," says Dowd. "Deep gut values, like 'Do I trust someone?'" Several leading party strategists worry that public trust in the House Republican leadership—never exactly ironclad, even among the truest Republicans—could be shredded by disarray in the leadership and doubts about whether they tried hard enough to deal with Foley before he could prey on teenagers.

The Democrats seemed happy to just get out of the way and let the Republicans devour themselves. "The story has plenty of energy on its own," said one Democratic strategist, who asked not to be identified as he crowed. "There's no need for us to draw attention to it." Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi has been strongly demanding an investigation, but she is seen as well positioned to take a public role, since her San Francisco district has a large gay population, and she runs little risk of being branded as insensitive. Republicans are furiously accusing the Democrats of timing the scandal to break just before the election. "This was a professional hit," says Grover Norquist, head of Americans for Tax Reform and a leading GOP activist. No evidence of Democratic Party involvement has turned up, though whether the blogs got any information from party sources is open to question.

There is a real risk that the Foley scandal could spur a vicious campaign to out closeted gay Republicans. Although many gay conservatives make little effort to hide their sexual orientation, they have to put up with a certain amount of disdain, if not outright hostility, from certain quarters. Some GOP lawmakers frowned on Foley's fraternization with younger male staffers. A House GOP aide remembers standing on the House floor with his boss when Foley came over to say hello. Afterward, the aide remembers, his boss turned to him with an air of disdain. "Do you hang around with that guy?" the congressman asked. If the Foley scandal continues its downward spiral, the atmosphere of suspicion will only get worse.

The Steady-Handed Hastert (USNEWS)

U.S. News and World Report, October 9, 2006

To many political observers, last week's drumbeat for Dennis Hastert's resignation as House speaker felt like 1998 all over again-the year that Speaker Newt Gingrich was forced out after the GOP was rocked by the loss of congressional seats in the midterm elections and sex scandals that came swift on its heels. From that chaos emerged Hastert: a farm kid and disheveled former wrestling coach from Illinois without a whiff of excitement to him.

In many ways, Hastert was the anti-Gingrich. He shied away from the spotlight, quieted the noise surrounding the contentious Contract With America, and pursued more personal, behind-the-scenes consensus building that allowed the rank-and-file to shine. "It's remarkable how he's been able to hold the [Republican] coalition together," says a former House aide. "Look at all the votes they won by one or two. That's a testament to his leadership." Critics have accused him of allowing former Rep. Tom DeLay to be his hatchet man while he made friends with a relatively hands-off approach. Whatever the case, the 64-year-old's quiet style has made Hastert the longest-serving Republican speaker.

Low key. But when the Mark Foley sex scandal exploded and put the speaker in the eye of the storm, some wondered whether the pragmatic, no-frills style that vaulted Hastert to power might ultimately prove to be his undoing. "One of the reasons he was elected was because you don't need to be a great communicator when your job is to run a train on time," says a former top GOP aide. "But when you get sucked into a whirlwind like this, a plodding approach is not the way to survive."

Indeed, it seemed as if Hastert had explaining to do. His version of when and what he knew about Foley's behavior seemed to contradict those of other Republicans touched by the scandal. Democrats, meanwhile, blasted House leaders for not sharing concerns about Foley with the Democrat on the House Page Board.

As the fallout from Foley spread, Hastert was slammed by conservatives like Paul Weyrich who called for his resignation. But by week's end, Hastert appeared to have won over some of the doubters. "Any Republican with half a brain realizes they cannot toss [Hastert] over," says a Senate Republican staffer. "They understand if we lose Hastert, that's a guaranteed way to lose the majority. He's remained speaker because he puts the good of the party ahead of himself." Hastert has insisted that he handled the case appropriately based on the information he had. And in private conversations with Republican leaders, he has said he would resign if he felt it would help the GOP. After speaking personally with Hastert, Weyrich recanted his criticism, saying Hastert convinced him that he's telling the truth. In a press conference back home in Batavia, Hastert made clear he had no intention of resigning. But he struck a contrite tone. "The bottom line is ... the buck stops here," he said. President Bush, who has asked the veteran congressman to hold his leadership post through 2008, called to offer his support. Hastert's slow-and-steady approach seemed to have worked again.

The End Of A Revolution (TIME)

By Karen Tumulty

Time, October 16, 2006

Sex, lies and power games are just the latest symptoms of a Republican Party that has strayed from its ideals

Every revolution begins with the power of an idea and ends when clinging to power is the only idea left. The epitaph for the movement that started when Newt Gingrich and his forces rose from the back bench of the House chamber in 1994 may well have been written last week in the same medium that incubated it: talk radio. On conservative commentator Laura Ingraham's show, the longest-serving Republican House Speaker in history explained why he would not resign despite a sex scandal that has produced a hail of questions about his leadership and the failure to stop one of his members from cyberstalking teenage congressional pages. "If I fold up my tent and leave," Dennis Hastert told her, "then where does that leave us? If the Democrats sweep, then we'd have no ability to fight back and get our message out."

That quiet admission may have been the most damning one yet in the unfolding scandal surrounding Florida Congressman Mark Foley: holding on to power has become not just the means but also the end for the onetime reformers who in 1994 unseated a calcified and corrupted Democratic majority. Washington scandals, it seems, have been following a Moore's law of their own, coming at a faster clip every time there is a shift in control. It took 40 years for the House Democrats to exhaust their goodwill. It may take only 12 years for the Republicans to get there.

If you think politicians clinging to power isn't big news, then you may have forgotten the pure zeal of Gingrich's original revolutionaries. They swept into Washington on the single promise that they would change Capitol Hill. And for a time, they did. Vowing to finish what Ronald Reagan had started, they stood firm on the three principles that defined conservatism: fiscal responsibility, national security and moral values. Reagan, who had a few scandals in his day, didn't always follow his own rules. But his doctrine turned out to be a good set of talking points for winning elections in a closely divided country, and the takeover was completed with the inauguration of George W. Bush as President.

But after controlling both houses of Congress and the White House for most of Bush's six years in office, the party has a governing record that has come unmoored from those Grand Old Party ideals. The exquisite political machinery that aces the elections has begun to betray the platform. To win votes back home, lawmakers have been spending taxpayer money like sailors on leave, producing the biggest budget deficits in U.S. history. And the party's approach to national security has taken the country into a war that most Americans now believe was a mistake and that the government's own intelligence experts say has shaped "a new generation of terrorist leaders and operatives."

One of the problems is that after the Republicans got into power, the system began to change them, not just the other way around. Among the first promises the G.O.P. majority broke was the setting of term limits. Their longtime frustrations in the minority didn't necessarily make them any better at reaching across the aisle either. Compromise, that most central of congressional checks and balances, has been largely replaced by a kind of calculated cussedness that has left the G.O.P. isolated and exposed in times of crisis.

The current crisis arrived with a sex scandal that has muddied one of the G.O.P.'s few remaining patches of moral high ground: its defense of family values and personal accountability. Although Hastert and other Republican leaders say they heard last fall about the "overfriendly" approaches of a not-so-secretly-gay Congressman to a 16-year-old former page--both majority leader John Boehner and campaign chairman Tom Reynolds say they brought it up with Hastert last spring--they insist they never imagined anything like the more graphic instant messages that subsequently came to light. Boehner spokesman Kevin Madden said his boss was told only that there had been "contact" between Foley and a page, and that his knowledge of even that much came from a fleeting conversation on the House floor. But shouldn't someone have got chills at learning that a 52-year-old man had sent a teenager a creepy e-mail asking for a "pic of you"? Certainly the page understood what the e-mail meant, which is why he forwarded it in August 2005 to the office of Louisiana Congressman Rodney Alexander, who had sponsored him for the page program and who was alarmed enough to take his concern to Boehner. "This freaked me out," the teenager wrote. "Sick sick sick sick sick sick sick sick sick sick sick sick sick."

The House response was political from the start. Last November, Jeff Trandahl, then clerk of the House, told John Shimkus, the Republican head of the board that oversees the page program, about the less incriminating e-mails. But nobody bothered to inform the board's lone Democrat. Shimkus and Trandahl appear to have done nothing more than give Foley a private warning. When Alexander expanded the circle of those aware of the e-mails the following spring, one of the two people he chose to loop in was Reynolds, head of the National Republican Congressional Committee, whose job is managing the election. Foley wasn't even stripped of his co-chairmanship of the House Caucus on Missing and Exploited Children.

Even after a batch of truly sleazy instant messages was discovered by ABC News, Reynolds' chief of staff Kirk Fordham, who was also a former aide to Foley, tried to solve the political problem by attempting to talk the network out of publishing the worst of the messages. Fordham resigned last week, but he didn't go quietly, the way House leaders had hoped. On his way out, he threw fuel on the political fire by announcing that he had warned Hastert's staff of Foley's "inappropriate behavior" at least three years ago--a charge that Hastert's chief of staff, Scott Palmer, denied.

All this suggests that the Republican leaders were motivated much more by fear of electoral fallout than concern for the young pages in their care. And if they were worried that the revelation would hurt their chances of holding on to the House, they turned out to be right. Before the scandal broke, they were beginning to believe that the clouds were finally clearing for them. Their fabled get-out-the-vote and fund-raising operations were nearing full stride just as gas prices were dropping and the national debate was refocusing on their home-court issue of terrorism.

It seems likely that the party will instead need to reckon with sex and scandal throughout the final weeks of the election. As conservative George F. Will, writing in the Washington Post last week, put it, the Foley affair is "a maraschino cherry atop the Democrats' delectable sundae of Republican miseries." In the latest TIME poll, conducted the week after the news broke, nearly 80% of respondents said they were aware of the scandal, and two-thirds of them were convinced that Republican leaders had tried to cover it up. Among the registered voters who were polled, 54% said they would be more likely to vote for the Democratic candidate for Congress, compared with 39% who favored the Republican--nearly a perfect reversal of the 51%-40% advantage the G.O.P. enjoyed as recently as August. There was even worse news in a poll by the nonpartisan Pew Research Center that showed a precipitous drop in Republican support among frequent churchgoers, one of the most important and loyal elements of the G.O.P. base. There's no indication that they are clamoring to be Democrats, but the risk is that they will simply stay home on Election Day.

One of the victims may turn out to be campaign chairman Reynolds, who suddenly found himself running as many as 8 points behind in his upstate New York House-seat re-election bid, which had appeared fairly safe a week earlier. Hastert's job seems secure for the moment, barring any big new revelations, in part because the House Speaker is not merely a party leader; the role was established under the Constitution. It would be difficult to replace Hastert without summoning Congress back into town from the campaign trail. Nor would an ugly fight over who would succeed him be good for the party's prospects in November. Still, Republicans are not particularly eager to be seen with him. His campaign schedule is starting to look a lot lighter, as House candidates across the country are turning down his offers to do fund raisers for them. Even the leadership's much vaunted discipline seems to be in tatters. Majority leader Boehner defended himself last week by attacking Hastert: "My position is, it's in his corner, it's his responsibility." And the third in command, whip Roy Blunt, suggested that things would have been different if he had been informed. Not incidentally, both men are expected to consider making a bid for the top job if Hastert ultimately steps down--and maybe if he doesn't. But by then the job description may be House minority leader.

G.O.P. leaders are so desperate to find someone else to blame that they have been reduced--with no indication that they see the irony--to blaming a vast left-wing conspiracy. "The people who want to see this thing blow up," Hastert told the Chicago Tribune, "are ABC News and a lot of Democratic operatives, people funded by George Soros," the liberal financier who has become a bogeyman of the right. Hastert went on to say, without producing any proof, that the revelation was the work of Bill Clinton's operatives. But that line of argument, of course, suggests that Republicans would have preferred to keep Foley's secrets locked away, presumably at the pages' peril. And the Democrats for once are showing the good sense to stay out of the way when the other side is self-destructing. Sighed one of the younger House Republican aides who sits in on key meetings: "Foul play on the Democrats' side? If that is the only card left to play, then we are in serious trouble."

THE "DON'T ASK, DON'T TELL" PROBLEM

As Hastert and his forces have been trumpeting their charges against the Democrats, a whisper campaign has been launched in Washington to blame an internal culprit: a "velvet mafia" at the upper levels of G.O.P. leadership on Capitol Hill. Foley, that line of argument went, had been protected by gay staff members like Fordham, Trandahl and others whose names were being widely circulated. Says a top aide: "It looks like they may have tried to handle this among themselves because they were similarly situated."

In many ways, that story line is the product of the strains within the party over homosexuality. It's a tension nearly as deep and tortured as those the Democrats grappled with over race a half-century ago, when they tried--unsuccessfully--to keep an uneasy coalition of Southern segregationists and Northern civil rights advocates from tearing their party apart. Even though many of the G.O.P.'s policies have been hostile to gay rights, its leaders have long followed a "Don't ask, don't tell" policy with what pretty much everyone in Washington knows is a sizable number of closeted Republicans among members of Congress, upper-level staff and top party operatives. Says Patrick Sammon, executive vice president of the gay group Log Cabin Republicans: "There are a lot of gay Republicans who are working behind the scenes to advance the priorities of this party."

Until now, Republicans were able to manage the conflict. And they managed it by ignoring it. That even became part of an electoral strategy dating back to the 2000 election that suggested there was nothing to be gained by moderation. In a memo he wrote to Karl Rove, Bush pollster Matthew Dowd estimated that truly independent voters had fallen to a mere sliver of the electorate. There were, Dowd concluded, not enough percentage points in being "a uniter, not a divider." The key to winning in a polarized country was mobilizing the conservative base. That year, Bush refused to meet with the Log Cabin Republicans, choosing instead to see a handpicked group of gay Republicans, but only after the party's nomination was secured. In 2004, even as Vice President Dick Cheney's daughter Mary was a potential symbol of the party's openheartedness, Republicans put anti-gay-marriage measures on 11 state ballots to drive voter turnout.

But the Foley scandal is making it difficult for the party to look the other way. Last week some conservatives went so far as to insinuate that Foley proves that every gay person is a pedophile waiting to happen. "You don't need 'gaydar' to understand he has certain dispositions," Utah Congressman Chris Cannon told the Deseret News. Televangelist Pat Robertson recommended that G.O.P. leaders simply explain the situation this way: "Well, this man's gay. He does what gay people do."

The resignations of Foley and Fordham sparked fears that other gay Republicans would also soon be forced out of both their closets and their jobs. "Kirk is the fall guy," says gay-rights activist Hilary Rosen. "It's going to be open season on gay Republicans. It's the right wing's perfect storm. They never wanted gays in their party anyway."

RULING WITH AN IRON FIST

Oddly enough, it was a sex scandal in 1998 that brought Hastert from obscurity to the Speaker's chair in the first place. Gingrich had been ousted because his brand of fiery leadership had become such a drag on the party that it lost seats rather than gained them amid the Monica Lewinsky scandal. But his anointed successor, Robert Livingston of Louisiana, suddenly backed out amid revelations of an extramarital affair. That's when the party turned to Hastert, a former high school wrestling coach whose affability and low-key demeanor seemed to guarantee calmer times ahead. He was, after all, the man who said he was too humble to brag about being humble.

And yet the way the House has operated under Hastert has been anything but humble. He quickly came to be viewed as little more than a genial front for then majority leader Tom DeLay, whose nickname--the Hammer--pretty much summed up his leadership touch. "There has been no institutional rule, means, norm or tradition that cannot be set aside to advance a partisan political goal," says Brookings Institution political scientist Thomas Mann, co-author of the recently published book whose title describes Congress as The Broken Branch. In 2003, instead of fashioning a compromise that might woo a few Democrats, Hastert and DeLay held what was supposed to be a 15-min. vote open for three full hours as they squeezed the last Republican votes they needed to pass a bill to provide an expensive prescription drug benefit to the Medicare program. Far more than in the past, they brought bills to the floor with no chance of amendment and allowed the normal appropriations process to be circumvented so that pet projects could be funded without scrutiny. When DeLay faced indictment by a Texas grand jury, Hastert changed the Republican rules so that DeLay could stay on as leader--though in the ensuing outcry, he had to reverse himself. Hastert was successful, however, in purging the ethics committee of its chairman and two Republican members who had reprimanded DeLay for misconduct. Stretching the limits of arcane House rules and shuffling committees around may not seem like earthshaking offenses, but they are the same type of procedural strangleholds and power plays that the G.O.P. had hoped to excise from the body politic 12 years ago.

"The Republican Party of 2006 is a tired, cranky shell of the aggressive, reformist movement that was swept into office in 1994 on a wave of positive change," Frank Luntz, one of the strategists of the G.O.P. takeover, wrote this week in a column for TIME.com "I worked for them. They were friends of mine. These Republicans are not those Republicans."

On policy matters, Hastert's leadership approach has been to act as though the Democrats--and sometimes the Senate--simply do not exist. He squeezes hard-edged partisan bills through the House to please the G.O.P. base, even though they have no chance of ever getting through the Senate and reaching the President's desk. "There have been numerous occasions when bipartisan approaches, which would have benefited our conference more than Democrats, have been rebuffed by the Speaker," complains a senior Republican aide, who says he likes and respects the Speaker. "His strategy seems to be, 'Well, don't worry about it. We'll blame [Democratic Leader Nancy] Pelosi.' That might work in isolated circumstances, but when your party's numbers start to tank, and people want to see that you can govern, that approach is not a solid one."

Party leaders concede the point that their revolution hasn't lived up to everything they promised. But they say voters still see the difference between where the parties stand. Former Republican chairman Ed Gillespie--one of the authors of the Contract with America, on which House Republicans ran in 1994--says, "Our party is still better when it comes to spending than the Democrats, stronger on national security than the Democrats and more likely to share concerns about the coarsening of our culture that a majority of Americans share than the Democrats are." Strategists are putting an optimistic face even on the effects of the Foley scandal, saying their internal polling shows little movement against the G.O.P.

Will the Democrats behave any differently if they retake Congress in November? Some would undoubtedly try to use their majority power to exact revenge for Republican overreach. And history has shown them to be just as capable of the type of ideological drift that is tearing at the G.O.P.

For now, though, the question on everyone's mind is, How do the Republicans find their way from here? A number of conservatives have begun to wonder aloud if it wouldn't be better for the party to lose the House or Senate in November. If the revolutionaries have become the redcoats, then perhaps it's time for another uprising. Send the Republicans back into the wilderness so they can forage for the kind of fresh ideas and guerrilla tactics that made them such a force during their previous march on Washington. They could very well be ready in time for the presidential election in 2008. And while they're out there on the campaign trail, they just might rally around their old general, who will be looking to cap his own hardscrabble journey from political pariah to rehabbed revolutionary. That general, of course, is none other than former Speaker Gingrich, who has been spotted in Iowa, New Hampshire and other battleground states for more than a year now, taking potshots at the Establishment he helped create and rearming himself to storm the next barricade. GOP Officials Brace For Loss Of Seven To 30 House Seats (WP)

By Jim Vandehei And Chris Cillizza

Republican campaign officials said yesterday that they expect to lose at least seven House seats and as many as 30 in the Nov. 7 midterm elections, as a result of sustained violence in Iraq and the page scandal involving former GOP representative Mark Foley.

Democrats need to pick up 15 seats in the election to take back control of the House after more than a decade of GOP leadership. Two weeks of virtually nonstop controversy over President Bush's war policy and House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert's handling of the page scandal have forced party leaders to recalculate their vulnerability and placed a growing number of Republican incumbents and open seats at much greater risk.

GOP officials are urging lawmakers to focus exclusively on local issues and leave it to party leaders to mitigate the Foley controversy by accusing Democrats of trying to politicize it. At the same time, the White House plans to amplify national security issues, especially the threat of terrorism, after North Korea's reported nuclear test, in hopes of shifting the debate away from casualties and controversy during the final month of the campaign. These efforts are aimed largely at prodding disaffected conservatives to vote for GOP candidates despite their unease.

Still, GOP leaders privately said that Democrats are edging much closer to locking down a majority of House seats because a small but significant number of conservatives are frustrated with Republican governance, while independent swing voters are turning against GOP candidates.

"If you are a Democrat, you have to like the atmosphere," said Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (Va.), a top campaign strategist for the GOP. Davis said Republicans could lose as many as 30 seats if conditions worsen.

With four weeks left in the campaign, GOP strategists, speaking on background, have begun to outline a highly gloomy view of the House election for their party.

They are all but writing off GOP open seats in Arizona, Colorado, Texas and Florida (the one previously held by Foley). Party officials said that three GOP incumbents in Indiana are trailing in private polling and that seats thought safe suddenly appear imperiled. These include the open Florida seat vacated by Rep. Katherine Harris, who is running for senator. "It is unquestionably closer than we would like," said Rep. Adam Putnam (R-Fla.).

In a sign that the political environment is getting worse for Republicans, political handicapper Charlie Cook now lists 25 GOP-held seats as a tossup -- seven more than before the Foley scandal broke Sept. 29. Stuart Rothenberg, a nonpartisan expert on House races, has raised to nine the number of GOP seats tilting Democratic or likely to switch hands.

Unlike in most elections, when both parties defend several seats, Democrats are favored to win every seat they now occupy and are spending money to defend only a few. As a result, Democrats are not as vulnerable to the GOP's campaign finance advantage in the final weeks as they have been in past campaigns.

A Democratic takeover of the House is not a foregone conclusion, however. Because of congressional redistricting plans that gave huge advantages to incumbents, fewer than 50 of the 435 House seats are competitive. Democrats said internal polls show that the fallout from the Foley scandal is confined to half a dozen races. Moreover, House elections are traditionally shaped by local issues and personalities, and the closest races come down to which party can turn out its most loyal voters.

The page scandal erupted two weeks ago when Foley abruptly resigned after being confronted by ABC News with sexually explicit messages that he exchanged with a former page on the Internet. Investigations by the Justice Department, the House ethics committee and Florida authorities have ensued.

The GOP's emerging strategy on the Foley scandal is to try to limit losses among conservative voters who are expressing alarm about the scandal and about the apparent failure of GOP leaders to act on early warnings about Foley's behavior.

As part of that strategy, the Republican National Committee is seeking to convince conservatives that the debate is fundamentally centered on politics, not values. The RNC is shipping reams of information to conservative radio hosts, television commentators and bloggers. Those GOP talking points detail the Democratic connections of groups including the Center for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington and American Family Voices, which are working to turn the scandal into an issue with national implications.

The NRCC is highlighting Democratic leaders who supported former representative Gerry E. Studds (Mass.), who was censured by the House in 1983 after admitting to sexual contact with a male page a decade earlier; Studds went on to serve in Congress until 1997. "It is important to contrast how Republican leadership is handling the situation with problems with one of its own, and how Democrats did," said former RNC chairman Ed Gillespie, a close White House ally.

Still, the "Foley factor" has made GOP strategists nervous. Several officials said it has dramatically undermined the reelection prospects of several incumbents, including Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (N.Y.), who was criticized by Democrats for not doing enough to stop Foley's advances on young male pages after learning about them this spring.

Several interest groups with Democratic ties are seeking to take advantage of Reynolds's newfound vulnerability. Majority Action, a group designed to help Democrats retake control of the House, is sponsoring a radio ad in which a narrator says: "Another scandal in Washington, and our Congressman Tom Reynolds is right in the middle." Two public polls show Reynolds trailing his Democratic challenger, Jack Davis, in a race neither side considered very competitive a few weeks ago.

Rep. Deborah Pryce (Ohio), the fourth-ranking GOP leader, is facing the toughest reelection race of her career. She has said she had no prior knowledge of Foley's behavior but has faced criticism for telling a reporter that the former congressman was one of her closest friends in Congress.

"I don't think this is personally sticking to Deborah Pryce, but it is certainly having people have a more jaundiced view of Washington, which is not good for Republicans," said George Rasley, Pryce's spokesman. Pryce had a slight lead over Mary Jo Kilroy in her internal polling before the Foley scandal, an aide said, but Republicans expect Pryce to suffer as much as any incumbent for the renewed scrutiny of congressional ethics.

Scandals are hurting Republicans elsewhere in Ohio, where charges of corruption have rocked the GOP at the local and state levels for the past two years. In the open seat vacated by indicted GOP Rep. Robert W. Ney, Joy Padgett is struggling to lock down a reliably GOP seat east of Columbus, the state capital. Polls show Democrat Zach Space, a liberal critic of the war, on top and GOP strategists agree Padgett is behind.

"It is definitely a challenge to overcome," says Padgett spokesman Morgan Ortagus. "Voters are definitely in a throw-the-bums-out mood."

Space is calling for Hastert's resignation and is asking Padgett to do the same. Padgett canceled a fundraiser with Hastert last week.

In other races where Republican incumbents have been dogged by scandal, Democrats are pushing the Foley story hard.

Former representative Nick Lampson (D-Tex.) is asking Houston City Council member Shelley Sekula-Gibbs (R) to call for the resignation of any member of the House leadership who knew about the e-mails and instant messages exchanged between Foley and former congressional pages. The two candidates are competing for the seat from the 22nd Congressional District, left vacant by the departure of former House majority leader Tom DeLay (R), who is under indictment in Texas.

Elsewhere, the political debate is returning to traditional disputes over the war, taxes and health care, according to Democrats and Republicans. The Foley story "is getting a lot of attention now, but I don't think it will have the legs to last four weeks," said Ron Carey, chairman of the Minnesota Republican Party.

Scandal Pushes Voters To Dems (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, October 10, 2006

WASHINGTON — A Capitol Hill sex scandal has reinforced public doubts about Republican leadership and pushed Democrats to a huge lead in the race for control of Congress four weeks before Election Day, the latest USA TODAY/Gallup Poll shows.

Democrats had a 23-point lead over Republicans in every group of people questioned — likely voters, registered voters and adults — on which party's House candidate would get their vote. That's double the lead Republicans had a month before they seized control of Congress in 1994 and the Democrats' largest advantage among registered voters since 1978.

Nearly three in 10 registered voters said their representative doesn't deserve re-election — the highest level since 1994. President Bush's approval rating was 37% in the new poll, down from 44% in a Sept. 15-17 poll. And for the first time since the question was asked in 2002, Democrats did better than Republicans on who would best handle terrorism, 46%-41%.

"It's hard to see how the climate is going to shift dramatically between now and Election Day," said John Pitney, a former GOP aide on Capitol Hill who now teaches at Claremont-McKenna College in California. He said Iraq remains the biggest problem for Republicans: "People just don't like inconclusive wars."

The plummeting GOP ratings in the poll of 1,007 adults, taken Friday through Sunday, come amid a series of events that have given Democrats ammunition to argue that the country needs a new direction.

Those include increased violence in Iraq; a National Intelligence Estimate that belied upbeat administration talk on Iraq; a new Bob Woodward book about internal White House discord over Iraq, and the Sept. 29 resignation of GOP Rep. Mark Foley. He quit hours after ABC News showed him sexually explicit instant messages he allegedly exchanged with a teenage former page.

Some Democrats call the scandal a tipping point. "It's the absolute crystallization for people of everything they dislike about Washington and congressional Republicans," Democratic strategist Anita Dunn said.

GOP pollster Ed Goeas said Republican fortunes are better in individual districts than nationally. Republicans remain energized and loyal, he said, but added he's monitoring whether the Foley matter fires up independents who normally don't vote. "Does this become a catalyst for their involvement?" he asked.

Two-thirds of those in the poll said they are following the page scandal very or somewhat closely. More than half — 54% — said GOP leaders who knew about Foley's actions for months or years did not act against Foley earlier "for political reasons." By 43%-36%, they said House Speaker Dennis Hastert should resign.

Government corruption, Iraq and terrorism were the three most important issues. Along with their lead on terrorism, Democrats had a 21-point advantage on corruption and a 17-point advantage on Iraq. A 56%-40% majority said sending troops to Iraq was a mistake — the widest disapproval margin in a year.

Three other polls released Monday, by CNN, ABC News/Washington Post and CBS News/New York Times, showed Democrats leading the congressional ballot by 13 to 21 points.

Poll Shows Foley Case Is Hurting Congress's Image (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney And Janet Elder

Americans say that Republican Congressional leaders put their political interests ahead of protecting the safety of teenage pages, and that House leaders knew of Mark Foley's sexually charged messages to pages well before he was forced to quit Congress, according to the latest New York Times/CBS News poll.

The poll, completed before North Korea announced that it had detonated its first nuclear test, also found that the war in Iraq was continuing to take a toll on President Bush and the Republican Party, and that the White House was having difficulty retaining its edge in handling terrorism.

The number of Americans who approve of Mr. Bush's handling of the campaign against terrorism dropped to 46 percent from 54 percent in the past two weeks, suggesting that he failed to gain any political lift from an orchestrated set of ceremonies marking the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks. In addition, the poll shows that Americans are now evenly divided over which party they think can better handle terrorism, the first time in the Bush presidency that Democrats have matched Republicans on national security, despite a concerted White House effort to seize the advantage on the issue this month.

With four weeks left before Election Day, the poll indicates that the scandal involving Mr. Foley, a former Republican congressman from Florida, is alienating Americans from Congress, and weakening a Republican Party that was already struggling to keep control of the House and Senate. By overwhelming numbers, including majorities of Republicans, Americans said that most members of Congress did not follow the same rules of behavior as average Americans, and that most members of Congress considered themselves above the law.

"Politics goes to people's heads and they see themselves as their own little entity," said Donna Mummert, 68, a Republican from Marsing, Idaho, in a follow-up interview after participating in the poll. "They forget why they're there to represent us."

Seventy-nine percent of respondents said House Republican leaders were more concerned about their political standing than about the safety of teenage Congressional pages. About half of respondents said that the House Republican leadership had improperly handled the Foley case, compared with 27 percent who said they approved of how it was handled; 46 percent of respondents said Speaker J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois should step down. And Americans are more likely to say that Democrats, and not Republicans, share their moral values.

The nationwide telephone poll was conducted Thursday through Sunday with 983 adults, including 891 registered voters. The margin of sampling error for the entire sample is plus or minus three percentage points and is the same for the registered voters.

The poll describes what is by any measure a difficult political environment for the White House and Republican Congressional leaders. Still, it is a measure of national sentiment rather than the likely outcome in the approximately 40 House races and 8 Senate races that will determine which party controls Congress next January.

In many of the races where Republicans are in danger of losing seats, Democrats hold relatively slight leads, according to local polls and internal party polls. Republicans are counting on their strong voter turnout operation, and sizable financial advantage over Democrats, to compensate for the difficulties they face.

There has been no change since mid-September in the gap between Americans who said they planned to vote for a Democrat over a Republican in their district this November: 49 percent to 35 percent. But Democratic voters are more likely than Republicans to say they are enthusiastic about voting this November.

The public's view of Iraq is as dark as it has been since the war began in 2003, with two-thirds saying it is going somewhat or very badly, while only 3 percent are saying the war is going very well. Two-thirds said they disapproved of how Mr. Bush was handling Iraq.

Mr. Bush's job approval rating has slipped to 34 percent, from 37 percent in September. That is one of the lowest levels of his presidency and poses a complication for the White House as it seeks to send him out on the road to rally base voters. Mr.

Bush's job approval rating has even slipped with his base: 75 percent of conservative Republicans approve of the way he has handled his job, compared with 96 percent in November 2004.

The president clearly faces constraints as he seeks to address the public concerns about Iraq that have shrouded this midterm election: 83 percent of respondents thought that Mr. Bush was either hiding something or mostly lying when he discussed how the war in Iraq was going. Fifty-seven percent of respondents said Mr. Bush was personally aware of intelligence reports before Sept. 11 that warned of possible domestic terrorist attacks using airplanes. When the same question was asked in May 2002, 41 percent said they believed Mr. Bush was aware.

"Iraq was a mistake, and even though he gets up and says it's going O.K., it hasn't been going O.K. since Day One," said Gertrude Knowles, a self-described independent voter from Quincy, Mass. "Now he's got to make it sound better than it is."

So far, at least, it appears that, at least nationally, Republicans have had little success in pressing what have been their two biggest lines of attacks against Democratic challengers this fall: taxes and terrorism. The poll found that 41 percent of respondents thought Republicans were stronger on handling terrorism, compared with 40 percent who named Democrats, a statistically insignificant difference. Before Labor Day, Republicans had a 42 percent to 34 percent edge on handling terrorism.

And in a month in which Republicans have sought to discredit Democratic challengers as advocates of big spending and high taxes, 52 percent of respondents said that Democrats would make the right decisions on how to spend taxpayers' money, while 29 percent said Republicans would.

Americans said that Democrats would do a better job than Republicans in making decisions on the war, on the economy and on taxes. Democrats are viewed more positively, or less negatively, than Republicans, with 39 percent saying they held a favorable view of Republicans, compared with 54 percent who said they held an unfavorable view. By contrast, 52 percent of respondents had a favorable view of the Democratic Party, compared with 40 percent who had an unfavorable view.

The problems for Congress have clearly been exacerbated by the Foley scandal. Eighty percent of Americans said they considered the Foley revelations either very serious or somewhat serious. Two-thirds said that House Republicans did not initially take the warnings seriously enough, and 62 percent said they believed House Republican leaders knew before last week that Mr. Foley had sent sexually explicit messages to teenagers.

"They just covered it up," said Charles Young, a Republican from upstate New York. "We put them in office to do what is right for the country. It should have been brought to their attention and disposed of. We don't need people in office who corrupt our children."

The poll found that 69 percent of Americans thought that members of Congress considered themselves above the law, and 69 percent thought that members of Congress did not live by the same rules of behavior that they did.

The poll found that 47 percent of respondents believed that Democrats came closer to sharing their moral values, compared with 38 percent who said Republicans did. The Democratic standing in this area included some unlikely groups: 26 percent of conservatives and 43 percent of people who live in the South named Democrats as the party that came closer to sharing their values.

Poll Shows Strong Shift Of Support To Democrats (WP)

By David S. Broder And Dan Balz

The Washington Post, October 10, 2006

Democrats have regained a commanding position going into the final weeks of the midterm-election campaigns, with support eroding for Republicans on Iraq, ethics and presidential leadership, according to a Washington Post-ABC News poll.

Apparent Republican gains in September have been reversed in the face of mounting U.S. casualties and gloomy forecasts from Iraq and the scandal involving Mark Foley (R-Fla.), who was forced to resign his congressional post over sexually graphic online conversations with former House pages.

Approval of Congress has plunged to its lowest level in more than a decade (32 percent), and Americans, by a margin of 54 percent to 35 percent, say they trust Democrats more than Republicans to deal with the biggest problems the nation is confronting. Fifty-five percent of those surveyed said congressional Democrats deserve to be reelected next month, but just 39 percent said Republicans deserve to return to office.

The poll measures broad public attitudes and cannot be translated into individual House districts, but it sketches an environment that is the most difficult the Republicans have faced since taking control of Congress in the 1994 elections. By a margin of 54 percent to 41 percent, registered voters said they plan to vote for the Democrat over the Republican in congressional elections next month.

Since Congress adjourned 10 days ago, Republicans have been swamped by bad news, particularly from Iraq. The Foley scandal, while not a dominant voting issue for many, nonetheless has contributed to dissatisfaction with the majority party's performance, the survey found.

President Bush's approval rating, which rose to 42 percent in September after an anti-terrorism offensive marking the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks, registered 39 percent in the latest poll. The percentage of respondents who said they strongly disapprove of his performance is about double the number who strongly approve. This disparity in voter intensity could have implications for turnout on Nov. 7, since impassioned voters are most likely to go to the polls.

The president's approval rating reached a low of 33 percent in May, but he has since regained support from Republicans who had expressed unhappiness with his performance. In the current poll, 82 percent of Republicans said they approve of how he is handling his job, compared with 68 percent in May.

Democrats and independents are almost as negative in their appraisals of the president now as they were five months ago.

Bush's ratings on the war in Iraq are among the lowest of his presidency, with 35 percent approving of how he is handling the situation and 64 percent disapproving (54 percent strongly disapprove). On terrorism, a majority (53 percent) said they disapprove of his performance. That is the lowest rating Bush has received on his signature issue.

Asked whether the war in Iraq has been worth fighting, 63 percent said no, the highest recorded during Bush's presidency. Fifty-one percent agreed with Bush's argument that Iraq is a front in the global campaign against terrorism, the lowest of his presidency. Fifty percent of those surveyed said that the country is safer today than it was before Sept. 11, 2001, but 42 percent, a new high, said the nation is now less safe.

Still, there is no significant support for withdrawing U.S. forces immediately. Half of those surveyed -- about the same percentage it has been throughout the year -- said they would like to see troop levels decrease. Despite the high number of casualties, only a fifth said they supported immediate withdrawal.

With the decline in gasoline prices, Americans are somewhat more positive about the economy, with 47 percent describing it as good or excellent -- the highest since July 2001 -- and 53 percent saying it is not so good or poor. Forty-one percent approve of how Bush has handled economic issues, about the same percentage as in August.

Bush's performance remains a potentially significant factor in the midterm elections, with 35 percent of those surveyed saying they will use their congressional votes to express opposition to the president, a new high on that question, and about twice the number who said they will use their votes to show support for him.

The Post-ABC News poll is based on interviews with 1,204 adults and was conducted Oct. 5-8. The margin of sampling error is plus or minus three percentage points.

The Foley scandal has remained a key news item over the past 10 days and the poll shows that Americans are reading and watching. Seven in 10 said they are following the story "very" or "somewhat" closely. But only about two in 10 said the issue will be very important in their votes next month.

The political fallout is mixed. Almost two-thirds said Republican leaders tried to cover up the scandal, but about the same percentage said they think Democratic leaders would have done the same. More than three in five said Democrats are criticizing Republican leaders for political advantage. Voters are evenly split over whether House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) should step down from his post.

There is broad dissatisfaction among voters this fall, with one-third saying the country is heading in the right direction. Similarly, Congress has proved to be a disappointment to most Americans, with two in three saying they disapprove of its performance, the highest number in a Post-ABC News poll since November 1995.

As bad as these findings are, they are not as bad as they were in the months before Democrats lost control of Congress in 1994. Congressional approval hit 18 percent in October of that year.

On another measure, 60 percent of those surveyed in the new poll said they approve of the performance of their own House member. That compares with 49 percent in an October 1994 poll.

The new poll suggests that there are few issues on which Republicans can hope to appeal to voters in the next four weeks. When respondents were asked which party they trust to handle various issues, Democrats led on every subject, by 33 percentage points on health care, 19 points for ethics, 17 points for the economy, 13 points each for Iraq and immigration.

Even on terrorism, which Republicans hoped to turn into a powerful issue this fall, Democrats led in trustworthiness by six percentage points, reversing a seven-point deficit in September.

There are also modest signs that Democrats have improved their posture among voters. For the first time, a narrow majority, 52 percent, said Democrats are offering the country a clear alternative direction to Bush and Republicans. While Americans are split on the performance of congressional Democrats -- 48 percent approve, 50 percent disapprove -- they are overwhelmingly negative about GOP performance, with 63 percent disapproving and 35 percent approving.

Republicans are closely monitoring Christian conservatives for signs of disaffection that might contribute to lower voter turnout next month. The Post-ABC poll shows that they are not as strong in their support for Republican House candidates as they were in 2004, but it is unclear whether that is related to the Foley scandal. Forty-eight percent of white evangelical Christians said that House GOP leaders took the proper steps in responding to Foley's actions, compared with 60 percent of all conservative Republicans.

Robert Nelson, a machinist from Laurens, S.C., said the Iraq war is one of the issues that have turned him against the Republican Party. "I guess you could said I'm a Reaganite," he said. "Ronald Reagan got me interested in the Republican Party and I pretty much voted the party line." He did not support Bush two years ago, he said, and now thinks the country would be better off with Democrats in control of Congress. "The Republican Party has lost track, gone off in their own direction," he said.

Francis Jacobs, a computer tutor and technician from Grand Ledge, Mich., said he thinks Hastert should resign as speaker because "he knew more" about what was going on with Foley. Jacobs thinks that both parties "are having a field day" with the scandal but is highly critical of the Republican-controlled Congress.

"The question is, what have they accomplished?" he said. "They've accomplished nothing."

In the Post-ABC News poll, 71 percent agreed that Congress did little or nothing this year.

Polls: Hastert Should Resign As House Speaker (CHIT)

By Mike Dorning

Chicago Tribune, October 10, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Three independent polls released on Monday demonstrated the political damage that congressional Republicans and particularly House Speaker Dennis Hastert have sustained since a GOP congressman's sexually explicit electronic messages to underage pages were disclosed late last month.

Few in the country previously had strong impressions of the speaker. But about half of all Americans now say Hastert, an Illinois Republican, should resign his leadership post. Even among Republicans, more than a third believe the speaker should go, according to the CNN-Gallup poll, conducted over the weekend after Hastert's Thursday news conference.

Two of the polls, those by CNN-Gallup and ABC News-Washington Post, showed that between 52 percent and 64 percent of those surveyed believe party leaders deliberately tried to cover up wrongdoing by Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.), who resigned last month. And three-quarters of the country consider Republican leaders' handling of the issue inappropriate, CNN-Gallup said.

While voters say such issues as the Iraq war, terrorism and the economy are more important to them than the handling of Foley's lurid messages, polls show a sharp drop in public support for GOP congressional candidates.

Among likely voters, 58 percent say they plan to vote for Democrats in November, versus 37 percent who say they will vote Republican, according to the CNN-Gallup poll. The 21 percentage point margin is 5 points wider than it was a week earlier in the same poll.

The ABC-Post poll found registered voters favor Democratic over Republican candidates 54 percent to 41 percent. The 13-point margin also is 5 points wider than the last ABC-Post poll, taken a month earlier.

According to the CBS-New York Times poll, four out of five Americans think GOP leaders are more concerned with politics than the well-being of pages.

All three surveys were completed before the Washington Post reported on Monday that Rep. Jim Kolbe (R-Ariz.) had confronted Foley over inappropriate behavior toward pages in 2000, extending to at least six years the time period in which other members of Foley's party were aware of suspicious activity. Kolbe was a member of the House Page Board at the time, though it was unclear whether he informed other members.

On Monday, the House ethics committee sent a letter to congressional offices asking them to contact former pages and request they report inappropriate messages or contacts by Foley or other members of Congress.

National polls are of limited use in forecasting the outcome of mid-term elections, in which control of the House and Senate will be determined by a small number of individual elections.

Still, such a dramatic shift in national sentiments is a striking illustration of a changing political mood that would likely reverberate in voting on Nov. 7 if there is no change in public attitudes in the next four weeks.

A political strategist for a Republican-leaning business group said that a pollster who has been tracking competitive congressional races for the group has christened Sept. 29—the day the Foley messages were disclosed—as "Black Friday."

The group's polling showed a clear reversal on that day of a trend in which GOP fortunes were modestly improving amid a campaign by the White House to highlight lower gas prices and bolster the case for a connection between the Iraq war and the war on terror.

After slight improvements in President Bush's standing during September, all three polls showed a drop in public approval for the president.

Still, it was the shift in public attitudes toward Hastert that was most striking.

The CNN-Gallup Poll found those with an opinion strongly favoring Hastert's resignation, with 52 percent in support of a resignation and 31 percent against. The CBS-New York Times poll found 46 percent saying Hastert should go while 26 percent said he should stay. The ABC-Washington Post Poll showed a more even split, with 45 percent saying Hastert should step down and 47 percent saying he should remain.

Foley Probe To Focus On Who Knew, When (LAT)

By Richard Simon And Noam N. Levey

The Los Angeles Times, October 10, 2006

WASHINGTON — Witnesses will begin testimony behind closed doors this week in the sex scandal that has sent shudders through the Republican-controlled Congress and potentially though the upcoming elections.

The investigation, which is being conducted by the House ethics committee in an otherwise quiet Capitol, will look into who knew what when about the contacts between then-Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) and male pages.

In what is shaping up as a classic "he said/he said," Kirk Fordham, a former Foley aide, is expected to testify that he warned House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert's office in 2003 or earlier about the congressman's inappropriate interest in teenage pages.

Officials in Hastert's office have said they did not learn about Foley's advances until last fall, when a Louisiana congressman alerted the office to a series of e-mails Foley sent to a former page. Hastert has maintained that his aides then alerted officials in charge of the page program, who told Foley to cease contact with the teenage boy.

"All eyes will be on Hastert, and the basic point of the interviews with staff and GOP leaders will be to find out when the speaker had serious indications something was wrong with Foley," said Julian Zelizer, a specialist in congressional history at Boston University.

Hastert's attorney, J. Randolph Evans, said, "We're going to be fully cooperative."

Also Monday, it became clear that the Foley scandal was sparking political concerns at the highest levels of the White House, with strategist Karl Rove conceding in a private briefing that the matter "complicates things" for some Republican candidates who have been linked to the scandal.

Fordham's attorney, Tim Heaphy, said Monday said that he expects the committee investigation to focus "less on what Congressman Foley did and more on who knew what when."

This week's questioning of witnesses and scrutinizing of records comes as the committee broadens its probe to determine whether any other House members have had inappropriate contact with the 16- and 17-year-old congressional pages.

Ethics committee Chairman Rep. Doc Hastings (R-Wash.) and the panel's top Democrat, Rep. Howard Berman of Valley Village, asked all House members to contact current and former pages sponsored by their offices to determine "whether any of those individuals had any inappropriate communications or interactions with former Representative Foley or any other member of the House."

The politically sensitive investigation also comes as the scandal has become a campaign issue in the battle for control of Congress. The committee has vowed to act swiftly, but it is unclear whether it will be done before the November elections.

The panel conducting the investigation, made up of two Democrats and two Republicans, is trying to determine whether any House members or staff violated House rules. The committee has no power to discipline Foley, who resigned from Congress Sept. 29. A separate criminal investigation is being conducted by the FBI.

The committee is expected to interview Hastert and members of his staff, including Scott Palmer, whom Fordham has said he spoke to in 2002 or 2003 about Foley. Hastert's chief political advisor, Mike Stokke, and his senior counsel, Ted Van Der Meid — both of whom helped field the complaint last year, according to an account prepared by the speaker's office — may be called as well.

So may a host of other lawmakers and staff, and perhaps Foley and former pages . Other possible witnesses include:

Former House Clerk Jeff Trandahl, who oversaw the page program and allegedly was asked to talk to Foley after the speaker's office received a complaint last year;

Rep. John Shimkus (R-Ill.), chairman of the board that oversees the page program, who allegedly accompanied Trandahl to talk to Foley;

Rep. Rodney Alexander (R-La.), who sponsored the page who received e-mails from Foley last year;

Rep. Jim Kolbe (R-Ariz.), whom the Washington Post reported confronted Foley as early as 2000 about messages to pages;

Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (R-N.Y.), chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee, who hired Fordham as his chief of staff last year.

The panel has prepared about four dozen subpoenas for documents and testimony, but officials refuse to say whom they have summoned. Witnesses called by the committee testify under oath; they can be accompanied by an attorney and can plead the Fifth Amendment against self-incrimination.

In his private briefing Monday, Rove noted that with the Democrats needing just 15 seats to take control of the House, "every seat matters." It does not help, he suggested, "having Foley's seat up for grabs rather than being safe and having Reynolds responsible now for fighting back on this issue."

Rove's remarks, in a roughly half-hour conference call with GOP supporters across the country, offered a glimpse into private worries over the Foley fallout in a White House that has tried to steer clear of the controversy. A participant in the Rove call invited a Times reporter to listen in. The White House said it would have no comment on private calls, but added that Rove assured activists that the party would overcome the problem.

Overall, Rove sought to sound upbeat as he addressed the activists. He predicted the GOP would hold the House and Senate, but seemed to acknowledge that his hopes had been dampened in recent days

"I felt great about [the House] before Foley," he said. "But I still feel good about it."

Foley Scandal Drags Reynolds Into Underdog Role In N.Y. 26 (CQ Politics)

By Marie Horrigan

CQ Politics, October 10, 2006

The scandal surrounding resigned Florida Republican Rep. Mark Foley and the salacious messages he sent to underage congressional pages has engulfed Washington, D.C., and reordered the already pitched partisan battle for control of the House.

And nowhere is that more true than in New York's 26th District, where the re-election prospects of four-term Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds — head of the Republicans' national House campaign organization — have seen a stunning reversal of fortune. The controversy over Reynolds' handling of information about Foley's activities has prompted CQPolitics.com to change its rating on the race to Leans Democratic from Leans Republican.

That switch comes just one week after CQPolitics.com downgraded Reynolds to Leans Republican from Safe Republican — a position where Reynolds had comfortably resided prior to Foley's abrupt Sept. 29 resignation.

The Leans Democratic rating does not mean that Reynolds definitely will lose on Nov. 7: His past popularity, strong fundraising advantage and the Republican lean in his upstate New York district gives him at least a chance of reversing the tide running strongly against him.

But all of the momentum appears on the side of the Democratic nominee, factory owner Jack Davis, who had been running a vigorous underdog campaign even before the Foley scandal erupted.

The contest is a rematch of the 2004 race in which Davis held Reynolds to an unexpectedly close 56 percent to 44 percent edge. Now, three separate polls since late last week showed Reynolds trails Davis by significant margins.

Reynolds' role in the Foley incident began in fall 2005, when Louisiana Republican Rep. Rodney Alexander told him a former page, a constituent of Alexander's district, had complained of receiving inappropriate e-mails and instant messages from Foley.

Reynolds — who has defended himself by saying that the e-mails in question were not the sexually explicit ones to other young men that were later revealed — says he mentioned the matter to the office of House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois, a matter of serious dispute since the scandal broke.

But what appears clear is that Reynolds referred the matter to Illinois Republican Rep. John Shimkus, chairman of the House board that supervises the page program, who has said he held a conversation with Foley in which he instructed him to treat the pages with respect.

This has led many critics to demand to know why Reynolds didn't think the matter required a more thorough investigation,and whether he would not have been much more aggressive if — in his role as chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee — the lawmaker making inappropriate contacts with pages had been a Democrat rather than a Republican.

In the past several days, Reynolds has moved rapidly to try to dissipate the building furor. He appeared at a press conference last Monday surrounded by young children and some of their parents, but also cancelled an appearance on a national Sunday morning talk show in which he was expected to discuss his role in the Foley scandal. A Reynolds spokesman said the congressman had to bow out because he was suffering from flu-like symptoms.

Reynolds' campaign, nonetheless, has released a TV ad in which the congressman, looking straight at the camera, talked about the steps he took as the more explicit electronic messages surfaced, contending that he was among those who forced Foley to resign.

"Nobody's angrier and more disappointed than me that I didn't catch his lies," Reynolds said in ad. "I trusted that others had investigated. Looking back, more should have been done, and for that I am sorry."

But Democrats and allied groups are moving just as fast to leverage the scandal and Reynolds' precarious situation into another pick-up toward the net gain of at least 15 seats they need to win control of the House.

The political action group for the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees, the country's largest union of public employee and health care workers, on Thursday spent $111,000 on ads to be run against Reynolds in the 26th District. The union's analysis of House votes found Reynolds did not support its position on any of the eight votes it chose as key in 2005, and that he had a career record of voting with them 2 percent of the time.

Majority Action, a Democratic-affiliated group organized under Section 527 of the Internal Revenue Code, reported spending $12,000 on ads against Reynolds on Friday. The group had gone after Reynolds even before the controversy, spending $88,000 in early September for negative ads, but new radio and TV spots say Reynolds knew about the inappropriate Foley contacts and did nothing.

"Tell Tom Reynolds and Republican leaders to drop the politics," the TV ad said. "Stop the coverup. Tell the truth or resign."

The increasing onslaught against Reynolds appears strongly connected to Davis's improved position. A Zogby International poll reported Sunday indicated that Davis leads Reynolds 48 percent to 33 percent, with 57 percent of respondents disapproving of how Reynolds handled the page scandal and 58 percent saying it is time to elect someone new.

In an indication that the shifting tide may be more about Reynolds than his challenger, Davis received his high polling numbers even though one-third of respondents did not know who he is.

Davis campaign spokesman Curtis Ellis said the low name ID indicated the campaign had more work to do, but that they were getting greater response from voters on both sides of the aisle. "We're hearing from Republican voters every day who are planning on voting for Jack Davis," Ellis told CQPolitics.com.

The Zogby poll indicated a widening lead from a SurveyUSA poll released Thursday that showed Davis led Reynolds by 50 percent to 45 percent. The state Democratic Party also publicized an internal poll from the Davis campaign that indicated Davis had an 8-point lead, 50 percent to 42 percent.

Reynolds spokesman L.D. Platt, however, told CQPolitics.com he was "not at all" concerned about the effect the scandal would have on the congressman's re-election campaign.

"This race isn't about scandal. This race is about the issues, and the fact that Jack Davis and the Democrats are afraid to talk about the issues and are trying to distract the voters from that," he said.

'Values' Choice For The GOP (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

It's possible that the Mark Foley scandal could finally end the phony, trumped-up "culture war" that the Republican Party has so expertly exploited all these years -- possible, but not likely. I'm afraid the Foley episode will be remembered as just another bloody battle, one with lots of collateral damage.

The Republicans wouldn't be where they are today -- in control of the White House and all of Capitol Hill -- if they hadn't portrayed themselves as the stalwart defenders of moral standards and painted Democrats as a bunch of anything-goes libertines. Republicans promised social and religious conservatives that the values they treasure would not only be respected but written into law. Even if they didn't deliver on these promises, or even try very hard, Republicans paid enough lip service to moral issues to keep "values voters" inside the tent.

It was a political masterstroke, but it required creating and sustaining an illusion -- that Republican officeholders themselves not only talked the talk but walked the walk, that in their own lives they adhered to these deeply conservative moral standards. Human nature being what it is, there was no way this illusion could be sustained.

So for a party that crusades against gay marriage and welcomes voters that consider homosexuality a sin or a disease, headlines about a gay Republican congressman lusting after underage male congressional pages are a problem. The emerging outlines of a coverup -- allegations that the Republican speaker of the House, or at least his aides, got wind of Foley's little problem months or years ago -- are an even bigger problem.

And it will come as a surprise to some religious conservatives that so many Republicans involved in the scandal are gay -- Foley; his former aide Kirk Fordham; a former clerk of the House, Jeff Trandahl. The Post reported yesterday that Rep. Jim Kolbe of Arizona, the one openly gay Republican congressman, saw "inappropriate" e-mail correspondence between Foley and young pages as long ago as 2000.

It comes as no "October surprise" to the Republican leadership that there are gay men -- and, yes, lesbians, too -- working on Capitol Hill, some in high-ranking positions. Before the Foley scandal runs its course, we will probably learn of other gay staff members on the Hill. These people are good at their jobs, and their sexual orientation is, of course, irrelevant. The understanding, in these years of Republican hegemony, reportedly has been something akin to don't ask, don't tell.

But some conservative activists are irate that the "values" party would allow such an arrangement. Cliff Kincaid of Accuracy in Media, a conservative watchdog, thundered on the group's Web site yesterday that "House leaders permitted homosexuals to infiltrate and manipulate the party apparatus while they publicly postured as friends of family values and traditional marriage. The facade is now in ruins."

In other words, Republican House leaders secretly harbored fairly modern attitudes toward homosexuality. How inexcusable.

The culture war is supposed to be about morality, but really it's a crusade to compel Americans to follow certain norms of private behavior that some social and religious conservatives believe are mandated by sociology, nature or God. Republican officeholders have paid lip service to this crusade, all the while knowing that the human family is diverse and fallible. They know that the gravest threat to marriage is the heterosexual divorce rate. They know that Republicans drink, swear, carouse and have affairs, just like Democrats. They know that homosexuals aren't devils.

Most Americans know all of this, too, by the way. Main Street hasn't been Hicksville for a long time.

But Republicans positioned themselves as our national Church Lady and were rewarded with the support of the staunchest religious conservatives, who now feel betrayed. Faced with the spreading Foley scandal, the party has a choice.

The party can look America in the face and say, "Folks, we're all just human, and while we should strive to adhere to the highest moral standards, this whole idea of writing a specific, narrow, fundamentalist Christian view of morality into law is really not a good idea. Even those of us who thought that way when we came to Washington realize we were wrong. Condemning others just because they are different doesn't make us stronger or better, it makes us weaker and poorer. As Barry Goldwater would have said, live and let live."

Or the party can purge its gay staffers, maybe symbolically burn a few at the stake, and continue to pretend that you can legislate what is permitted to reside in American hearts and minds. Unfortunately, that's where it looks like we're headed.

Polled And Confused (NYT)

By John Tierney

The New York Times, October 10, 2006

You may have heard that American voters are disappointed. They are disappointed with Dennis Hastert and the rest of Congress. They are very disappointed with the war in Iraq. They are very, very disappointed with President Bush.

I share their unhappiness, but I must confess to one further regret. I am disappointed with the voters — or at least the ones who show up in public-opinion polls. They keep complaining that Washington doesn't understand what they want, but who on earth could?

Early in the Iraq war, Americans told pollsters they favored it and considered it a major part of the war on terrorism. Then they decided the war was a mistake and didn't reduce the risk of terrorism. Yet as they got angrier and angrier at Republicans for making a mess of Iraq, they kept telling pollsters that they didn't trust the Democrats to do a better job of dealing with terrorism.

Their feelings on the economy are even harder to fathom. In the New York Times/CBS News poll released yesterday, a solid majority of voters said the economy was doing well. When asked if they were making enough to pay their bills and sock away savings, they also sounded upbeat — more upbeat than the respondents 10 years ago who were asked that question when the White House was in Democratic hands.

Yet this year's respondents solidly disapproved of Bush's handling of the economy and said they trusted Democrats to do a better job of it. In part, the reaction reflected the generalized anger at Bush and Republicans. But there's another factor, too: the voters like each party for the wrong reasons.

They can't break their old prejudices. They still think of Republicans as the tough, worldly realists best able to deal with foreign enemies, and Democrats as the compassionate idealists protecting the little guy at home. At one time these stereotypes made sense, but not anymore.

The Republicans have become Wilsonian idealists in foreign policy, the neoconservative innocents abroad who thought they could quickly transform the Middle East. A few Democrats have tried proposing more pragmatic foreign policies — like treating terrorism as a law-enforcement problem, not a war — but most are terrified of sounding weak because they read the polls.

Despite the Republican failures in Iraq, voters maintain their longstanding mistrust of Democrats' handling of foreign policy. Vic Fingerhut, a Democratic pollster working in battleground states, reported Sunday in The Washington Post that swing voters overwhelmingly trust Republicans on Iraq, terrorism and other foreign policy issues.

On the domestic front, voters still trust Democrats to deal with issues like education and Social Security even though the Democrats have run out of ideas. Their basic educational strategy is to spend more money and keep teachers' unions happy. They have no plan to keep Social Security solvent, except "taxing the rich," which won't do the trick.

The G.O.P.'s Social Security plan last year would have left the poor better off than under the current system, but Republicans couldn't overcome their image as the cruel despoilers of the Democrats' New Deal. They did succeed (with President Clinton's grudging cooperation) in reforming welfare. That did more to break the cycle of poverty than anything done during the Great Society, but in voters' minds the Democrats remained the party of compassion.

Republicans fought to improve schools at the local level by giving more choices and power to students, parents and principals. These reforms (like vouchers and charter schools) were popular in places where Republicans overcame the resistance of Democrats and teachers' unions, but in national polls, voters preferred Democrats to deal with education.

So President Bush abandoned the party's principles and made a deal with Ted Kennedy to enact the No Child Left Behind law, a centralized Democratic-style plan that gave the Republicans a brief boost in the polls. Like previous Democratic plans for reviving education with regulations from Washington, it was an expensive flop, but voters still tell pollsters they trust the Democrats to fix the schools.

Maybe someday a candidate with Republican domestic policies and Democratic foreign policies will miraculously catch fire with voters. For now, the best hope is for a return to divided government and gridlock, so that each party can stop the other from fulfilling its poll-driven agenda.

Of course, if that happens, voters will be complaining to pollsters about how little gets done in Washington. But they won't be as disappointed as they are now.

Allen, Webb In Slashing, Wide-Ranging Debate (WP)

By Michael D. Shear And Tim Craig

RICHMOND, Oct. 9 -- Virginia Sen. George Allen and former Navy secretary James Webb clashed over issues and character in a fast-paced and contentious series of exchanges during the last of four scheduled debates Monday night.

The 60-minute debate, held in Richmond and broadcast live on 19 public and commercial television stations statewide, gave Webb and Allen a chance to highlight the issues they hope will dominate the four weeks before the Nov. 7 election.

For Allen, the Republican, those issues are taxes, same-sex marriage and a dislike of liberals. Webb, running as a Democrat, stressed the Iraq war and economic fairness as he appealed for support from independents and Republicans.

In a campaign marked by personal attacks on character, real issues emerged Monday night. In rapid-fire succession, the candidates sparred over energy independence, immigration, the federal deficit, the Capitol Hill page scandal, the minimum wage and secret spying by the government.

"My opponent doesn't stand with John Warner and me in keeping taxes low," Allen said in his opening statement, referring to Virginia's senior senator, also a Republican. "He stands with Hillary Clinton, John Kerry and the big-government Democrats who want to raise taxes."

Allen was hoping to align Webb with Clinton, of New York, and Kerry, of Massachusetts, two senators widely seen as too liberal for Virginia voters.

When it was his turn, Webb assailed the increase in corporate profits at the expense of wages. And Webb, a decorated veteran whose son is serving as a Marine in Iraq, lashed out, indirectly, at Allen's lack of foreign policy or wartime experience.

"Very few of these leaders are willing to invest their own loved ones in this effort," he said of the war in Iraq. "America needs leaders who understand these divisions and want to repair them, leaders whose experience in foreign policy is formed by experience, not by sound bites."

Allen, who is a former governor and congressman, appeared more comfortable with the fast-paced forum, which gave each man a minute or 30 seconds to answer complex questions. He stuck to his talking points and often looked directly at viewers for impact. Webb, by contrast, seemed to look down at his notes and wasn't as smooth, but he appeared aggressive and not intimidated.

Like the broader campaign being waged on both sides, the exchange provided a nasty, bickering forum for questions about personal honesty and character. Allen was pressed on questions about his racial sensitivity. Webb was confronted with allegations that he demeaned females by opposing women in combat in an article he wrote 27 years ago.

The Virginia Senate campaign has become a focal point in the national battle for control of Congress. On Tuesday, the national Democratic Senate Campaign Committee is expected to begin a nine-day, $1 million advertising blitz on behalf of Webb, according to sources in both campaigns. The committee's GOP counterpart already has paid to mail glossy campaign literature for Allen to hundreds of thousands of voters.

Webb, Navy secretary during Ronald Reagan's presidency, has closed a 16-point Allen advantage to a statistical dead heat. That's not how it was supposed to be. Allen started his reelection campaign this year brimming with confidence and with one eye on Iowa and New Hampshire, as he plotted a possible bid for the presidency in 2008.

The race tightened late this summer after Allen referred to a Democratic volunteer of Indian descent as "macaca," considered a racial slur in some cultures. The gaffe opened Allen up to scrutiny about his past, including his having once displayed a noose in his law office and his admiration as a young man for the Confederate flag.

Allen acknowledged that some of the trouble was his own doing, but he blasted as untrue allegations of racial insensitivity, including allegations that he used an offensive racial epithet about black people in the past.

The debate Monday offered viewers a chance to make direct -- if not particularly deep -- comparisons of the two candidates on many issues. The candidates continued to spar over the war in Iraq, responding to a question from the moderator, Russ Mitchell of CBS News, about the 2,700 Americans killed since the war began.

Allen has accused Webb of wanting to "cut and run" from Iraq. Allen says that he hopes U.S. troops can come home soon but that they must continue to fight in Iraq to prevent terrorists from operating there.

"We must persevere," Allen said. "We cannot be a country that just loses faith in our ability to protect ourselves. . . . Our goal is to make sure Iraq is a country that is on our side on the war on terror."

In past debates and on the campaign trail, Webb has called the war "a strategic blunder of historic proportions" and criticized Allen for not asking tougher questions about President Bush's conduct of the war and its aftermath.

During the debate, he responded to Allen's contention that Democrats would leave Iraq as a haven for terrorists. "Nobody wants to see terrorism in Iraq or elsewhere," Webb said. He reiterated his position that peace and stability could be achieved in Iraq through diplomacy involving other countries, including those in the region.

The debate gave Allen and Webb several opportunities to question each other directly, leading to several testy arguments that left Mitchell trying to restore order.

Allen repeatedly attacked Webb for what he said was his support for tax increases, citing Webb's statements questioning tax cuts championed by Bush. In an earlier debate, Webb said, "I don't understand how you can have a tax cut and be spending $500 billion on the war."

On Monday, Webb said the comment was meant to suggest only that he would roll back tax cuts for the wealthy, not tax cuts for married couples or cuts in estate taxes as Allen has contended in a television commercial and asserted again during the debate.

"I never said that I would agree with tax increases that you used in your ad," Webb said.

When Webb got the opportunity to question Allen, he went after what he has called Allen's lack of foreign policy knowledge.

Allen, who stumped Webb this summer during the first debate with a question about a port project on Craney Island in the Hampton Roads area, was left almost speechless Monday when Webb queried him about the Senkaku Islands off the coast of Taiwan. "I'll have to study it," a clearly baffled Allen said. Webb then lectured him about the island's strategic importance to Southeast Asia.

The candidates offered starkly different assessments of the proposed Virginia constitutional amendment on November's ballot that would ban same-sex marriage and civil unions.

Webb said he opposes gay marriage but believes the amendment would also affect contracts and agreements between heterosexual partners and friends.

Allen said he supports the amendment as a way to keep "elitist judges" from granting gays the right to marry despite Virginia laws to the contrary. "This is a way to protect the values and view of the people of Virginia," he said.

In response to a question about day-laborer centers in Herndon, Allen said Webb's positions on immigration would reward illegal behavior. "This is a country that that has been built by legal immigrants, and we should not be rewarding illegal behavior," Allen said.

Webb accused Bush and the Republican-controlled Congress of failing to secure the borders, making the day-laborer centers a necessary step for local governments.

Allen called for a balanced-budget amendment and a line-item veto to help control spending. Webb, who railed against corporate profits, said big companies should pay more.

Allen questioned Webb's commitment to the war on terrorism, asking whether he supported the National Security Agency's wiretappingWebb said he understands the need for such spying but would insist on oversight from Congress and judges.

Allen, Webb Spar One Last Time (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

RICHMOND -- U.S. Sen. George Allen and James H. Webb Jr. last night sparred over taxes and the war in Iraq during their last debate before next month's general election.

Mr. Allen, a Republican first elected to the Senate in 2000, opened by reminding Virginians that he has cut taxes, abolished parole and reformed the welfare system as governor in the 1990s. He also said that Mr. Webb would raise taxes, costing each Virginia family $2,000.

"If you allow me a second term ... I am going to make the best of it," Mr. Allen said, adding that he will be a senator "who will stand with John Warner and not Hillary Clinton."

Mr. Allen, who also is a former congressman and state delegate, repeatedly tried to paint his opponent as a liberal who would take his cues from "friends" such as Mrs. Clinton.

Mr. Webb, a Republican turned Democrat who served as President Reagan's secretary of the Navy, said that the tax accusation isn't true and told voters there is a disparity between the wealthiest Americans and corporate executives and everyday Virginians.

"America needs leaders who understand these divisions and want to repair them," he said. "Leaders whose views on foreign policy are informed by experience, not sound bites."

Mr. Webb, a decorated Vietnam veteran whose own son is serving in Iraq, has portrayed Mr. Allen as a rubber stamp for President Bush who failed to prevent the country from going to war.

"We need to get a diplomatic solution," he said, criticizing Mr. Allen for using "propagandistic" phrases such as "Stay the course."

Mr. Allen repeated his campaign line that he wants U.S. troops "to come home as soon as possible ... in victory and not defeat." He added that he differs from Mr. Webb in thinking that "we're not occupiers, we're liberators in Iraq."

Mr. Webb said that Congress has failed to provide oversight of some of the Bush administration's programs, included the National Security Agency's terrorist surveillance program.

On torture, Mr. Webb said the U.S. should take the "moral high ground" and act according to the Geneva Convention. "I know what it's like to be out there worrying about if I was going to be taken prisoner," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0076832

The the League of Women Voters was host of the debate held at the Richmond studios of Community Idea Stations. It will be rebroadcast in the Richmond area at 9 p.m. Thursday, at 3 p.m. Oct. 22 and at 9 p.m. Oct. 31. It is also scheduled to be replayed on C-SPAN.

Independent candidate Gail Parker, whose main issue is securing funding for Metrorail in Northern Virginia, was not invited to participate. Last night she sat in the front row.

"If I wasn't in this race, there would be no candidate for me to vote for," she said before the debate.

Mr. Allen scored points when he called for a "taxpayers' bill of rights" and then asked Mr. Webb how many Virginians have benefited from Mr. Bush's tax cuts, which Mr. Webb has criticized and the senator wants to make permanent.

Mr. Webb did not answer, and Mr. Allen responded that 3 million residents have been helped by the cuts, which are set to expire.

However, Mr. Webb said the costly Iraq war makes tax cuts for the wealthy impractical. "You can't keep spending like this without increasing revenue," he said.

Republicans have given many of the wealthiest people and the largest companies tax breaks while health care and education costs for the poor and middle class have skyrocketed, Mr. Webb said.

Mr. Allen said that he favors a proposed state constitutional amendment that would define marriage as "a way to protect the values and views of the people of Virginia from judges who want to impose their own elitist views."

Mr. Webb said that he thinks marriage should be between one man and one woman but added that he opposes the measure because it is unnecessary and would harm unmarried heterosexual couples.

On immigration, Mr. Allen said he opposed the "comprehensive" Senate immigration bill because it rewards illegal aliens.

Mr. Webb said the Bush administration has "failed" to deal with immigration problems, and noted that day-laborer shelters such as the one in Herndon are a good short-term solution for businesses plagued by loitering.

Mr. Allen opened himself to scrutiny in August when he called an Indian-American Webb volunteer "macaca," which is considered a racial slur in some cultures.

After that, several people who knew Mr. Allen when he was a University of Virginia student accused him of regularly using a racial slur to describe blacks.

Last night, Mr. Allen dismissed the stories as "baseless," saying they don't reflect "who I am" or how he was raised. He added: "I don't recall using that word."

Mr. Allen has apologized frequently for the "macaca" comment, saying he made up the word.

Mr. Webb has been criticized for his 1979 article "Women Can't Fight," which questioned the role of women in military billets.

The debate was crucial for each candidate, as there is less than a month remaining before the election. Polls show Mr. Allen with a slight lead or tied with Mr. Webb.

Today is the deadline for Virginians to register to vote in the Nov. 7 election.

Stock Options Held By Allen Not Disclosed To Congress (WP)

By Michael D. Shear

RICHMOND, Oct. 9 -- Sen. George Allen did not disclose to Congress that he owned stock options in a Virginia high-tech company and has now requested an opinion from the Senate Ethics Committee about whether that failure violated Senate rules.

Allen (R-Va.) received options on 15,000 shares of stock in Commonwealth Biotechnologies Inc. after serving on its board of directors between the end of his term as governor and his election to the Senate. He disclosed the options before his first Senate term in 2001 but has not reported his continued ownership of them since, campaign officials said Monday.

That failure to disclose, as first reported by the Associated Press, has prompted criticism of Allen as he battles for a second term in the Senate against Democratic challenger James Webb.

Webb spokeswoman Kristian Denny Todd called for an investigation of the allegations by Republican leaders in the Senate. "If true, these allegations represent a serious betrayal of the voters of Virginia," she said.

Allen spokesman Dan Allen said Monday that the senator did not report the stock options after the first year because his attorneys interpreted the Senate's written rules to mean he did not have to.

"We were following guidelines based on the reporting disclosures," said Dan Allen, no relation to the senator. "It was a matter of public record. He certainly wasn't hiding anything."

All members of the Senate and the U.S. House of Representatives are required to report their finances annually to Congress. They must list their assets, such as homes, investment holdings and salaries, as well as liabilities.

Under terms of Allen's stock options, he can buy the Commonwealth shares at $7.50 each.

The company's stock closed at $2.58 per share Monday, making the options worthless today, but potentially valuable if the stock rises above $7.50. The Senate's disclosure instructions say that options that are not vested or are "contingent upon the occurrence of some future event" need not be disclosed.

But Dan Allen said the senator recently became aware that the Senate Ethics Manual requires annual disclosure of options, even when they are currently worthless. He said the senator will abide by the decision of the ethics committee.

"We have clearly, proactively gone to the ethics committee," Dan Allen said. "Of course, the Webb campaign is going to launch attacks on this. They understand if it gets away from the issues, ideas and Allen's past performance of service, they have a chance of winning this race."

Sheila Krumholz, acting executive director of the nonpartisan Center for Responsive Politics, said Allen's defense -- that the options were worthless -- should not excuse him from having to disclose that he owned them.

"It doesn't matter whether the exercise price is above or below the current stock price," she said. "What matters is you own it, you have it and at some point it may be worth money."

Krumholz said that public disclosure about ownership of such stock options helps voters decide whether lawmakers are making policy decisions that also enrich themselves. There is no evidence that Allen did anything to boost the stock price of Commonwealth.

"If it is worthless today, and then worth millions next year, then it's of enormous interest whether the representative or senator made decisions based on their potential financial gain," Krumholz said.

Allen's staff also acknowledged Monday that the senator had written a letter on behalf of another Virginia company in which he owned stock.

In the December 2001 letter, furnished by Allen campaign officials, the senator urged the Army to expedite a decision regarding a contract with Xybernaut, another Virginia high-tech company. Allen also has served on Xybernaut's board.

"Your immediate attention and expeditious assistance with the requests and concerns expressed in this case would be greatly appreciated," Allen wrote in the five-sentence letter to Army officials as Xybernaut vied for a Army with the service.

Campaign officials said that the request by Xybernaut was turned down and that Allen's only intervention was in a form letter. The office provided copies of similar letters written on behalf of other Virginia companies that contained the exact language. The AP also first reported about the Xybernaut letter.

This is not the first time Allen has faced inquiries about his corporate dealings.

In 2001, news reports surfaced that Allen had reported a $279,000, one-time payment from stock options he received as an advisory board member at Com-Net Ericsson, a high-tech company in Lynchburg, Va.

Allen joined the Com-Net board in 2000 after helping the company expand while governor.

The payment was made after Allen received a ruling from the Senate Ethics Committee that the compensation did not violate Senate rules.

"Senator Allen takes this very seriously," Dan Allen said. "He's always been open and honest."

Mr. Allen's Ethics (WP)

The Washington Post, October 10, 2006

After he left the Virginia governor's mansion in 1998 and before he entered the U.S. Senate in 2001, George F. Allen of Virginia did what out-of-office politicians often do: He tried to make some money. As it happens, a number of companies that he had assisted as a pro-business Republican governor returned the favor once he was a private citizen by inviting him to join their boards and furnishing him with potentially valuable stock options. One of them was a high-tech government contractor called Com-Net Ericsson, whose stock options translated into a one-time windfall for Mr. Allen worth $279,000 in 2001. As governor, Mr. Allen had helped Com-Net with its expansion plans.

It is not illegal for a governor to help out companies while in office and then join with them once he leaves -- though one can certainly question the ethics of doing so. However, it becomes a potentially graver problem when a U.S. senator owns options to buy a substantial quantity of a government contractor's stock -- and then goes to bat for that company with an arm of the federal government.

That's apparently what Mr. Allen did, in his first year in the Senate, when he intervened with the U.S. Army on behalf of a government contractor called Xybernaut Corp. According to the Associated Press, Mr. Allen joined Xybernaut's board shortly after leaving the governor's office; at the time he was urging the Army to help the firm, he still owned options to buy 110,000 shares of the company's stock. Had the Army heeded Mr. Allen's request and come down in Xybernaut's favor, the firm's stock price might well have gone up.

The Army did not give Xybernaut what it wanted and, according to Mr. Allen's aides, the senator offered no further help. Eventually, Mr. Allen sold his Xybernaut stock at a loss, he told the Associated Press. Still, his aides didn't dispute that Mr. Allen, in his official capacity, intervened on behalf of a firm in which he had a financial interest.

The AP also reported that for the past five years -- years in which he filed annual disclosure reports -- Mr. Allen did not report his stock options in a firm called Commonwealth Biotechnologies Inc., on whose board Mr. Allen also served. The senator's explanation is that he believed the options were worthless, since the option purchase price exceeded the stock's market value. That is beside the point. What is relevant is that Mr. Allen has a financial stake in Commonwealth, which as a government contractor may have business before Congress.

Mr. Allen says his financial dealings have been aboveboard. But in these cases they appear to reflect at best an ethical sloppiness.

Allen Manages To Create A Diversion (WP)

By Marc Fisher

Suddenly, macaca, Jewish heritage and racial slurs are yesterday's news. Look through Virginia's newspapers, look even at the partisan blogs that relish hitting Sen. George Allen as hard as they can: The feeding frenzy has subsided. The waters seem almost calm again.

The Allen campaign must be, as the senator's ancestors might have put it, kvelling (Yiddish for bursting with pride.) Without going through the ritual Oprah-style confessional purification, Allen and his strategists have managed to steer attention away from his awful few weeks and back onto far more comfortable turf for the one-term senator who still harbors hopes of becoming president.

How did the Allen camp achieve this remarkable turnaround? Simple. They announced that they were changing the subject. All it took was a few moves, none of them particularly exotic:

Â· Allen launched an "Issues, Ideas and Record Tour" of friendly locales where he talked, albeit without many specifics, about "issues."

Â· The campaign announced that the senator would go on TV -- not to address claims that in college he regularly used racial slurs, not to justify his verbal attack on an Indian American working for his opponent's campaign and not to explain why he reacted so negatively when asked about his family's Jewish background. No, all the campaign said was that Allen would make a "major address." That the two-minute TV ad was neither major nor much of an address didn't matter; the moment became a turning point in the Allen campaign.

Â· Allen strategists rolled out the candidate's wife to stand by his side -- literally -- during the "major address," smiling admiringly. Then Susan Allen sat for a Washington Post interview that helped soften the senator's image.

Â· Day after day, Allen presented new endorsements from blacks -- a Democratic legislator, ministers, community leaders. Message: It's okay to go back in the water.

All of this dovetailed beautifully with the Allen campaign's new offensive, a redoubled attack on Democratic challenger Jim Webb for being anti-woman because of a 27-year-old magazine piece Webb wrote arguing against enrolling women at the U.S. Naval Academy. Webb responded reasonably effectively to Allen's TV ad, but it hardly mattered. The subject had been changed.

Still, the Allen camp is hardly home free. Allen's lawyer has admitted this week that the senator failed to disclosed to Congress stock options he received after serving as a director of Commonwealth Biotechnologies Inc., a Virginia company. And even once the bleeding from macaca and the racial slurs was stanched, Allen seemed to remain on the wrong side of public opinion on the Iraq war.

Allen had taken the harshest imaginable, least independent stance in favor of the Bush policy in Iraq: Everything was going fine, no need to pull out, no need to second-guess the war effort. But now, he has used this shift in the campaign's subject matter to change direction. Here's George Allen tacking to the center, alertly taking advantage of Sen. John Warner's conversion to the skeptical side. In a conference call with reporters Friday, Allen awkwardly embraced his fellow Virginian's assessment that things are going poorly in Iraq.

Never mind that Allen's new stance -- the war is a failure, but we have to stay the course -- makes little sense. And Allen didn't go quite as far as Warner, who said that if U.S. forces don't show major progress in 30 to 60 days, it will be time for "bold action," presumably the old Monty Python battle call: "Run away!"

Despite the logical holes in his new position, Allen manages to come off as more independent and honest than many Republicans, such as Maryland Senate candidate Michael Steele (who resorted to a thinly veiled off-the-record lunch to slip in his critical comments about his party's failed foreign policy).

How has Allen been permitted to do all this? Why hasn't the Webb campaign taken advantage of the moment to raise further questions about Allen's credibility and character? Where are the stories trying to square the young man who relished using racial slurs with the senator who went on pilgrimages to absorb the story of the civil rights movement? How did Allen grow up to hold the archaic racial attitudes he seems to have proudly displayed through much of his life? What have his professional relationships with blacks been like through the years?

George Allen runs a savvy campaign and knows how to work the media and public opinion. But we still don't know what really goes on in the heart and head of Virginia's junior senator. Who will demand answers to these questions -- the Webb campaign? Editors and reporters? Virginia's voters?

National Democrats Give Webb A Boost (RTD)

By JEFF E. SCHAPIRO

Richmond Times-Dispatch, October 10, 2006

National Democrats are placing nearly $1 million in television advertising for U.S. Senate hopeful Jim Webb, opening with a commercial spotlighting Republican incumbent George Allen's macaca moment.

The ad could be on the air today in the state's three biggest broadcast markets -- Hampton Roads, Richmond and Northern Virginia.

Sources said yesterday that the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, political arm of the Senate Democratic caucus, is paying for the commercial. Spokesman Phil Singer had no comment.

The TV buy -- described as just less than $1 million -- is a long-awaited lifeline for Webb, who is even with Allen in recent polls. Though he trails in fundraising, Webb has closed the gap in the wake of Allen miscues.

This includes Allen's use of an obscure racial slur -- "macaca" to describe an Indian-American volunteer for Webb. Allen said he made up the word, which refers to a genus of monkey. Widely circulated video from the incident was woven into the Democratic ad.

The 30-second spot also refers to Allen's opposition to a Democratic budget amendment to purchase body armor for troops assigned to Iraq.

The commercial, to be most heavily broadcast in vote-rich Northern Virginia, notes Allen's resistance to an increase in the federal minimum wage and contributions to his campaign from oil companies.

The Allen campaign said the ad, running after U.S. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., pledged $2 million to the DSCC, is evidence that Webb is captive to liberal out-of-state interests.

"This is further proof that Jim Webb has been bought and paid for by Hillary Clinton," said Allen strategist Christopher J. LaCivita.

A spokeswoman for the Webb campaign could not be reached for comment.

The commercial was produced for the DSCC by Jim Mulhall, an adviser to then-U.S. Sen. Charles S. Robb, D-Va., in his losing campaign to Allen in 2000. Mulhall declined to comment.

Virginia Senator Did Not Disclose Stock Options (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, October 9, 2006

RICHMOND, Va., Oct. 8 (AP) — For the past five years, Senator George Allen, Republican of Virginia, has failed to tell Congress about stock options he got for his work as a director of a high-tech company.

Congressional rules require senators to disclose to the Senate all deferred compensation, like stock options. The rules also urge senators to avoid taking any official action that could benefit them financially or appear to do so.

Mr. Allen's stock options date to the period from January 1998 to January 2001, after his term as governor of Virginia and before he took office as senator.

The Associated Press reviewed his financial dealings from that time and found that he had twice failed to promptly alert the Securities and Exchange Commission of insider stock transactions as a director of Xybernaut and of Commonwealth Biotechnologies.

In interviews, Mr. Allen and his staff sought to play down his corporate dealings, saying they were a good learning experience but did not lead to any large amounts of money, except for a $250,000 windfall from Com-Net Ericsson stock.

Mr. Allen's office said he had sold his Xybernaut stock at a loss and had not cashed in his Commonwealth options because they cost more than the stock is now worth. The senator also said he saw no conflict in going to work for companies shortly after assisting them as governor.

"I actually got no money out of Xybernaut," he said. "I got paid in stock options, which were worthless."

Mr. Allen's office said he did not report his Commonwealth options because their purchase price was higher than the current market value. Mr. Allen viewed them as worthless and believed he did not have to report them, aides said.

Kathleen Clark, a law professor at Washington University in St. Louis, a former prosecutor and a former Democratic Congressional aide, said, "As an ethical matter, it's irrelevant whether the exercise price of those stock options is above or below the current market price."

"If he owns stock options," Ms. Clark added, "he does have such a financial stake."

Mr. Allen's office acknowledged that he had met socially over the years with company executives and that his office had granted "routine courtesy meetings" to company lobbyists "to hear their opinion on legislation and issues before the federal government."

John Reid, a spokesman for Mr. Allen, said he was aware of only one instance in which Mr. Allen's office had helped a former company. That came in December 2001 when Mr. Allen asked the Army to resolve a lingering issue with Xybernaut. The company asked Mr. Allen to intervene, and he urged the Army to give Xybernaut an answer, Mr. Reid said. At the time, Mr. Allen still owned options to buy 110,000 shares of Xybernaut stock, which could have been affected by new federal contracts.

The Army answered but did not give Xybernaut what it wanted, and Mr. Allen did nothing more, Mr. Reid said.

As governor, Mr. Allen took representatives of Xybernaut and Ericsson on trade missions. He helped steer $4 million in tax-exempt bonds to Commonwealth for a new headquarters and announced an $800,000 state grant to help Lynchburg prepare a site for an Ericsson expansion.

Allen Broke Rules By Not Disclosing His Stock Options (WT/AP)

RICHMOND -- Sen. George Allen has failed for the past five years to tell Congress about the stock options he got for his work as a director of a high-tech company. Mr. Allen, a Virginia Republican running for re-election, also asked the Army to help another business that gave him similar options.

Congressional rules require senators to disclose all deferred compensation, such as stock options. The rules also urge senators to avoid taking official action that could benefit them financially or appear to do so.

The requirements allow the public to police lawmakers for possible conflicts of interest, especially those involving companies with government business.

Mr. Allen has stock options from January 1998 to January 2001 when he was between political jobs and had plunged into the corporate world.

A review of his financial dealings from that time found that the senator:

•Joined three Virginia high-tech companies that he assisted as governor. Mr. Allen served on boards of directors for Xybernaut and Commonwealth Biotechnologies and advised Com-Net Ericsson, all government contractors.

•Twice failed to promptly alert the Securities and Exchange Commission of insider-stock transactions as a Xybernaut and Commonwealth director. The agency requires timely notification and can fine those who file late.

• Kept stock options for serving as a director of Xybernaut and Commonwealth, but steered other compensation from his board service to his law firm.

Mr. Allen, is running for re-election against Democrat James H. Webb Jr. and is a potential 2008 presidential candidate.

He also has served in the U.S. House and as governor. From 1998 through 2000, he worked as a private lawyer and businessman before his election to the Senate.

Mr. Allen and his staff have downplayed his corporate dealings, saying they were a good learning experience but did not lead to extraordinary riches -- except for a quarter-million-dollar windfall from Com-Net Ericsson stock.

Mr. Allen's office said the senator sold his Xybernaut stock at a loss and has not cashed in his Commonwealth options because they cost more than the stock is now worth. Mr. Allen also said he saw no conflict in going to work for companies shortly after assisting them as governor.

"I actually got no money out of Xybernaut," he said. "I got paid in stock options, which were worthless. Commonwealth Biotech asked me to be on their board. Glad to do it. I learned a lot on their board and enjoyed working with 'em, and they seem to be doing all right, I guess."

Mr. Allen's office also said the senator did not report his Commonwealth options on his past five Senate disclosure reports because their purchase price was higher than the market value. Mr. Allen viewed them as worthless and believed in "good faith" that he did not have to report them, aides said.

Mr. Allen disclosed the options once -- on an amendment to his 2000 ethics report filed three months after the normal filing period ended. He excluded the options from subsequent reports.

When Mr. Allen's lawyer was shown the Senate ethics manual requirement that such options must be reported each year regardless of value, the lawyer said he was unfamiliar with the provision. Mr. Allen has asked the Senate ethics committee for an opinion on whether he should have disclosed them.

"While we continue to believe that we have disclosed more than is required, we will abide by the formal ruling of the committee," Allen spokesman John Reid said.

Congressional rules require senators to disclose all deferred compensation, such as stock options. The rules also urge senators to avoid taking any official action that could benefit them financially or appear to do so.

Options give the holder the future right to buy stock at a fixed price that could be lower than the market value at the time of purchase.

At issue are Allen's stock options from January 1998 to January 2001 when he was between political jobs.

Allen joined Commonwealth's board about two months after leaving the governor's office in January 1998. Xybernaut named him a director that August, and he became a Com-Net Ericsson adviser in February 2000.

The senator said he saw no conflict in going to work for companies shortly after assisting them as governor. "I actually got no money out of Xybernaut. I got paid in stock options, which were worthless. Commonwealth Biotech asked me to be on their board. Glad to do it," Allen said.

Mo. candidates spar on Iraq, scandal

Missouri Sen. Jim Talent clashed Sunday with Democratic challenger Claire McCaskill in a debate on NBC's Meet the Press that centered on Iraq and the congressional page scandal. Talent said he still would have voted to go to war in Iraq even if he had known in 2002 that U.S. intelligence was wrong in concluding Iraq possessed weapons of mass destruction. McCaskill, the state auditor, urged military leaders to consider redeploying U.S. troops out of Iraq over the next two years "give or take."

McCaskill also said House Speaker Dennis Hastert should resign for failing to properly investigate reports of former congressman Mark Foley's inappropriate e-mails to male teens. Talent said it was premature to demand resignations until an investigation is complete.

Wanted: More election workers in Md.

Maryland elections officials are trying to find more Republican poll workers to avoid delayed poll openings that marred the Sept. 12 primary. GOP Gov. Robert Ehrlich sent a letter to state employees seeking volunteers, and the Baltimore mayor's office mailed letters last week to city Republicans. Mayor Martin O'Malley, a Democrat, is challenging Ehrlich. State law requires that precincts with more than 200 registered voters have at least two election judges present from each of the major parties.

Mo. Candidates Debate Foley, Iraq War (AP-Y)

By Sam Hananel, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 9, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0076839

Candidates in Missouri's hotly contested Senate race clashed Sunday over the congressional page sex scandal and the war in Iraq, with the Democratic challenger saying House Speaker Dennis Hastert should quit.

Missouri state auditor Claire McCaskill said Hastert, R-Ill., and other GOP leaders failed to properly investigate when they first learned of former Rep. Mark Foley's e-mails to congressional pages.

"When a 50-year old man is asking a teenage boy on the Internet for his picture, the response needs to be something other than 'I better go tell the chairman of the Republican campaign committee,' " McCaskill said.

Republican Sen. Jim Talent said it was premature to demand resignations until a formal investigation is complete. The House ethics committee is conducting a probe.

"We need to find out who knew what, we need to have a zero tolerance policy and let the chips fall where they may," Talent said.

The Missouri race is considered a must-win for Democrats, who need to gain six seats to recapture control of the Senate. Recent polls show the candidates running about even.

Much of the candidates' debate Sunday on NBC's "Meet the Press" focused on Iraq and national security. Talent described McCaskill's views as weak on fighting terrorism, criticizing her for opposing President Bush's domestic surveillance policy and for calling on Bush to redeploy troops from Iraq over a two-year period.

McCaskill, in turn, portrayed Talent's views as those of a politician who has spent too long in Washington.

Talent insisted that, had he been in the Senate in 2002, he would have voted to go to war in Iraq even if he had known that U.S. intelligence was wrong in concluding Iraq possessed weapons of mass destruction. He said ousting Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein was necessary to eliminate him as a threat to the region, including any attempt to revive Iraq's nuclear program.

Asked whether the $300 billion spent on Iraq could have been better spent fighting terrorism elsewhere, Talent said the money represented just 1 percent of the U.S. gross domestic product.

"Clearly he's been in Washington too long if he doesn't think $300 billion is not a lot of money," McCaskill retorted.

Knowing what she knows now, McCaskill said, she would not have voted for war. She called for military leaders to consider redeploying U.S. troops out of Iraq over the next two years or so, and said she agreed with the assessment of Sen. John Warner, R-Va., that Iraq is "drifting sideways."

On other issues, Talent defended his opposition to embryonic stem cell research, which has become a major sticking point in the race. Missouri voters are weighing a ballot initiative that would amend the state constitution to protect all federally allowed forms of stem cell research.

McCaskill, who has made her support for the research a cornerstone of her campaign, said the ballot measure prohibits human cloning and offers hope for future treatment of various diseases.

McCaskill would not apologize for comments she made last month in which she claimed that Bush had "let people die on rooftops in New Orleans because they were poor and because they were black" during Hurricane Katrina.

"I was acknowledging what Americans believed at the time," she said, though she added that she "probably should have said it another way."

Talent, whose House voting record agrees with Bush's agenda 94 percent of the time, dismissed any notion that he could face a backlash from anti-Bush voters. Talent said he is independent and differs from Bush over immigration, farm policy, highway funding and other issues.

"Why don't they ever say in those surveys that the president agreed with me a certain percentage of the time?" Talent said. "I've been in public life a lot longer than he has."

Tight Missouri Senate Race Takes 'Meet The Press' Spotlight (SLPD)

By Deirdre Shesgreen

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, October 9, 2006

WASHINGTON — Republican Sen. Jim Talent and Democratic rival Claire McCaskill sparred over Iraq, terrorism, stem cell research, and the leadership of President George W. Bush in a 40-minute nationally televised debate on Sunday.

DOJ_NMG_0076840

Engaged in one of the tightest and most closely watched races in the country, Talent and McCaskill disagreed on the first question out of the box on NBC's "Meet the Press": Whether House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., should resign amid questions about his handling of the congressional page sex scandal.

McCaskill, Missouri's state auditor, said yes.

She contended the scandal involving ex-Rep. Mark Foley's e-mails to House pages demonstrated "an arrogance of power."

"It is about holding on to power instead of about doing the right thing."

Talent asserted, however, that Hastert doesn't need to resign - at least not yet.

"I'm comfortable with the investigation moving forward," Talent said, "and the people who were responsible taking the consequences. And that's up to, and including, the speaker."

Polls show the race to be a dead heat, one of a handful of contests that will determine which party controls the Senate after November.

Sunday's exchange focused heavily on terrorism and Iraq, with commentator Tim Russert grilling both candidates about the war.

He asked Talent how he could assert, as the senator recently did, that the U.S. is making progress in Iraq and the mission is going well, when U.S. military and Iraqi civilian casualties are spiraling.

Talent responded that the level of violence was "unacceptable" but that he still believed the U.S. had made progress. "Saddam is gone and the threat he represented is gone," he said.

Talent accused McCaskill of being "weak" on the war against terrorism, saying she wants to set an "artificial" timeline for withdrawal from Iraq. He pointed to questions she has raised over the president's warrantless wiretapping program and a recent military trial bill that prevents terrorism suspects from challenging their detention in court.

McCaskill strongly rejected the suggestion that she was weak on terrorism, saying she supports giving the president the tools he needs to do proper surveillance. And she defended her call for a phased, two-year redeployment of U.S. troops from Iraq to other countries in the region.

"Iraq is a mess," she said. "If you're in a hole, you need to quit digging. We are breeding a culture of dependence. We are not breeding a democracy."

Talent said he still would have voted for the war even if he knew in advance that there were no weapons of mass destruction. Asked how long he would support keeping 145,000 U.S. troops there, he said "we have to be there until the mission is done."

Bush and Clinton

In response to a question from Russert, Talent also dismissed any notion that the $300 billion spent in Iraq might have been better spent in Afghanistan or on domestic security at home. Talent said the tab for Iraq and Afghanistan was only 1 percent of the gross domestic product and that Iraq was "an important front on the war on terror."

McCaskill quickly shot back: "Sen. Talent, I think, just said the $300 billion was not a lot of money. Clearly, he's been in Washington too long if he doesn't think $300 billion is a lot of money."

McCaskill accused Talent of not holding the administration accountable for mistakes in the war.

For Talent, one of the most uncomfortable moments of the debate seemed to come after Russert played a series of clips of Bush praising Talent and noted that Talent had voted with the president 94 percent of the time. Russert asked the senator whether Bush was a great president.

Talent wouldn't give a clear answer. "History judges presidents," Talent said, sitting beside a gleeful-looking McCaskill. "History is going to say there were some things he did that were right and some things he did that were wrong."

McCaskill ridiculed Talent's response, and when asked the same question about former President Bill Clinton, she quipped: "He's been a great leader, but I don't want my daughter near him."

McCaskill did a little squirming herself, when Russert asked her whether she would apologize for saying that Bush let people in New Orleans die "because they were poor and because they were black."

At first, she did not back down, saying that she was voicing how "millions of Americans felt," although she added, "I do not believe the president is a racist."

DOJ_NMG_0076841

Pressed again, she said, "Maybe I shouldn't have said it that way - but the feelings are real." She said "our citizens died because we couldn't get them food or water. This is not an administration that's ready to protect us."

Stem cell issue

The two candidates also exchanged sharp jabs over stem cell research - one of the hottest issues in the Missouri campaign.

Earlier this year, Talent withdrew his support for a federal human cloning ban that some critics said would also outlaw crucial stem cell research. But he opposes a Missouri referendum that would protect certain kinds of stem cell research.

Asked by Russert about his switch, Talent said the state referendum would "create an unqualified constitutional right to clone at the earliest stages of human life."

Russert asked McCaskill how she could support a form of research that some have said is equivalent to abortion.

"My faith directs me to heal the sick," she said. "I come down on the side of hope, hope for cures and for supporting science."

Talent And McCaskill Clash On Iraq And The Foley Case (GNN)

By Pamela Brogan

Gannett News Service, October 9, 2006

Washingon — Missouri's Senate candidates clashed today on NBC's "Meet the Press" over issues ranging from Iraq to the congressional page scandal.

"Iraq is a mess," Claire McCaskill, the Democratic state auditor said.

"We can either stay the course or we can change the course."

Republican Sen. Jim Talent insisted that that he still would have voted to go to war in Iraq even if he had known in 2002 that Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein did not have weapons of mass destruction.

"I think it was the only possible strategic choice," Talent said. "He represented a threat to us. That threat is now gone," Talent said.

Talent also said that the U.S. has to "finish the mission" but acknowledged that when Congress voted to go to war "the administration and many underestimated the time it would take to stabilize the central part of the country."

Both candidates, who are the parents of teens, expressed disgust over the scandal involving former Rep. Mark Foley, R-Fla.

McCaskill, a former prosecutor, said House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., should resign because Republicans leaders failed to properly investigate when they learned that Foley was sending lurid Internet messages to teenage congressional pages.

"I know this: that when a 50-year-old man is asking a teenage boy on the Internet for his picture, the response needs to be something other than, 'I better go tell the chairman of the Republican campaign committee,'" McCaskill said.

She said the scandal is about an "arrogance of power" and "about holding onto power instead of doing the right thing."

Talent said that Congress needs to have a "zero tolerance policy" for such behavior, but said it was too early to demand resignations before the House Ethics Committee completes its probe.

"This is something that transcends politics," Talent said. "This is a question of protecting these pages and making sure their parents and the public have confidence in the system."

The Missouri race is one of six Senate contests that are tossups. Democrats need six seats to regain control of the Senate, making those races top priorities for Republicans. A poll Friday by USA Today and Gallup Poll found that among 577 likely Missouri voters, 48 percent support McCaskill and 45 percent favor Talent. The poll's margin of error is 5 percentage points.

Both candidates fielded several questions about Iraq and national security.

Talent called McCaskill's views on the war against terror "comprehensively positions of weaknesses."

He criticized her for supporting a withdrawal of troops within two years and for opposing President Bush's domestic surveillance policy.

McCaskill said that Talent, a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, has not asked the Bush administration enough tough questions about the war or held it accountable for its mistakes.

"We should be saying, 'How do we get out of this mess?' Not, "this is a good policy, a sound policy, we need to continue down this road.'"

Moderator Tim Russert asked both candidates whether the $300 billion spent on the Iraq conflict could have been better spent in Afghanistan or on domestic programs.

"No, I think this is an important front on the war on terror," Talent said.

"What we've spent on Iraq and Afghanistan in total is one percent of the gross domestic product (the sum of all goods and services produced in the U.S.)," he added.

McCaskill said that she believed that Talent was implying that $300 billion "was not a lot of money."

"Clearly, he's been in Washington too long, if he doesn't think that $300 billion is a lot of money," she said.

Talent Stresses Independence From Bush (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 9, 2006

Missouri Sen. Jim Talent tried to distance himself from President Bush yesterday in a nationally televised debate, during which he and his Democratic opponent, Claire McCaskill, argued over Iraq and stem-cell research.

Tim Russert, host of NBC's "Meet the Press," challenged both candidates on their past statements -- asking Mr. Talent about his ties to the poorly polling president and Mrs. McCaskill about her insinuating Mr. Bush is a racist.

Mr. Talent blanched when Mr. Russert noted that Mr. Bush has campaigned for him in Missouri at least four times, and the senator has voted with the president 94 percent of the time, according to Congressional Quarterly.

"Why don't they ever say in those surveys that the president agreed with me a certain percentage of the time?" Mr. Talent asked. "I've been in public life a lot longer than he has. When I went in the Congress, I think he was still running the Texas Rangers. He's come a little bit further, I guess, than I have since then."

Mr. Talent, first elected as a representative in 1992, contended that he is independent of Mr. Bush on immigration, farm policy and highway funding.

The senator opposed the "comprehensive" immigration plan that most senators and the president supported. He said it equates to amnesty for illegal aliens.

Mr. Russert also got tough on Mrs. McCaskill, the state auditor, over these September comments: "George Bush let people die on rooftops in New Orleans because they were poor and because they were black."

When asked whether she should apologize for her remark, first reported by St. Louis blog Pub Def Weekly, Mrs. McCaskill didn't back down.

"I was acknowledging what Americans believed at the time. I don't believe he's a racist," she said. "I probably should have said it another way, but the feelings are real."

The two candidates are neck and neck in one of the nation's most closely watched races, a key race for Democrats hoping to regain Senate control.

The Iraq war provided sharp contrast between Mr. Talent and Mrs. McCaskill, with the incumbent saying the U.S. has "made progress" despite escalating troop casualties and the Democrat calling the prolonged conflict a "mess."

Mr. Talent, who called his challenger's views on wiretapping and detainee treatment "weak," said he would still have voted for the Iraq war had he known there were no weapons of mass destruction, because he thought removing Saddam Hussein from power was crucial to the war on terrorism. "It was the only possible strategic choice," he said.

Mrs. McCaskill said equating Iraq with the war on terrorism is an attempt to confuse voters in an election year and said she wants the U.S. to begin withdrawing troops.

"We are creating more terrorists around the world with this failed policy in Iraq," she said.

But Mr. Talent shot back: "It's not a question of politics, it's not a question of people's motives, it's a question of what's going to win this war. And positions of weakness are not going to do it."

Mr. Talent's vote against a bill to provide federal funding for embryonic stem-cell research is a hot topic in Missouri, where polls show strong support for the Stem Cell Research and Cures Initiative on the state's fall ballot. Actor Michael J. Fox, who has Parkinson's disease, recently raised $200,000 for Mrs. McCaskill, calling her a "champion" of stem-cell research.

Mr. Talent yesterday called stem-cell research a form of cloning and said the benefits of such research were "speculative."

"The ballot issue would create a constitutional right -- an unqualified constitutional right -- to clone the earliest stages of human life," something he said he is "not comfortable doing" as an evangelical Christian.

"Our country has never turned its back on medical research, and we shouldn't in Missouri," Mrs. McCaskill countered, adding that her religion teaches her to be a healer.

The Missouri measure would amend the state constitution to protect the type of stem-cell research allowed at the federal level. It sets guidelines to conduct research on stem cells "ethically and safely" and bans human cloning.

Missouri Debaters Battle For The Suburbs (WP)

By Shailagh Murray, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 9, 2006

Sen. James M. Talent of Missouri and Democratic challenger Claire McCaskill sparred over the war in Iraq, stem cell research and the House page scandal in a feisty debate yesterday, as the candidates fought for an edge in a race that polls show is a dead heat.

Talent's challenge is to win moderate suburban voters who have grown disillusioned with GOP leadership, while rallying the more partisan-minded social conservatives who live in rural southern Missouri. The senator battled throughout the debate to balance those competing constituencies.

Tim Russert, who moderated the debate on NBC's "Meet the Press," noted that Talent sided with Bush on almost every major issue and counted four times that the president had visited Missouri on Talent's behalf. He then asked Talent to evaluate Bush's tenure.

"Certainly, he's going to end up better than Jimmy Carter, probably not as good as Ronald Reagan," the senator replied. "A lot depends on what happens on whether we can complete the mission in Iraq, and win the war on terror."

McCaskill, now serving as the state auditor, also is juggling constituencies. She is vying with Talent for suburban voters and some rural support, while counting on a huge Democratic-base turnout in St. Louis and Kansas City. She was drawn into an exchange on abortion, one of the many divisive social issues that she has steadfastly avoided throughout the campaign.

"I certainly believe that abortion should remain safe, legal and rare," McCaskill said. "But why don't we concentrate on prevention? None of us want abortion, none of us support abortion."

Pressed by Talent and Russert, she said she supported a ban on so-called partial-birth abortion, with an exception for the life of the mother.

McCaskill, meanwhile, has sought to paint Talent as a conservative extremist on the issue of embryonic stem cell research. Missouri voters will consider a proposed constitutional amendment on Nov. 7 to safeguard early stage stem cell research.

The initiative is supported by prominent moderate Republicans such as former senator John Danforth, along with Gov. Matt Blunt. Supporters believe the measure could be a boon to biomedical research, by making Missouri the first state to formally recognize a right for scientists to conduct the research and for patients to receive treatment.

Talent opposes the measure because he said it could lead to human cloning. "My faith directs me to heal the sick," McCaskill countered.

The candidates spent most of the 40-minute session arguing about national security. McCaskill sketched out the approach to Iraq that she favors: "We need to give them notice. We need to tell the Iraqi government that we're not going to build democracy at the barrel of a gun. It's time for them to stand up and begin taking responsibility for their country."

Talent defended the decision to go to war as "the only possible strategic choice" and said it was warranted even though Iraq did not have weapons of mass destruction. "Well, [Saddam Hussein] wanted them," Talent told Russert. He said the current level of sectarian violence "can't be sustained" and that the Iraqi government "needs to deal with it." But he said progress has been made. Setting a timetable for withdrawal "would be sending a notice to the terrorists that we're going to quit," Talent said.

The candidates also tangled over the Republican House leadership's response to the disclosure that former representative Mark Foley (R-Fla.) had sent questionable e-mails to teenage male congressional pages. House leaders have been criticized for failing to heed warnings that Foley's behavior was out of control. He resigned from the House when some messages became public.

"It is about holding on to power instead of doing the right thing," said McCaskill, who added that House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (Ill.) -- whose office has been questioned for its response -- should resign.

Talent was more cautious. He said he would await the results of an ongoing investigation. "We need to find out who knew what. We need to have a zero-tolerance policy for this and then let the chips fall where they may," Talent said.

On Friday, a USA Today/Gallup survey of 577 likely voters, showed McCaskill leading Talent 48 percent to 45 percent, with 7 percent undecided. The margin of error was plus or minus five percentage points.

Santorum Keys On 'Islamic Fascism' (PTR)

By David M. Brown

Pittsburg Tribune-Review, October 10, 2006

President Bush lacks broad support for the war in Iraq because he's reluctant to depict it as part of a larger struggle against "Islamic fascism" -- a major threat to the nation's security -- U.S. Sen. Rick Santorum said Monday.

"He (Bush) is managing the public relations on this war very poorly," Santorum, the third-ranking Republican in the Senate, said during a meeting with editors and reporters of the Pittsburgh Tribune-Review.

Bush is more concerned about "making the State Department comfortable" than providing the American people with "a clear message and a clear understanding of what we are up against," said Santorum, in his sharpest criticism of the president to date.

Santorum, who faces an uphill battle for re-election against Democrat Bob Casey, said he discussed the issue with Bush several times and said the president "has given a few good speeches on it, but he does not continually do it."

Bush dropped references to Islamic fascists when the State Department "went ballistic because we are offending our allies in the Middle East," Santorum said. "I don't care if we offend our allies in the Middle East."

Santorum, 48, of Penn Hills, headed Bush's re-election campaign in Pennsylvania in 2004 and has been a strong ally for the White House on most key issues.

Casey, 46, of Scranton, has tried to portray Santorum as a lockstep backer of the Republican president, whose approval ratings in Pennsylvania have plummeted over the past two years.

"He's simply running a campaign that 'I'm Bob Casey, and Rick Santorum is George Bush,'" Santorum charged.

Casey spokesman Larry Smar said: "If you look at Rick Santorum's voting record, it's easy to see why some folks would mistake him for George Bush.

"There is an old saying: 'A hit dog barks,' and Rick Santorum must be feeling the pressure if he's going out of his way to criticize President Bush, finally, 29 days before the election."

Santorum, who trails Casey, the state treasurer, in several recent public opinion polls, acknowledged that his support of an unpopular war will cost him votes.

"This war is more important than this Senate seat," he said.

Santorum said he supported going to war because he was "concerned about a rise of radical Islam as a trigger point to a larger war that, if we did not stop now, could threaten the very existence of freedom everywhere."

"I think we're facing the greatest threat this country has ever faced," he said.

Although Santorum is concerned about reports that North Korea tested a nuclear weapon, he said a greater potential threat would be for North Korea's nuclear capability to be transferred to Iran, which has ties with North Korea.

Iran is the "principal enemy" in the war on Islamic fascism, he said.

"I see Iran as a country that is very clear about their intention to dominate the Muslim world and then conquer the Christian world."

North Korean leader Kim Jong Il is "a little man, a paranoid man, who, if anything, wants to aggressively unite and control Korea, but he's a failing dictator" whose people are suffering and starving, Santorum said.

North Korea's nuclear weapons capability would be "a great regional threat," particularly to U.S. allies South Korea and Japan. "Every single option should be on the table" regarding what to do about that threat, but only in step with actions agreed upon by South Korea and Japan, Santorum said.

Many analysts consider the race between Santorum and Casey to be the hottest contest on Nov. 7, when Democrats, emboldened by Bush's sagging popularity, escalating violence in Iraq and the continuing fallout from a sex scandal involving former U.S. Rep. Mark Foley of Florida, hope to retake the House and perhaps even the Senate.

Santorum fears a Democratic majority in Congress will imperil the war effort.

"They will see an obligation to go in and create hell for this president, and they will try to get us to scale down our operations."

Santorum yesterday was endorsed by the 40,000-member Pennsylvania Fraternal Order of Police. Casey was endorsed by firefighters representing the western district of the Pennsylvania Professional Fire Fighters Association.

Casey will be in Pittsburgh Wednesday for a fundraiser headlined by U.S. Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., at the David L. Lawrence Convention Center, Downtown.

Santorum and Casey then square off Thursday during a televised debate in Pittsburgh. The hour-long debate will take place at the Downtown studios of KDKA-TV and will air at 7 p.m.

Iraq, Foley Dog The GOP In A Key Race (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, October 10, 2006

MARCUS HOOK, PA.

The town of Marcus Hook turned out two fire trucks, three honor guards, and a brass band to honor Curt Weldon, now in the race of his life to hold his US House seat against retired Adm. Joe Sestak (D) in the November election.

The 10-term lawmaker got his political start as mayor here, where he drove the Pagan biker gang out of town. As the No. 2 Republican on the Armed Services Committee, Mr. Weldon leveraged defense-related jobs into the district.

But this year, knowing and serving the district may not be enough. Local issues, typically the grist of midterm elections, are being eclipsed by national ones: the war in Iraq and low ratings for the GOP-controlled Congress - fueled most recently by a GOP sex scandal involving congressional pages.

"Curt has always done good for us, but a lot of people have turned against Bush because of the war. It's not fair, but it's going to be tough," says Chevelle Sipps, a Weldon supporter here.

Indeed, the Philadelphia region is now Ground Zero in the battle for control of the House, analysts say.

Democrats need a net gain of 15 seats to take control the House, and they hope to pick up three of them in the Philadelphia suburbs: Representatives Weldon in the Seventh District, Jim Gerlach in the Sixth and Mike Fitzpatrick in the Eighth. Historically Republican, the Philadelphia suburbs voted for Democrats Al Gore for president in 2000 and John Kerry in 2004.

"The reason the House Republicans have increased their numbers since 1995 was because they began to win the South, but they've run the string out. There aren't any more seats to win. So the battleground now are the suburbs in the north that used to be Republican and now are trending Democratic: in Ohio, Philadelphia, New York, and Connecticut," says Terry Madonna, a political scientist at Franklin Marshall, who directs the Keystone poll.

A recent Keystone poll now calls the Weldon-Sestak race a "dead heat" with Sestak at 44 percent and Weldon at 43 percent. On Friday, the Cook Political Report shifted its prediction for this race from "lean Republican" to a tossup.

In addition, Democrats are fielding - and financing - strong candidates in these races. "For the first time, voters in this district are being presented with a credible alternative to Weldon," writes Amy Walter, who analyzes House races for the Cook Political Report.

Sestak headquarters in Media, Pa., an upscale suburb of Philadelphia, churns with activity. The campaign claims some 2,000 volunteers, including a vast family network in Delaware County. With seven siblings - six still living in the district, "he has almost enough relatives to win," said President Clinton at a fundraiser for Sestak last week.

But what most distinguishes Sestak from former Weldon rivals is his ability to raise campaign funds, more than $1.14 million from July through Sept. 30, Sestak said Wednesday. That's $2.27 million since he announced his candidacy in February - more than all other previous Weldon rivals combined.

A former three-star admiral who conducted combat operations in Iraq and Afghanistan before retiring in January, Sestak calls the Iraq war a "tragic misadventure" and calls for the withdrawal of US troops by the end of next year.

"When we entered the race, we thought Iraq would be No. 5 or 6 [on the list of voters' concerns], but everywhere we go it's the first or second question," said Sestak, in an interview with the Monitor last week.

"There's such a feeling that something has to change. I respect Congressman Weldon's public service, but he's been there too long," he says.

Sestak served as President Clinton's director for defense policy for the National Security Council. He says that his time in the Navy taught him that "national security begins at home in the health, education, and economic promise of our people."

But since last week he is also discussing the recent sex scandal on Capitol Hill involving former Rep. Mark Foley (R) of Florida, who resigned from Congress Sept. 29 after being confronted with sexually explicit electronic messages that he sent to male former pages.

The Foley scandal is "another heavy stain that indicates what people feel already about this Congress: How accountable are Republicans when they can't take care of themselves ... they knew what was going on and did nothing," Sestak says.

Meanwhile, Weldon, like other GOP incumbents in the suburbs, is highlighting his independence from the GOP establishment. His campaign slogan - Curt Weldon...Independent Fighter for US - doesn't mention the Republican Party. But he's not backing away from the war in Iraq. (Weldon famously volunteered to go to Iraq to search for weapons of mass destruction.) "It's going to be a tough race, but I'm not going to run away from the president," he said in a Monitor interview.

Citing former Democratic sex scandals involving pages and interns, Weldon says there's hypocrisy in the Foley scandal "you could cut with a knife." But he says it's not going to hurt his campaign. "People will see it for what it is," he says. "I'm swimming upstream, but the one thing I have is the people."

But analysts tracking this race say the issue can still hurt him, by depressing Republican turnout and detracting from his message of local service.

"All the momentum is with the Democrats, and it's up to Republicans to break that momentum and turn out their voters. The Foley scandal makes it that much harder for Republicans to get their message out and change that dynamic," says political analyst Stuart Rothenberg.

Sestak is hoping to benefit from the current focus on national issues, says David Landau, senior adviser to the Sestak campaign, who ran against Weldon in 1988. "In a normal election, you can get by with saying 'I'm the guy who saved Boeing,' but with the issues floating around in this election, a congressman has to have something more."

In response, the Weldon campaign says Sestak is a carpetbagger, who doesn't pay property taxes in the district and has missed voting in many recent elections.

"The district wants someone who lives here, not someone who rents a condo two weeks before he comes into the race or mispronounces the names of towns he was in," says Michael Puppio, Weldon's campaign manager.

Republicans Target 3 Senate Races (SFC)

By David Espo

San Francisco Chronicle, October 10, 2006

(10-09) 16:38 PDT WASHINGTON, (AP) --

In an unusual move, the Republican National Committee is investing heavily in television advertising in Senate races in Ohio, Tennessee and Missouri in what officials describe as a firewall strategy designed to limit Democratic gains in the Nov. 7 elections and maintain the GOP majority.

The move reflects a desire on the part of Ken Mehlman, the Republican Party chairman, and other strategists to exercise more control over the drive to retain a majority, according to several Republican officials. They said the decision has caused friction with officials at the National Republican Senatorial Committee, which historically has been the only party entity to run commercials on behalf of its candidates.

The move also raises questions about the priority assigned by the RNC to races in other states where Republicans are in jeopardy — Pennsylvania, Montana and Rhode Island among them.

Officials at both party committees said they were working together.

"We've anticipated a challenging cycle and have been working closely with the NRSC for the past year to strategically allocate our resources," said Tracey Schmitt, spokeswoman for the RNC.

"We've been working as a team for well over a year in planning how we were going to approach these races on every level," said Mark Stephens, executive director of the NRSC.

The RNC's targeted races are Sen. Mike DeWine's re-election effort in Ohio; Sen. Jim Talent's bid for a new term in Missouri, and Bob Corker's drive to hold the Tennessee seat of retiring Majority Leader Bill Frist.

It is not clear how they were chosen. All three races are close, according to public and private polls. They are among eight or nine competitive races around the country — most of them for seats currently in Republican hands — that will determine which party controls the Senate when it convenes in January.

The officials who described the firewall strategy did so on condition of anonymity, saying they were not authorized to speak publicly.

Yet the move is evident in reports filed with the Federal Election Commission. They show the Republican National Committee is paying for polling and television advertising independently. By law, those involved are not permitted to coordinate their activities with the candidates or their campaigns. Coordination is permitted between the two independent groups, though, and Stephens said they share pollsters and ad-making firms.

According to the reports on file, the RNC has spent roughly $2.8 million to help DeWine in his race against Rep. Sherrod Brown and nearly $1 million so far in Tennessee, where Corker is running against Rep. Harold Ford Jr. The party has put about $150,000 into Talent's race against Claire McCaskill.

The NRSC, chaired by Sen. Elizabeth Dole, R-N.C., has also invested heavily in advertising and related expenses in those races, spending about $2.4 million so far in Missouri, $3 million in Ohio and $1.5 million in Tennessee.

While Stephens and Schmitt stressed the cooperation between the two committees, neither had a ready explanation when asked why the RNC had decided to step out on its own when it could simply have transferred funds directly to the senatorial committee.

Nor was it clear why the RNC had decided to scrap the division of responsibilities in use as recently as this summer's Rhode Island GOP senatorial primary. In that case, the RNC paid for get-out-the-vote operations, while the senatorial committee ran ads.

In the case of House campaigns, the RNC has not reported commissioning any polls or paying for any television advertising. Carl Forti, a spokesman for the House campaign committee, said he was not aware of any such effort.

The competitive situation is different in the Senate, though, where the GOP senatorial committee has been at a financial disadvantage with its Democratic counterpart in fundraising. In its most recent report, the National Republican Senatorial Committee said it had $18.6 million in the bank as of the end of August, compared to $29.8 million for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee.

With Giuliani, G.O.P. Focuses On 9/11 Role (NYT)

By Richard Pérez-peña

The New York Times, October 9, 2006

At the Detroit Tigers' stadium last week, a visiting troop of children — many wearing Tiger orange and full of the fevered air of the playoffs — met Rudolph W. Giuliani, who declared his lifelong allegiance to their enemy of the moment, the Yankees.

But when the fourth and fifth graders had a chance to put questions to Mr. Giuliani, the first one had nothing to do with the Tigers-Yankees series. Instead, Cristina Sauceda asked, "How did you feel when they destroyed the towers, and what did you do to make people feel better?"

Wherever he goes these days, Mr. Giuliani can count on fielding essentially the same question, one based on an image stamped so deeply into the national psyche that even a 10-year-old sees it.

Nearly as often, people ask its corollary: Will he run for president?

Mr. Giuliani has little to say about 2008, and a great deal to say about Sept. 11, 2001. He rarely brings up the World Trade Center attack directly; he does not have to. No matter where he goes — South Carolina, Florida, Michigan and Illinois, just in the past several weeks — other people do it for him. That will surely be the case on Thursday, when he makes his much-anticipated first public appearance in two years in New Hampshire, which holds the first presidential primary in the nation, where he will speak at a fund-raiser for Republican state legislative candidates.

He says he does not yet know if he will be a presidential candidate. He has no campaign apparatus and his positions on divisive social issues — from abortion to gay rights to gun control — put him at odds with most in his party.

Yet as Mr. Giuliani traverses the country, raising money for Republican candidates and building alliances that could serve him in a national campaign, polls show he has emerged as a leading candidate for the Republican presidential primaries — largely because of how he guided a wounded city in the weeks after the trade center attack.

And Mr. Giuliani has embraced that role as 9/11 hero and national security authority. At stop after stop, he delivers the same message: that the nation is still in grave danger, that the war in Iraq must be won, that measures like the Patriot Act and electronic eavesdropping are essential to defeating terrorists.

Never mind that Mr. Giuliani has come in for some sharp criticism back in New York — about workers sickened by toxic dust at ground zero, about his disgraced former police commissioner, Bernard B. Kerik, and even about his handling of the trade center attack.

There is little indication that his noble image from 9/11 has been tarnished in the heartland.

For many loyal Republicans — and more than a few independents and Democrats — his national security message seems to work, blotting out the central question facing his candidacy: whether a supporter of legal abortion, gay civil unions, immigrants' rights and gun control; a thrice-married, Catholic New Yorker whose split with his second wife took place publicly and none too neatly, can win Republican presidential primaries and caucuses.

"I'm well to the right of Rudy on social issues," said Sid Dinerstein, chairman of the Republican Party in Palm Beach County, Fla., after an appearance there by Mr. Giuliani two weeks ago. "But this is a man who, when it comes to dealing with bad guys, has infinite courage."

In August, at a fund-raising dinner in Charleston for South Carolina's very conservative Republican Party, Mr. Giuliani spoke about port security. When the party faithful had a chance to pose questions, they did not ask him about abortion or gays — only reporters did that.

Mr. Giuliani is never asked about recent charges that he, among others, did not do enough to protect rescue workers at the trade center site from inhaling toxic dust.

Nor is he asked about his friend, former police commissioner and former business partner, Mr. Kerik, whom President Bush nominated to be homeland security secretary in December 2004, with Mr. Giuliani's support.

Mr. Kerik withdrew his nomination as questions were raised about unpaid taxes involving his nanny, ties to people accused of involvement in organized crime, an illegal gift and an unreported loan. Just 19 months after his cabinet nomination, he pleaded guilty to two misdemeanors.

Federal investigators are now looking into whether Mr. Kerik illegally taped the husband of Jeanine F. Pirro, the Republican candidate for attorney general, at Ms. Pirro's behest.

Asked whether he knew anything about Mr. Kerik and the heartache he may have caused Mr. Giuliani in New York, Chris Rants, the Republican speaker of the Iowa State House of Representatives, who has avidly been courted by presidential candidates, said, "I don't have any idea what you're talking about."

What about ground zero air quality? "I still don't know what you're talking about," he said.

But the doubts persist, including those about Mr. Giuliani's stand on social issues. Many Republicans and political analysts say the most pertinent question about Mr. Giuliani is whether polls showing him at or near the top of the presidential primary field reflect support that is broad but thin.

"My opinion of the mayor is completely centered around 9/11," Mr. Rants said. "That's how everybody has their impression, and it's a good impression.

"But to be honest," he added, "I don't have a clue what he thinks about India or China, or education, or immigration reform, or Social Security. I don't even know what he thinks about ethanol and renewable fuels."

Mr. Giuliani himself declines to answer questions about his political future, including handicapping how he might fare in Republican primaries, and instead offers praise for the other contenders and for this year's candidates for lesser offices.

"I don't want to get in the way of 2006," he said recently. "These are important elections that are coming up."

But when he is asked about 9/11, he talks effusively. Regarding Cristina Sauceda's question, Mr. Giuliani gave an answer that, even for an adult audience, would have been extremely long (10 minutes), grim ("We had to figure out how many body bags to order"), and emotionally wrenching ("Every time I was told" that someone he knew had been killed, "my heart would take a beat, and I would say to myself, 'I can't think about that right now' ").

He is often greeted like a star. But when the people who cheer Mr. Giuliani at rallies are asked what they know about him, some say he cleaned up a crime-ridden city, all of them talk about Sept. 11, and many concede that they can go no further.

"I can't forget the display of leadership and courage and compassion that day," said Mike Medina, a Miami-Dade County corrections officer who attended a rally on Sept. 27 for Republican candidates in nearby Dania Beach where Mr. Giuliani spoke. "That goes a long way."

Not far enough, according to Larry J. Sabato, director of the Center for Politics at the University of Virginia. He said that if Mr. Giuliani runs, his views on social issues, and his more recent travails, will find their way into attack ads, and the conventional wisdom will prevail.

"Pro-choice is the heart of his problem with Republicans, just as it always was, and it cannot be overcome," Mr. Sabato said. Mr. Giuliani does well in polls "because the activists have no clue so far," he said. "If they've heard this stuff, they've forgotten it."

Mr. Sabato and other political analysts said that even if other contenders shied away from attacking Mr. Giuliani on abortion or gay rights, independent groups supporting those candidates would not. They might even try to undermine his security credentials, and cite the former mayor's decision to put the city's emergency operations center in the trade center.

But Frank Luntz, a Republican pollster, said the poll results are no illusion, and that no one should rule out Mr. Giuliani.

"The abortion issue will hurt him in Iowa, the gun control position will hurt him in New Hampshire, but both are less important than the character and the attributes of the man," said Mr. Luntz, who did some work for Mr. Giuliani in the 1990's but no longer works for campaigns. "In a senate race, they want to know where you stand on issues. In a presidential campaign, they want to know who you are."

In The Race For Governor Of Michigan, The Struggling Economy Is Topic A (NYT)

By Monica Davey

The New York Times, October 9, 2006

THREE RIVERS, Mich., Oct. 4 — If for much of the country the economic signs seem relatively healthy, they do not in places like this town. A plastics plant nearby closed days before Christmas, a company that makes mirror parts for cars has shrunk and the mayor says he heard talk, just this month, of possible cuts at a factory that makes drive shafts.

And so, while elections in other regions have turned to matters like national security, the war in Iraq and Congressional scandal, Michigan's races for governor and, to a lesser degree, the United States Senate are hinging this year almost entirely on the struggling economy and the question of who is to blame for it.

In the state's cloud of sinking numbers, Republicans hope for an opportunity to pick up two positions. In other states with once-robust industrial bases, including Ohio, Indiana and Pennsylvania, economic worries are playing a similar, if far more subtle and layered, role this fall.

"We've thought about moving south," said Deb Hallock, 44, who said she had lived in Three Rivers for 20 years but lost her home about a year ago when she and her husband could no longer pay the mortgage. Ms. Hallock makes pizzas at a fast-food restaurant; her husband makes cargo trailers at a factory but had no job when they were evicted. "I don't really know what a governor can do to stop all of what's happening here, but I wish someone would do something."

Gov. Jennifer M. Granholm, an enormously popular Democrat when she took office four years ago, now faces a serious challenge from Dick DeVos, the former president of the Amway Corporation and the son of a co-founder.

While campaigning, Mr. DeVos regularly ticks off dire statistics: with major cuts at the Detroit-area automobile companies, Michigan's unemployment rate of 7.1 percent is one of the worst in the nation; the state has lost 85,000 jobs in the last four years; and it has ranked second in the number of young people moving elsewhere.

In a testy first debate between the candidates in early October, the answers to questions on almost every topic seemed to circle back to this single issue. Mr. DeVos, who says his own business acumen is just the medicine Michigan needs, said Ms. Granholm was responsible for failing to create "the atmosphere" for job creation in Michigan despite the economic recovery plan she talked about at nearly every campaign stop.

"I find it amazing," Mr. DeVos said in the debate, "to hear the governor say the plan is working when the people of Michigan aren't."

Ms. Granholm, who said hers was the most aggressive economic recovery plan in the nation, seemed to sidestep responsibility for what has happened here, saying she had "stepped into this current" in a state that had long depended on cars for its livelihood.

"The question is, Why did we get here, and how are we going to get out?" Ms. Granholm said.

Elsewhere, the economic questions are less extreme, less consuming and, in some cases, far more ambiguous. For the most part, challengers in nearby states have bemoaned economic failures, while incumbents have pointed to opposing, upbeat economic signs or stayed mainly silent on the matter.

In Ohio, the loss of manufacturing work, along with political corruption and scandal, has contributed to "a generally sour atmosphere" among voters, said Herbert Asher, a political science professor emeritus at Ohio State University.

Sherrod Brown, the Democratic challenger to Senator Mike DeWine, has worked to remind voters of their economic portrait, "a thriving manufacturing base dismantled piece by piece," in the words of Mr. Brown's spokeswoman, Joanna Kuebler.

Indiana's economy has improved. But Russell L. Hanson, a political scientist at Indiana University, said the recovery had been slow and spotty in parts of the state, especially where the auto industry's troubles had affected Indiana's component suppliers — something the challengers in several competitive House races have made an issue.

A complicated picture has also emerged in Pennsylvania, with candidates, even those from the same political party, pointing to opposing signs as evidence of the relative healthiness, or the horror, of the state's economy. Gov. Edward G. Rendell, a Democrat, has boasted of new job creation. But Bob Casey, another Democrat and an ally of Mr. Rendell, who is running against Senator Rick Santorum, a Republican, has complained of an environment in which tuition and health care costs are rising while incomes cannot keep up.

In Michigan, meanwhile, no candidate is boasting.

Mr. DeVos and Ms. Granholm pepper their speeches, commercials and Web sites with proposals for reversing the economic tide. Mr. DeVos has pressed for change, proposing that the state speed the granting of permits for businesses and that the tax on businesses known as the Single Business Tax be ended.

His campaign has scoffed at Ms. Granholm's efforts, like a Cool Cities program to give grants to cities for economic development, as too paltry. He has also suggested she did not try hard enough to persuade the Japanese to open a Honda factory in Michigan.

"A cool city is one where you get a job," said John Truscott, Mr. DeVos's director of communications. "We never thought we would surpass Mississippi in a race for the bottom, but we're there."

Mr. DeVos, a relative political newcomer from Ada who aides say has poured about $17 million of his own money into the race, began advertising in February, which helps explain how every voter interviewed in towns in the Kalamazoo area, like Three Rivers, and near Lansing said they knew his name.

For a time, polls showed Mr. DeVos even or slightly ahead of Ms. Granholm, but more recent surveys suggest she has pulled ahead slightly. In a survey of 600 likely voters taken this month for The Detroit News and several television stations, Ms. Granholm was leading, with 46 percent saying they would vote for her, compared with 40 percent for Mr. DeVos; the margin of error was four percentage points. But of those polled, 12 percent said they were undecided.

Ms. Granholm, a former federal prosecutor and a former state attorney general, said she was pressing to diversify the state's economy into fields like alternative energy, life sciences and domestic security; wanted to double the number of college graduates in Michigan within a decade; and hoped to change the way the state handles work force training for those without jobs.

And while Mr. DeVos has tried to blame Ms. Granholm for the state's struggles, in an interview, she directed the blame elsewhere: to circumstances beyond her control ("No other state is the automotive capital of the world"); to the Bush administration ("He has sat idly by while the industry reels"); and even to Mr. DeVos, who supported the trade agreements, Nafta and Cafta, that she said had helped leave the Michigan economy in a wreck.

"If we had diversified our state 10 years ago, we wouldn't be here," Ms. Granholm said. "I'm going to go anywhere and do anything to change the economy of Michigan."

Similarly, in the Senate race here, Debbie Stabenow, the Democratic incumbent, and Mike Bouchard, a sheriff and her Republican challenger, have each touted economic recovery plans: "Jobs Agenda" for her and "Renewing Michigan's Economy" for him.

But at a Laundromat in Three Rivers, all the plans in the world could not convince Steve Brunn that Michigan could be turned around. Like others here, Mr. Brunn, 54, said he was doubtful that any campaign promise would add up to jobs after all the commercials were over and the votes were in.

"We're being batted back and forth between the Republicans and Democrats," he said. "DeVos is talking like everybody else — he wants to make change — but what is he really going to do to change this? We're competing with these other countries, and there are no answers."

Thomas Lowry, who for 11 years has been mayor of Three Rivers, said this town of 7,400 still had its share of manufacturing companies, though the numbers, he said, seemed to shrink little by little each year. The echoes reach far beyond the factories, Mr. Lowry said. The diner downtown loses business. More and more “for sale” signs fill front yards along quiet streets.

Even his own business, a bookstore in the center of downtown, has seen the sale of magazines, a minor luxury item for many, fall off. “It ripples everywhere,” he said.

Mr. Lowry, who said he expected to vote for Ms. Granholm, said he was not sure to what extent the voters would hold their political leaders responsible for all that had happened — and all that had not. “There’s something about our species, though, that wants a scapegoat,” he said.

Firings Of State Workers Found To Violate Law (BSUN)

By Jennifer Skalka

The Baltimore Sun, October 10, 2006

ANNAPOLIS -- A legislative committee investigating the Ehrlich administration's personnel practices has concluded that workers were fired "based on political considerations in violation of constitutional rights and state law," and is recommending stronger protections for state employees, according to a draft report provided Monday to reporters.

"Some administration officials admitted, reluctantly, that political affiliation was a consideration in the decision-making process," says the 135-page report, the work of the bipartisan State Employee Rights and Protections Committee, which has been investigating Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr.'s staff since August 2005.

The legislative committee, whose work Republicans say is an election-year smear, does not recommend legal action in response to the firings. But committee lawyers determined that, unlike in past administrations, Ehrlich used the state appointments office -- which traditionally makes political recommendations for membership to boards and commissions -- as a clearinghouse for hiring and firing, and that party affiliation was a likely factor.

The governor said Monday that the committee's work over the past year is evidence of the Democratic-led General Assembly's misplaced priorities.

"They held more hearings on this particular issue than pedophiles, sex offenders and BGE combined ... all to conclude that our administration brought in people dedicated to carrying out the goals of this administration," Ehrlich said.

Taking office in January 2003 as Maryland first GOP governor in more than three decades, Ehrlich promised to shake up agencies accustomed to Democratic administrations.

"We must overturn the status quo in state government and whenever possible bring in fresh blood, with new ideas," the governor wrote to a state agency head in a confidential memorandum reviewed by the commission.

Leading Democrats soon heard complaints of indiscriminate firings and the targeting of low-level employees, and they began the inquiry after revelations arose about the activities of a longtime aide to the governor, Joseph F. Steffen Jr.

The committee's four Republicans issued a separate 40-page rebuttal Monday, criticizing Democrats for spending more than $1 million in taxpayer money on the investigation and accusing them of timing the report's release to potentially affect next month's gubernatorial election. Democrats dispute the cost estimate.

The minority report says that former workers who testified under oath "repeatedly misstated facts and failed to corroborate many aspects of their wrongful testimony with documents." It concludes that the committee did not find proof of "illegal personnel actions" by the Ehrlich administration.

Sen. J. Lowell Stoltzfus, the minority leader from the Eastern Shore and a committee member, acknowledged "stupid behavior" by some state workers who conducted firings. But he called the panel's work "a very expensive partisan joke."

"You can't legislate against crassness; you just can't do that," Stoltzfus said. "For the most part, this administration has bent over backward to incorporate the Democrats."

The report of the committee, which will meet Thursday in Annapolis to consider revisions, reserved particularly pointed language for Steffen, who left the administration in February 2005. Nicknamed "Prince of Darkness" by the governor, Steffen kept a grim reaper figurine on his desk. He told the committee that employee lists he was given included party affiliation.

"Mr. Steffen was placed on the executive floors at [the Department of Human Resources] and the [Department of Juvenile Services], on the payroll of the Governor's Office and coordinated with the Appointments Office to identify candidates for termination," the report says.

"Placing a qualified consultant in the agencies to perform such a function would have been reasonable. ... Placing Mr. Steffen in such a role was not and the purpose was most likely to identify candidates for termination for political reasons."

The committee sought to determine whether state workers in an employment category called "at will" were terminated because they were Democrats or to make room for Ehrlich loyalists. About 7,000 state workers are at-will, according to the report, and can legally be fired without cause, though not for political beliefs.

Sixty people contacted the committee to share their stories, the report said. Not all testified, however. Some of those who appeared before the panel did so voluntarily. Others, including Steffen, were subpoenaed.

The committee also heard from Ehrlich administration officials, including three -- Steffen, Gregory J. Maddalone and Craig B. Chesek -- who declined under oath to answer many questions about their roles in firing state workers or instructions they were given by the state appointments office. The committee has since filed lawsuits compelling them to testify.

The report indicated that Maddalone and Chesek -- who were dispatched to state departments, much like Steffen, to target workers for firing -- are due in court Oct. 26. Steffen is scheduled to appear Oct. 25.

Sen. Thomas M. Middleton, a Southern Maryland Democrat who co-chaired the committee, said their testimony is crucial in shaping the committee's final recommendations.

"The main players, it just seemed like they had extreme memory loss," Middleton said. "We haven't found anything that is illegal, but we found stories that were conflicting so that alone causes extreme suspicion."

The report noted that under Ehrlich, the methods used in firing workers were inconsistent across departments and perhaps most "dramatic" at the Public Service Commission, where several employees were escorted from the building by security guards and their photographs were posted in the lobby.

"There was substantial evidence that most of the terminated employees who testified were doing a good job, and there was no evidence that any of them posed any security risk," the report says.

Middleton said he expects the committee to offer legislation during the General Assembly session that begins in January.

The report recommended 10 changes, including that the law should make clear that state workers cannot be fired to make room for someone else based on the new employee's "political affiliation, belief or opinion."

State law must also be changed, the report says, to clarify that only people in the employing agency, not the appointments office, can fire a state worker.

The report also suggests that state employees should be notified in writing of their rights when hired and that the state should study the need for the at-will designation.

Sen. Brian E. Frosh, a Montgomery County Democrat who sits on the committee, said state workers, especially those who have served with distinction for many years, deserve better from their employer than they have received from Ehrlich.

Investigation Faults Ehrlich In Firing Of State Workers (WP)

By Matthew Mosk

The Washington Post, October 10, 2006

The firings of dozens of mid-level state workers early in the tenure of Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. may, in some instances, have violated those employees' constitutional rights and run afoul of state law, a 14-month investigation has concluded.

An attorney hired by leaders of the majority-Democratic legislature to oversee an investigation of the Republican governor's personnel practices wrote a 130-page draft report and shared his findings yesterday with lawmakers.

Among them:

· The governor dispatched loyalists into state agencies to identify people to fire.

· Several employees were fired for no reason other than their political views.

DOJ_NMG_0076854

· Officials in the Ehrlich administration were evasive or not credible in defending their personnel decisions while testifying before the legislature's Special Committee on State Employee Rights and Protections.

"The sudden and random terminations exacted a considerable human toll," committee counsel Ward B. Coe III wrote in his draft.

Ehrlich described the document as "farcical" and mocked the legislative committee, which consists of eight Democrats and four Republicans, for spending as much time as it did to produce it. "I think the people of Maryland need to hear what they paid over a million dollars for," Ehrlich said.

Republicans on the committee issued a "minority report," which determined that the investigation had been partisan and consumed money and time that could have been devoted to more pressing concerns.

"There's nothing substantive there," said Senate Minority Leader J. Lowell Stoltzfus (Somerset). "There is no definite finding. There was nothing proven that demonstrated that the law was broken."

Under Maryland law, "at will" employees -- about 6,000 of the 50,000 state workers -- may be hired and fired by the governor without explanation. With rare exception, though, the law requires that personnel decisions be made "without regard to the employee's political affiliation, belief, or opinion."

Coe's report, which will be released formally this week, marks the conclusion of a saga that began in early 2005, when Ehrlich fired a longtime political operative for boasting about a whisper campaign against the governor's chief political rival, Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley (D).

During the first two years of Ehrlich's tenure, that operative, Joseph Steffen, worked in three state agencies, fostering a reputation as a hatchet man by placing a figurine of the Grim Reaper on his desk and telling co-workers he had a "death list" of people who were marked for dismissal. He signed e-mails "POD," which stood for his nickname: "Prince of Darkness."

Firings followed. Ehrlich's top aides put the count last year at 284. Ehrlich's predecessor, Parris N. Glendening (D), fired 65 workers during the first three years of his administration.

Ehrlich administration officials have said the turnover was a natural byproduct of the 2002 election, which put a Republican in the governor's office for the first time in a generation.

No one was singled out for partisan views, Ehrlich officials said.

But some changes were made to help Ehrlich move the state in a new direction. "The governor has said he wants people on the same page," his communications director, Paul E. Schurick, said in a June 2005 interview.

The turnover concerned Democrats in the legislature. And the investigation that followed has validated those concerns, said Sen. Brian E. Frosh (D-Montgomery), who was one of the first to urge a review.

Coe, as committee counsel, interviewed more than 60 current and former state employees, taking sworn testimony from more than 20.

"It's not pretty for the Ehrlich administration," Frosh said yesterday. "It makes clear that many of the firings were illegal, and many more were inappropriate."

Coe's report makes its most direct case when addressing the termination of Vincent Gardina, a Democrat on the Baltimore County Council who was hired as a project manager at the Maryland Environmental Service.

Ehrlich aides learned that Gardina was on the payroll eight months after Ehrlich took office, the report says. Soon after, the report says, a deputy in the governor's appointments office called Gardina's boss and told him that "Gardina 'needs to go' because he is 'too political.' "

An e-mail exchange followed and ended with an e-mail from the governor's deputy, dated Sept. 9, 2003, saying: "you can let Vince Gardina go. We have signed off on this end." Gardina was dismissed by a letter dated Sept. 16, the report says. It concludes that "there is substantial evidence that the termination of Vincent Gardina was based on his political activities in violation of [state law] and his constitutional rights."

Other findings in the report focus on the dismissals' effects on the functioning of state government. In a number of instances, the report highlights dismissals of workers who had outstanding performance reviews.

At the state's Public Service Commission, which regulates utilities, five workers were dismissed on one day. The chairman, an Ehrlich appointee, defended those moves, but the review found his explanation wanting.

"It is difficult to reconcile the Chairman's view that he was improving the Commission when he failed to consult with other commissioners regarding the terminations, failed to review personnel files and failed to consult with the supervisors of two of the employees who were terminated," the report says.

Stoltzfus said yesterday that although Coe was hired with support from both parties -- and had conducted a well-received review of the state's savings and loan crisis 20 years ago -- the lawyer was "snookered" this time by Democrats.

The investigation, based mostly on the testimony of disgruntled former state workers, was generated by Steffen's ill-advised boastings and the actions of a few other misguided aides, Stoltzfus said. "I saw some crass behavior by certain people who first came in to work for the governor," he said. "It was a new regime. They behaved in a way they shouldn't have. But you can't legislate for crass behavior."

Del. Luiz R.S. Simmons (Montgomery), a Democrat on the committee, said he agrees that the investigation did not uncover "a reign of terror." But there were "serious abuses," he said.

"Unfortunately, the Republicans decided at the outset that they did not want to be bothered with the facts," Simmons said. "They do not understand . . . it was wrong to dismiss these people."

Coe's report found two major flaws with the Ehrlich administration's handling of personnel matters. The firings "were not reasonably calculated to improve the performance of State government," the report says, and the firings demoralized the state workforce veterans.

"Employees who were the primary providers for their families were suddenly without jobs through no fault of their own," Coe wrote.

SECOND ACTS

Presidential Lives and Legacies After the White House

By Mark K. Updegrove

Lyons Press, 321 pp., $24.95

Franklin Pierce may have been a rather forgettable president, but the remainder of his life proved even more unsatisfying. "After the White House," he lamented, "what is there to do but drink?"

More and more, lately, as it turns out. In the modern era, there are books to write and corporate boards to serve on and the mashed potato circuit to travel. There are funds to raise, charities to aid, libraries to build and globes to trot. There's good to be done. And there's money to be made.

The end of a presidency no longer means the end of influence, as Mark K. Updegrove documents in a lively and highly readable review of the post-Oval Office years of the United States' last nine former chief executives. "Second Acts: Presidential Lives and Legacies After the White House" traces a fascinating evolution from Harry S. Truman's impoverished political exile in Missouri to Bill Clinton's profitable, peripatetic shadow presidency in New York.

The White House afterlife holds "more promise and potential than ever before," Updegrove argues. Former presidents "now often have their own agendas and aggressively pursue them independent of those in power," and, "With the advent of globalization in a world dominated by the U.S., the opportunity for formers to make their marks has increased significantly."

What to do with our former commanders in chief has often vexed a country that does not believe in permanent power. Until George Washington retired to Mount Vernon after two terms as president, the world had few examples of rulers voluntarily surrendering their thrones, but it has become a hallmark of American democracy.

A number of former presidents continued to play a role long before globalization, of course. John Quincy Adams served 18 years in the House of Representatives after his single term in the White House, arguably accomplishing more as an outspoken abolitionist. Andrew Johnson was appointed to the Senate after his broken presidency, though he died just months later. William Howard Taft realized his life's ambition by serving as chief justice of the United States following his reelection defeat.

A few others tried to return to the office they left. Ulysses S. Grant maneuvered for the Republican nomination in 1880, only to be denied. Theodore Roosevelt, angered by his successor, Taft, bolted from the Republicans and ran as the Bull Moose candidate in 1912, only to hand the election to Democrat Woodrow Wilson. Just one former president managed a comeback, Grover Cleveland, who lost reelection in 1888 but won a second term four years later.

With the 22nd Amendment to the Constitution, that route is no longer available to two-term presidents such as Clinton and George W. Bush. Yet with actuarial tables being what they are, formers are emerging from office with more years of vigorous life still ahead of them. Each of them in his own way wrestles with how to remain relevant without crossing lines of propriety that only he sets.

Writing books has become de rigueur. Truman left office with only a $1,300 annual pension from his military service, since in those days former presidents had no retirement, much less the office allotments and Secret Service protection they get now. So he wrote a two-part autobiography for $600,000, though he estimated that after taxes and expenses he netted only $37,000. By the time Clinton wrote his memoirs -- one book that was so endless the publisher split it in two for the paperback version -- an ex-president could take in a reported $12 million.

Richard M. Nixon and Jimmy Carter both became prolific writers, churning out books that went beyond their personal stories in an effort to shape politics and policies -- and reinvent their legacies. Gerald R. Ford became the first to join corporate boards, a move that was seen as unseemly by some of his predecessors but has become more common. Ronald Reagan further broke barriers by accepting $2 million for appearances in Japan.

George H.W. Bush and Clinton both have second acts of another sort -- the first saw his son elected president while the second may yet see his wife win the job. But Updegrove also recounts the unusual friendship that seems to have developed between the 41st and 42nd presidents as they travel the world to help victims of the Asian tsunami and Hurricane Katrina.

Updegrove, a former publisher of Newsweek and executive at Time magazine who now works at Yahoo Inc., casts no judgment on any former president's choice and doesn't endorse any particular model. He seems to go along with the conventional wisdom that Carter's Nobel Prize-winning humanitarian efforts at home and abroad have made him the best former president, although he acknowledges that Carter's successors have all been irritated at one time or another with what they saw as grandstanding freelance diplomacy.

For the book, Updegrove had interviews with Ford, Carter and Bush, among others, but they don't seem to add all that much new. Many of the stories will feel familiar to Washington readers who follow the presidency closely. But they do peel back the curtain a bit on the lives of our former leaders in an entertaining and illuminating way.

And one Washington reader who may want to pick up "Second Acts" is the current occupant of the White House, who has just 27 months to go before he leaves office at age 62 and has to decide what to do with the rest of his life.

Different Bridges (WT)

By Claude R. Marx

The Washington Times, October 10, 2006

Former Sen. John Danforth is in many ways a political dinosaur. That is unfortunate because the world would be a better place if people like him were not nearly extinct.

Mr. Danforth, who served three terms as a Republican senator from Missouri before retiring in 1995, is a moderate conservative with strong religious beliefs who does not think compromise is a four-letter word. He longs for the days when those on both sides of the political aisle took a more centrist approach to problem solving and had greater respect for their adversaries.

He discusses his views, including a plea for the Republican Party to become less beholden to the demands of Christian conservatives, in his engaging memoir/political tract, "Faith and Politics: How the 'Moral Values' Debate Divides America and How to Move Forward Together."

Mr. Danforth, an ordained Episcopal minister, does not equate centrism with political mushiness or an abandonment of core beliefs. Rather, he sees it as a way to create a fairer and more just world by including and respecting a variety of worldviews.

He contends that the best leaders are those without an inflated view of their own importance or the certitude that their views are the only right ones.

"[I]f we are less confident about our capacity to know and implement God's will, and if our faith brings modesty about ourselves and our politics, our effectiveness is more likely. I believe that such modesty is, or at least should be, Christianity's gift to American politics," he writes.

He cites the Republican Party's efforts to overturn court decisions allowing relatives to unplug the feeding tube of Terri Schiavo as evidence of an unhealthy mingling of religion and politics that betrays the party's true conservative heritage.

"It was a threat to some of our most heartfelt values. It was Big Brotherism in the extreme, an exercise of the raw and awesome power of the federal government,' he writes.

To avoid repeats of that approach, he calls for religious people in politics to practice a "ministry of reconciliation." This would, he maintains, focus on increasing reasoned dialogue aimed at finding common ground on, among other things, applying religious values to politics. He is careful to note, however, that there is a difference between allowing religious beliefs to form one's worldview and trying to write those ideas into public policy.

Mr. Danforth's goals are well intentioned and achievable on a limited basis, but current political dynamics probably preclude long-term change in the direction he seeks.

For starters, those at the ideological extremes have an easier time boiling down their views into a sound bite, an all-too-frequent means of political discourse. Besides, the certitude with which those on the far left and far right express their views has a certain appeal for those who like their solutions in neatly wrapped packages. The adage that the "squeaky wheel gets the grease' is an apt description of the current state of affairs, where noise and dogmatism often win out over reasoned discourse.

President Bush once famously said that "I don't do nuance," and that is a worldview shared by liberals and conservatives alike. The Danforth approach requires a great deal of nuance and splitting the difference.

Though current polls indicate that the public is displeased with both parties, that does not generally translate into electing more centrists who share Mr. Danforth's commitment to bridging the ideological divide.

Mr. Danforth's views on moral and social issues are neither strictly conservative nor liberal. He opposes abortion and gay marriage but is against a constitutional amendment banning the latter practice. At the same time, he favors expanding stem-cell research and opposes both the death penalty and mandatory school prayer.

Those positions make him hard to pigeonhole — not necessarily a bad thing — but also make him someone who is not completely comfortable in either political camp.

That is a good perspective from which to try to find a fresh approach to solving the nation's problems. Mr. Danforth does an admirable job of that in "Faith and Politics."

While it is not clear how effective the book will be in changing minds, those who care about improving the state of national affairs should welcome it as an important contribution to our political dialogue.

Read Spitzer's Lips (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 10, 2006

No one is giving Republican John Faso much chance to beat Eliot Spitzer in their race to be the next New York Governor. But the Republican's campaign has already done a public service in prompting the Democratic attorney general to make a no-new-taxes pledge.

Mr. Faso, a former leader of Republicans in the state assembly, is campaigning for a significant supply-side tax cut for the state that is one of the two or three most heavily taxed in the U.S. Mr. Spitzer won't go that far, but during his debate recently with Mr. Faso he pledged, "There will be no tax increase in a Spitzer administration."

Plenty of politicians have made the same pledge to win elections, only to renege later. They include former Virginia Governor and possible Democratic Presidential candidate Mark Warner, current New Jersey Governor Jon Corzine and, most famously, George Herbert Walker Bush.

It's nonetheless significant that Mr. Spitzer is sounding a more moderate economic bent now that he may soon be responsible for the Empire State's economy as Governor. It's easy to play the scourge of business as AG when a Republican is in the state house. But as Governor, he will inherit the same miserable regulatory and tax climate that has made upstate New York a dead zone for new business and so difficult for young people to stay in the state.

Here's a prediction: If Mr. Spitzer does win next month, he'll also soon be calling for reform of Sarbanes-Oxley because it's driving capital out of New York City.

They Debate, We Nap (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, October 10, 2006

You didn't miss much by not tuning into Saturday night's gubernatorial debate. And that's by design.

DEBATE? WHAT DEBATE? The Dodgers were playing, for Pete's sake (granted, not very well). Plus, it was a Saturday night, when hardly anyone watches TV anyway. Who would schedule a debate for a time when nobody would watch, unless they didn't want you to see it?

Exactly. No one wanted you to see the debate between Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger and challenger Phil Angelides, except for maybe Angelides. It was a ho-hum affair in the midst of a ho-hum campaign for an office that is monumentally important but for which relatively few people will vote. For Schwarzenegger, it came down to "Angelides likes taxes." For Angelides, it was "Schwarzenegger likes Bush." And that was pretty much it.

Political debates have long been more about theater than substance, and they are a notoriously poor opportunity for viewers to bone up on the issues or delve deeply into policy. They are stage-managed affairs, full of well-rehearsed quips and zingers that the candidates try to make seem spontaneous. No one is ever swayed by a policy point uttered in a debate, although experts talk endlessly afterward about whether a candidate's performance might have impressed some mythical typical voter watching intently from the sofa.

But until now, debates at least held some practical and ritual significance. They were a way of separating the political nerds, who had been paying close attention anyway, from the vast majority of voters, who zero in on the campaign only when necessary. The subtext of debate night has typically been: For those of you who haven't paid attention until now, election season has begun and it's time for you to learn who the candidates are. So here they are. Here's how they look and act. Check them out and see if any of them strike you as leaders.

Recently, though, political debates have aimed for a lower profile. Campaign managers and political consultants like working with a relatively small and predictable population of voters. Through focus groups, demographic studies and voting statistics, the professionals know how these voters act and what to do to get their support. The last thing campaign honchos need is a huge and unmanageable TV audience hanging on every word and thinking that maybe they, too, just might go to the polls on election day. So we get a lackluster debate like Saturday's, scheduled for the smallest possible exposure, in which the unspoken message from the political establishment is "Just stay home."

The worst part of it is that the political professionals know how to dumb down the elections and keep us at home, and they know how to make that work for their candidates. Too bad it doesn't work so well for the rest of us.

The Cost Of An 'Adequate' Education (WSJ)

By Eric A. Hanushek

The Wall Street Journal, October 9, 2006

The nation is watching to see what happens with New York City school finance. After a dozen years in the courts, the case of Campaign for Fiscal Equity (CFE) v. New York is now back at the Court of Appeals for a final judgment about the added appropriations that the legislature must send to the city. This judgment is, however, unlikely to be the final statement. If the legislature must come up with an incredible sum of money close to the more than $5 billion currently on the table, it may well balk, precipitating a true constitutional crisis.

New York's school-finance case may be the most visible in the nation, but it is certainly not unique. Almost half of the states today have an "adequacy" case in their courts. Only five states have never faced a school-finance case during the past three decades. New York, however, is on center stage this week. Because of the size of the judgment, the New York decision could send shock waves through state legislatures across the country.

Earlier this year New York's intermediate court called for an added appropriation of $4.7 to $5.6 billion per year to go to New York City schools. The state, with Attorney General Eliot Spitzer helming the defense, appealed this decision. Final oral arguments will be given tomorrow, marking at least a culmination in the legal battle, though likely not the last word in the fight.

New Yorkers tend to view this case with righteous indignation: The legislature simply failed to provide the city schools with adequate resources. After all, they argue, the trial court, after listening to seven months of testimony, found this to be a clear violation of the state constitution and slapped a precise dollar value on what it saw to be the magnitude of that violation.

Unfortunately, in determining the cost of an "adequate" education, the court relied heavily on the questionable analysis of consultants hired by the plaintiffs. Their analysis, labeled a "professional judgment model," was advertised as a scientific determination of the amount of spending necessary to secure an "adequate" education for every New York City student. Yet, this analysis violates virtually every principle of science and, as a result, has produced a politically saleable but scientifically unsupportable answer to the problem.

The consultants' approach was to hire a series of New York school personnel to describe what a school that could meet the state's learning standards would look like. These school people were told explicitly to pay no attention to where the money might come from. They should just dream. The fact that they did their dreaming after the court had declared New York's funding formula to be unconstitutional gave an implicit legitimacy to any flights of fancy they might have. In addition, any recommendations they made would likely have a direct impact on their own schools, creating an inherent conflict of interest.

The consultants took the wish lists of these different panels and calculated what the various elements would cost. Perhaps worried that the school personnel did not dream big enough, the consultants did the cost calculations in a way designed to obtain the maximum spending needed. Any thoughtful trade-offs or proposals for different ways to achieve the state's student learning goals were eliminated by the consultants.

As one might expect, the final wish list came with a truly large dollar value attached to it. Spending an additional $5.6 billion on city schools amounts to an increase of $1,000 per year in the average tax bill of every household in New York state. This figure would require a 25% increase in tax rates if funded with the state income tax. Of course, the $1,000 per household figure is clearly an underestimate. It would be difficult to give the city alone such a big funding boost without Buffalo, Rochester, Syracuse and Yonkers lining up to demand their "adequate" share.

One would be hard pressed to overestimate the potential danger posed by these costing-out studies. Consultants are active in virtually every one of the adequacy cases in the nation. Even though they use a variety of methods to affix the dollar value of an adequate education, each clearly represents nothing more than junk science. Many courts are duped by the studies, perhaps not surprisingly given the politics of the cases. But the reality remains: Setting appropriate education funding amounts for New York, or any other state, is beyond the authority of science.

The New York Constitution, like those for the U.S. and for other states, vests the appropriations and spending functions in the political branches of government, not in the courts. Therefore, the New York legislature -- regardless of the exact appropriations set by the courts -- may choose to view any court judgment on appropriations as not binding. If this argument were to prevail, it would precipitate a clear constitutional crisis. If this were the case, however, New York's legislature would likely not seek any direct confrontation, but would instead drag out deliberations for as long as possible.

The parties may reach some sort of compromise. Certainly Eliot Spitzer, now New York's leading gubernatorial candidate, has hinted at bringing about a resolution if he assumes office.

Nonetheless, it will be a hollow victory. Extensive experience and scientific study shows that simply providing more money to schools is not likely to be a very effective policy. There is no reason to expect student achievement in New York City to improve if such a spending policy were enacted. Indeed, the consultants in these adequacy cases are always very careful to avoid claiming that added funds will have any effect on student outcomes. Unfortunately the political paralysis created by these cases stops any consideration of more productive reforms. Instead of talking about performance incentives to districts and schools or linking funding to student outcomes, discussion is stymied by debates over how to raise the money and which districts will be hurt by any change in funding.

Courts in other states will be influenced by what happens in New York -- particularly because of the magnitude of this settlement. If the Court of Appeals continues on the current course, other state courts will be encouraged to follow suit. On the other hand, if the court acknowledges that its role is not appropriating state spending, it could enable New York to return to consideration of policies that might truly fix our schools.

There is no doubt that the children of New York need help. Their achievement levels and their graduation rates need improvement, but this justifies neither bad court decisions nor poor policies.

Bush Warns N Korea But Options Are Limited (FT)

By Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, October 10, 2006

Although President George W. Bush delivered a stern warning to North Korea over the consequences of its nuclear test, analysts say the US has few options but to rely on its international leverage, which has been severely weakened by the war in Iraq.

Critics say the Bush administration blundered in trying to confront North Korea in late 2002 just as it was committing itself to invading Iraq.

"The Bush administration deserves particular criticism," said Gary Samore, vice-president of the independent Council on Foreign Relations in New York. "They had unrealistic expectations of what they could achieve through pressure. The US ability to coerce North Korea is quite limited, especially in the middle of a war with Iraq."

US relations with China, already under strain over its support for Iran and Sudan, will be further tested as the US pushes for a tough response through the UN Security Council. Russia's drift towards war with a US-backed Georgia also complicates US efforts to get its way with Moscow.

Washington is seeking UN approval for 13 measures, most crucially inspections of cargo moving in and out of North Korea and a ban on trade in "dual use" materials that could be applied to development of weapons of mass destruction. Less controversial is the proposed ban on selling "luxury goods" to North Korea.

US ambitions to set up a global network of allied states willing to intercept suspect cargo by land, sea and air led to the formation in 2003 of the Proliferation Security Initiative. China has refused to join, however. It would be wary of giving a blanket approval for such interceptions, and analysts in Washington rule out a full naval blockade.

"That's an act of war that could get out of hand if challenged by North Korea," Mr Samore commented. "The US is not in a position to start a conflict on the Korean peninsula."

Wang Guangya, the Chinese envoy to the UN, called on the Security Council to respond "firmly, constructively and prudently". Ted Galen Carpenter of Washington's Cato Institute warned of a chill in Sino-US relations, saying the US might view "prudent" as "a synonym for weak".

North Korea may be calculating that the punishment it might suffer from China and South Korea will be short-lived as they weigh up the dangers of a nuclear-armed regime imploding under economic duress.

Minxin Pei, director of China studies at the Carnegie Endowment think-tank, said Beijing was angry at having its "face rubbed in the dirt" by North Korea but its priority was to "contain the fallout rather than punish". China might restrict energy supplies to North Korea but was unlikely to cut off all food supplies or support blanket interdictions, Mr Pei commented.

Even before the test, US officials did not hide their frustration with what they saw as China's foot-dragging. But some are starting to concede that the US might have overestimated China's influence and even the extent of its intelligence gathering.

The crisis over North Korea may also affect the impasse over Iran's nuclear ambitions. The failure of US policy towards Pyongyang had already influenced a shift towards a more pragmatic approach in dealing with Tehran.

For U.S., A Strategic Jolt After North Korea's Test (NYT)

WASHINGTON, Oct. 9 — North Korea may be a starving, friendless, authoritarian nation of 23 million people, but its apparently successful explosion of a small nuclear device in the mountains above the town of Kilju on Monday represents a defiant bid for survival and respect. For Washington and its allies, it illuminates a failure of nearly two decades of atomic diplomacy.

North Korea is more than just another nation joining the nuclear club. It has never developed a weapons system it did not ultimately sell on the world market, and it has periodically threatened to sell its nuclear technology. So the end of ambiguity about its nuclear capacity foreshadows a very different era, in which the concern may not be where a nation's warheads are aimed, but in whose hands its weapons and skill end up.

As Democrats were quick to note on Monday, four weeks before a critical national election, President Bush and his aides never gave as much priority to countering a new era of proliferation as they did to overthrowing Saddam Hussein.

Mr. Bush and his aides contend that Iraq was the more urgent threat, in a volatile neighborhood. But the North's reported nuclear test now raises the question of whether it is too late for the president to make good on his promise that he would never let the world's "worst dictators" obtain the world's most dangerous weapons.

"What it tells you is that we started at the wrong end of the 'axis of evil,' " former Senator Sam Nunn, the Georgia Democrat who has spent his post-Congressional career trying to halt a new age of proliferation, said in an interview. "We started with the least dangerous of the countries, Iraq, and we knew it at the time. And now we have to deal with that."

Mr. Bush's top national security aides declined Monday to be interviewed about whether a different strategy over the past five years might have yielded different results. But Stephen J. Hadley, the national security adviser, has described the administration's approach to North Korea as the mirror image of its dealings with Iraq. "You'll recall that we were criticized daily for being too unilateral" in dealing with Saddam Hussein, Mr. Hadley said. "So here we are, working with our allies and friends, stressing diplomacy."

But at the same time, he said the administration had made a conscious decision not to draw "red lines" in dealing with Kim Jong-il's government because "the North Koreans just walk right up to them and then step over them," just to show they can. Other aides say that, lines or no lines, the North simply decided to race for a bomb — and finally made it.

North Korea announced its nuclear breakout in early 2003, kicking out international nuclear inspectors and very publicly beginning its drive to turn its stockpiles of spent nuclear fuel rods into a small arsenal of weapons. Focused then on the coming war with Iraq, Mr. Bush and his administration chose to set no limits.

But foreign policy, as Mr. Nunn says, is "all about priorities," and until Monday the closest Mr. Bush came to drawing a red line for the North was in May 2003, when he declared that the United States and South Korea "will not tolerate nuclear weapons in North Korea."

The Central Intelligence Agency's estimates in the years since have been that the United States has been tolerating exactly that — a small arsenal of nuclear fuel sufficient to produce six or more weapons.

Notably, Mr. Bush did not repeat that threat on Monday morning. Instead, he drew a new red line, one that appeared to tacitly acknowledge the North's possession of weapons. The United States would regard as a "grave threat," he said, any transfer by North Korea of nuclear material to other countries or terrorist groups, and would hold Mr. Kim's government "fully accountable for the consequences of such actions."

To critics of Mr. Bush's counterproliferation policy, this seemed a recognition that the North had successfully defied American, Chinese and Japanese warnings about building weapons and testing them, and was now simply trying to manage the aftermath. North Korea, it appears, is taking a page from Pakistan's strategic playbook: it exploded its first nuclear device in 1998, endured three years of sanctions, and now has emerged as a "major non-NATO ally" of the United States.

Mr. Bush's aides say that if Mr. Kim believes he, too, can expect the world to impose a few sanctions and then lose interest in the issue, he is wrong. "He is really going to rue the day he made this decision," Christopher R. Hill, the assistant secretary of state for East Asian and Pacific affairs, said of Mr. Kim on Monday. But Mr. Bush's critics charge that the threat may be empty. As they see it, Mr. Kim watched the Iraq war and drew a simple lesson: that broken countries armed with nuclear weapons do not get invaded, and do not have to worry about regime change.

"Think about the consequences of having declared something 'intolerable' and, last week, 'unacceptable,' and then having North Korea defy the world's sole superpower and the Chinese and the Japanese," said Graham Allison, the Harvard professor who has studied nuclear showdowns since the Cuban missile crisis. "What does that communicate to Iran, and then the rest of the world? Is it possible to communicate to Kim credibly that if he sells a bomb to Osama bin Laden, that's it?"

Mr. Allison was touching on the central dilemma facing Washington as it tries to extract itself from the morass of Iraq. Whether accurately or not, other countries around the world perceive Washington as tied down, unable or unwilling to challenge them while 140,000 troops are trying to tame a sectarian war.

Divining North Korea's true intentions is always difficult; there is no more closed society on earth. But the broad assumption inside and outside the United States government is that Mr. Kim's first priority is the survival of his government. And the second is that without a nuclear weapon, he believes his government would have no way of staving off the larger, richer powers around it: China, Japan, South Korea and the United States.

All have fought over control of the Korean Peninsula in decades past, and to Mr. Kim's mind, presumably, the prospect that the North could lash out is the only reason they have stayed at bay.

Mr. Kim may have calculated, many experts believe, that at this point there is little more that the Bush administration can do to him. The United States has imposed sanctions on his country since the end of the Korean War. The new crackdown on the banks through which the North conducts many of its illicit activities — counterfeiting, missile sales, trade in small arms — are being choked off, a step the North Korean leaders presumably see as part of a strategy of bringing them down.

It may be years, or decades, before historians know whether Iraq played into Mr. Kim's calculations about when to conduct a nuclear test. But clearly, managing simultaneous crises around the world is straining the system in Washington, and posing the Bush administration with more direct challenges than many believe it can handle at one moment.

That returns Mr. Bush to the problem he faced when he came to office, and that his aides have never stopped arguing about: whether the best way to contain North Korea is to further isolate it, or to draw it out of its paranoid shell. The nuclear test may force Washington to pick a strategy.

Bush's 'Axis Of Evil' Comes Back To Haunt United States (WP)

By Glenn Kessler And Peter Baker, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, October 10, 2006

Nearly five years after President Bush introduced the concept of an "axis of evil" comprising Iraq, Iran and North Korea, the administration has reached a crisis point with each nation: North Korea has claimed it conducted its first nuclear test, Iran refuses to halt its uranium-enrichment program, and Iraq appears to be tipping into a civil war 3 1/2 years after the U.S.-led invasion.

Each problem appears to feed on the others, making the stakes higher and requiring Bush and his advisers to make difficult calculations, analysts and U.S. officials said. The deteriorating situation in Iraq has undermined U.S. diplomatic credibility and limited the administration's military options, making rogue countries increasingly confident that they can act without serious consequences. Iran, meanwhile, will be watching closely the diplomatic fallout from North Korea's apparent test as a clue to how far it might go with its own nuclear program.

"Iran will follow very carefully what happens in the U.N. Security Council after the North Korean test," said Robert J. Einhorn, senior adviser at the Center for Strategic and International Studies (CSIS). "If the United Nations is not able to act forcefully, then Iran will think the path is clear to act with impunity."

Michael E. O'Hanlon, a Brookings Institution scholar and co-author of the new book "Hard Power: The New Politics of National Security," said the U.S. response to North Korea will have ripple effects. "Iran will certainly watch what happens. North Korea watched what happened with Pakistan and decided that the world didn't punish Pakistan too hard or too long," he said. "Iran will certainly notice if North Korea gets treated with kid gloves."

Bush's foreign policy and moved quickly to try to pin blame on the Republicans. "Is this going to help Republicans?" asked Jim Manley, spokesman for Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.). "The answer to that is absolutely not. This is another significant foreign policy failure for the administration."

In Bush's 2002 State of the Union address, a speech designed to shift the political debate from a battle against al-Qaeda to a possible confrontation with Iraq, the president mentioned North Korea, Iraq and Iran and declared: "States like these, and their terrorist allies, constitute an axis of evil, arming to threaten the peace of the world. By seeking weapons of mass destruction, these regimes pose a grave and growing danger. . . . In any of these cases, the price of indifference would be catastrophic."

All three issues came to a head in 2003: The United States invaded Iraq and discovered no weapons of mass destruction; North Korea began to obtain weapons-grade plutonium from fuel rods that had been under international observation; and Iran disclosed that it had made rapid progress with a previously secret uranium-enrichment program.

In contrast to its handling of Iraq, the administration has tried to resolve the North Korean and Iranian nuclear breakouts with diplomacy. But progress has been slow, in part because the United States has been reluctant to hold bilateral talks with either country except within the context of broader talks with other nations.

Former senator Sam Nunn (D-Ga.) faulted the administration for focusing on Iraq first, when greater threats loomed in North Korea and Iran. "We started with Iraq in the 'axis of evil' side, when we thought they did not yet have nuclear weapons, and that sent the signal to others that they better get them quick," he said. "I think we started on the wrong end of that."

The administration launched a full-court press yesterday at the Security Council, proposing elements of a tough resolution that would call for imposing an arms embargo and a series of legally binding U.N. financial and trade sanctions. The United States also called for international inspections of all trade in and out of North Korea to enforce the sanctions.

U.S. officials yesterday were focusing especially closely on the reaction of China, long North Korea's main benefactor. The Chinese government publicly denounced the test in unusually strong language, and a senior U.S. official said the private comments of Chinese officials were equally strong. While China has been reluctant to pressure North Korea, fearing a collapse of the government and mass refugees on its border, "the question is whether a chaotic North Korea is worse than a nuclear North Korea," the official said, speaking on the condition of anonymity because of the diplomatic sensitivities.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice appears likely to make a trip to the region soon to further build support for a tough response by China, Japan and South Korea. Several experts predicted that although China's leadership is angry enough to support some sanctions, it always will stop short of putting enough pressure on Pyongyang to force its collapse. "Full-up sanctions I don't see happening," said former White House Asia expert Michael J. Green, now at CSIS.

James B. Steinberg, President Bill Clinton's deputy national security adviser and now dean of the Lyndon B. Johnson School of Public Affairs at the University of Texas at Austin, said the North Korea test will raise a larger question that echoes Ronald Reagan's most famous 1980 campaign line -- "With respect to the axis of evil," Steinberg said, "are you better off today than you were four years ago? . . . It's clear that the answer is we're worse off with respect to the nuclear proliferation problem in both North Korea and Iran than four to six years ago, and I would argue we're worse off in our overall security because of the situation in Iraq."

Democrats Assail Bush's N. Korea Policy (AP-Y)

By Liz Sidoti, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 10, 2006

Democrats seized on North Korea's brazen act to criticize President Bush's record in confronting the communist regime, contending the administration's focus on Iraq ignored legitimate threats.

Democratic Sen. John Kerry, the president's rival in 2004 and a potential 2008 candidate, assailed Bush's policy as a "shocking failure," and said, "While we've been bogged down in Iraq where there were no weapons of mass destruction, a madman has apparently tested the ultimate weapon of mass destruction."

One month before midterm elections, North Korea's reported nuclear test provided Republicans an opportunity to shift the focus from their embarrassing — and politically explosive — congressional page scandal to national security, an issue the GOP considers its strength.

Sen. Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the Senate's second-ranking Republican, accused Democrats of playing partisan politics with a nuclear weapons threat. "Listening to some Democrats, you'd think the enemy was George Bush, not Kim Jong Il," he said.

Seizing on North Korea's actions to argue Republicans are stronger on security than Democrats is riddled with pitfalls and leaves the GOP's standard-bearer — Bush — as well as his rank-and-file vulnerable to criticism.

The president long has faced complaints that he has failed to sufficiently address North Korea and the threat has festered on his watch.

In the nearly five years since Bush labeled North Korea part of an "axis of evil" with Iran and Iraq, Kim Jong Il's government has withdrawn from the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty, announced it has nuclear weapons, refused to return to six-nation talks and launched seven missiles into the Sea of Japan, including a long-range Taepodong-2.

On Sunday, North Korea said it conducted its first-ever nuclear test.

"The Bush administration has for several years been in a state of denial about the growing challenge of North Korea, and has too often tried to downplay the issue or change the subject," said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev.

"We had the opportunity to stop North Korea from increasing its nuclear power, but George Bush went to sleep at the switch while he pursued his narrow agenda in Iraq," added Sen. Bob Menendez, a Democrat in a tough campaign in New Jersey.

Republicans, in turn, sought to deflect the criticism by lodging some of their own. They voiced their frequent claim that Democrats are weak on security — and dredged up Democratic votes they said illustrated their point.

House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, accused Democrats of standing in the way of work on a missile defense program. "It is now clear that such a position would weaken America's national defense and put Americans in danger," he said.

"Sherrod Brown's far left national security positions more troubling in light of North Korean missile test," the Senate Republicans' campaign committee said in a release that claims Brown voted a dozen times since 1993 to cut funding for ballistic missile defense.

Mindful of the tricky political subtext, some Republicans issued more carefully worded statements or refrained from attacking Democrats altogether.

GOP Sen. Rick Santorum, facing a bitter re-election battle, said in a barely veiled reference to Democrats — "North Korea's actions cause great concern. This is no time for inexperienced, weak leaders."

House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., and others directed their anger at the North Koreans, with the speaker calling the test "a desperate act of a criminal regime."

The GOP's campaign to convince voters that Democratic rule is dangerous for the country was sidetracked when Rep. Mark Foley, R-Fla., resigned amid revelations that he sent sexually explicit electronic messages to teenage males who once worked as House pages. That set off infighting among Republicans — and knocked the party off its strong-on-safety message.

North Korea's Success Is Diplomacy's Failure (MCT)

By Tim Johnson

McClatchy Newspapers, October 10, 2006

BEIJING - In the end, every strategy failed to slow North Korea's nuclear march.

The United States used bullying as much as diplomacy, only to let a weapons program incubate and grow, leading to Monday's nuclear test.

South Korea's "sunshine policy" provided the North with aid, but got nothing in return on nuclear policy.

China, a big brother to North Korea, thought Pyongyang would heed its advice not to roil the waters of East Asia, but it didn't.

"Everybody's a loser," said Moon Chung-in, a political scientist at Yonsei University in Seoul and a frequent adviser to South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun.

DOJ_NMG_0076865

North Korea trumpeted its new deterrent as "a great leap forward," casting itself as victorious. But analysts say pressure on the Hermit Kingdom will build, making Pyongyang a likely loser as well.

"North Korea succeeded in gaining nuclear weapons, but now it will get all kinds of sanctions from neighboring countries," Moon said.

In China, some analysts flayed Washington for not engaging Pyongyang directly in talks, and said North Korea had slid irreversibly into the global nuclear club.

"North Korea has succeeded in its nuclear ambition. The U.S. can do nothing at all now," said Shen Dingli, director of the U.S. Study Center at Fudan University in Shanghai.

Under the watch of the Bush administration, North Korea dropped out of the nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty, booted nuclear monitors, strengthened its missile capabilities, reprocessed nuclear fuel, and built what experts say is an arsenal of at least half a dozen nuclear bombs, maybe more.

North Korea now joins Russia, China, the United States, France, Britain, India and Pakistan in wielding nuclear weapons. Israel, though not an admitted nuclear power, is also believed to have hundreds of nuclear weapons.

In Seoul, President Roh publicly wrung his hands over the failure of policies toward North Korea, admitting that appeasement is unlikely to last in its present form.

"It could be said that the engagement policy has not been effective in resolving the North Korean nuclear crisis," South Korea's Yonhap news agency quoted Roh as saying.

Beijing issued a firm statement condemning North Korea for "brazenly" ignoring the worldwide opposition to its nuclear test, and demanded that it "abide by its pledges on denuclearization."

China in 2003 offered to host talks with the two Koreas, Russia, the United States and Japan on the nuclear crisis. It hosted five rounds of talks before they hit deadlock last year.

The nuclear test highlighted the fact that China, as a major supplier of energy and food to North Korea, never wanted to exercise its leverage to forestall the test. Indeed, some analysts say top Chinese leaders have a greater stomach for a nuclear-armed North Korea, with the turmoil it brings, than for the collapse of the Kim Jong Il regime, which could take away a key friendly buffer state and send refugees into China.

"Many people believe a nuclear North Korea is not necessarily a bad thing for China," said Jin Linbo of the China Institute of International Studies.

But China's public posture was different. It has long called for a nuclear-free peninsula, and its inability to achieve that goal will tie its hands as Washington and Tokyo push for severe sanctions against Pyongyang in the U.N. Security Council.

"China's efforts to solve the nuclear problem by peaceful talks has failed, the mechanism of the six-party talks has failed, and China's attempt to maintain security in the region has failed," said Zhang Liangui, a North Korea expert at the school for senior Communist Party officials in Beijing.

"There aren't many cards for China to play right now," Zhang added, saying he believes China will go along with U.N. sanctions against the North.

East Asia, unlike Europe, has no security architecture that links nations. In East Asia, countries only have bilateral alliances with the United States.

"It plays into the hands of (recently installed Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo) Abe, who can justify greater defense spending," said Peter M. Beck, a Northeast Asia expert for the International Crisis Group, which advocates peaceful crisis resolution.

"It also plays into the hands of hard-liners in Seoul, who say, 'What do we have to show for nine years of sunshine policy?'" he said.

The already-battered Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT), which limits nuclear development and calls for global disarmament, also took a new hit, Beck said. It is under the NPT cloak that Western powers are trying to curb Iran's nuclear program.

Pyongyang's nuclear test, Beck said, "sends a signal to the world that even the most failed regime can defy the will of the United Nations and the United States."

The director of the International Atomic Energy Agency, Mohamed ElBaradei, said in a statement that the breaking of an international moratorium on nuclear testing, which had lasted for nearly a decade, and the emergency of another country with nuclear weapons capacity was "a clear setback to international commitments to move towards nuclear disarmament." He said the test added new urgency to the need for a legally binding universal ban on nuclear testing. The Comprehensive Nuclear Test Ban Treaty has not been ratified by enough countries to bring it into force. The United States and North Korea are among those who have not ratified it.

Condemnation Swift, But Options Are Limited (USAT)

By Bill Nichols

USA Today, October 10, 2006

WASHINGTON — World leaders found themselves in a familiar position Monday: harshly condemning the reclusive communist regime in North Korea for thumbing its nose at the international community.

North Korea's latest provocation, an announcement it had conducted an underground nuclear test, prompted a flurry of tough talk from around the globe.

China, a key supplier of food and oil to North Korea, called the action "brazen." The United Nations Security Council went into emergency session to consider new sanctions. President Bush, the third in a succession of American presidents to try to forestall a North Korean nuclear arsenal, called the test "unacceptable."

Despite the hard-edged rhetoric, foreign policy analysts and nuclear experts pointed out the obvious: World powers have tried to bully, threaten, cajole, entice, sanction and sweet talk North Korea into the community of nations for 50 years, without success.

"North Korea is really the land of bad options," said Kurt Campbell, a foreign affairs analyst at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, a Washington think tank, and a Pentagon official during the Clinton administration. "Horrible options."

The United States has signaled it won't mount a military response. An attack on North Korea could prompt a counterattack on Seoul. That would suck in the 28,000 U.S. troops in South Korea and endanger millions of civilians.

An alternative is economic sanctions. North Korea's isolated populace of 22 million has already endured severe poverty and famine for decades, not to mention almost total isolation under a totalitarian regime. Researchers at Johns Hopkins University estimate that as many as 2 million North Koreans died of hunger and related diseases during the mid-1990s.

Even without ready options, the United Nations was a hub of activity Monday as diplomats on the 15-member Security Council tried to craft a resolution in response.

The United States circulated a draft resolution obtained by the Associated Press late Monday that demands North Korea return to six-party talks and imposes sanctions for Pyongyang's "flagrant disregard" of the Security Council's appeal not to detonate a device.

Among the proposed draft measures: international inspection of all cargo to and from North Korea to limit the spread of nuclear, chemical and biological weapons; bans on luxury goods to and from the North; a ban on North Korean ships docking in any port, or any North Korean aircraft from taking off or landing in any country if they carried arms, nuclear or ballistic missile-related material or luxury goods; and travel restrictions on high-ranking North Korean officials.

In deliberations among council members, "No one defended (North Korea), no one even came close to defending it," said John Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations.

North Korea remained defiant. Its ambassador, Pak Gil Yon, said the U.N. Security Council should congratulate North Korea for its test instead of passing "useless" resolutions.

North Korea has refused for a year to attend six-nation international talks aimed at coaxing it to disarm. Instead, Pyongyang has called for direct talks with Washington and for the United States to drop sanctions it imposed to punish North Korea for alleged counterfeiting.

Ted Galen Carpenter, a foreign policy analyst with the Cato Institute, a Washington think tank, said North Korea's rationale for the test is to improve its bargaining position in future talks, as India and Pakistan appeared to after testing in 1998. "This is part of a long-term strategy," he said. North Korean officials "concluded a good many years ago that the way to retain clout is to have a nuclear arsenal. I suspect Pakistan is their model."

Some foreign policy analysts suggest that the apparent test should jar the United States and key allies to try new strategies.

"This is a terrible event," said Daryl Kimball, executive director of the Arms Control Association, a non-proliferation group in Washington. "This is perhaps the worst non-proliferation event in the history of the nuclear age in the sense that it could have been avoided if … diplomacy had been more effective."

Possible options:

•Direct talks with the United States. Bush has refused North Korea's demand for one-on-one dialogue. Both New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, who dealt with Pyongyang as U.N. ambassador in the Clinton administration, and former secretary of State James Baker say it's time to rethink that strategy.

Richardson proposes direct talks in which the United States would promise not to attack North Korea and to give Pyongyang aid in exchange for its agreement to end its nuclear program. Baker, in a television interview Sunday, said, "It's not appeasement to talk to your enemies," including North Korea.

•Creative use of aid. Michael O'Hanlon, a foreign affairs analyst at the Brookings Institution, a Washington think tank, suggested specific offers of help to the impoverished North Korean people — tied to tougher restrictions on North Korean nukes.

•Pushing China. The United States could promise to withdraw all troops from South Korea if China can pressure the North to disarm, Carpenter said.

China, which has had influence with its communist neighbor in the past, has been cool about using strong-arm tactics because of fears that a collapse of North Korea could result in thousands of refugees streaming into China.

Most Korea watchers agree that Monday's apparent test would roil the region by adding North Korea to the group of nations with nuclear weapons: the United States, Russia, China, Britain, France, India and Pakistan.

(Israel, believed to possess nuclear weapons, has not acknowledged having an arsenal.)

The nuclear ambitions of North Korea and bizarre behavior of its leader, Kim Jong Il, have long rattled Japan, South Korea and China and prompted talk in Tokyo and Seoul that those nations should go nuclear as well.

The test will "transform the security environment in North Asia, and we will be entering a new, dangerous nuclear age," said Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe.

Kimball said the controlled explosion would allow North Korea to test the performance of its nuclear weapons technology against design goals and make adjustments. He and other nuclear analysts said the fact that North Korea could explode a nuclear device was not surprising, given longtime suspicions about the advanced state of Pyongyang's nuclear program.

North Korea may have enough plutonium for as many as 13 nuclear weapons, according to the Institute for Science and International Security, a Washington think tank. Seismic data and air analysis aren't enough to tell experts whether North Korea is able to miniaturize a nuclear device to fit into a warhead on a missile.

North Korea tested seven missiles in July, including a long-range missile capable of reaching the United States. That missile, the Taepodong-2, failed within a minute. Six shorter-range missiles fell into the Sea of Japan.

David Albright, a former U.N. nuclear inspector and president of the Institute for Science and International Security, expressed surprise that the North Koreans staged only one explosion. Pakistan and India each carried out half a dozen tests over several days in 1998.

"You grab the opportunity when you can to test several times," Albright said. He called the North Korean test "more of a demonstration than an attempt to learn as much as they could about nuclear weapons."

He added: "They'll learn something even with one, but they could have learned more."

The reasons for the timing of the test weren't clear — made even more mysterious by Kim Jong Il's track record of unpredictability. Kim took power in 1994 after the death of his father, dictator Kim Il Sung.

The younger Kim is known for quirks, among them his passion for Hennessy cognac and James Bond films. "You never know how to take this guy, because he does erratic things," said Rep. Curt Weldon, R-Pa., who has talked with Kim seven times.

North Korea conducted some of its most recent missile tests on the evening of July 4 in the United States, suggesting it wanted to send a message. Monday's test came:

•One day after the ninth anniversary of Kim's assuming his father's titles. While he became the de facto ruler in 1994, he didn't formally succeed him until Oct. 8, 1997.

•A day before South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki Moon was nominated as the next U.N. secretary-general.

Richardson said his big concern is that North Korea appears to have given up on the multiparty talks with the United States, China, Japan, Russia and South Korea and adopted "a bunker mentality." Hard-liners appear to have won debate in Pyongyang, he said. "Unless that changes, they're going to keep building more nuclear weapons."

Jim Walsh, a North Korea expert at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, said Pyongyang apparently has decided it is willing to weather new sanctions in order to gain the status and respect of a nuclear nation.

"They've made a decision to bite the bullet," Walsh said of North Korea. "For all the brave talk by the U.S. and Japan, there isn't a hell of a lot they can do."

U.S. Urges Sanctions On North Korea (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz And Colum Lynch, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, October 10, 2006

The White House pushed yesterday for aggressive new sanctions on North Korea, including measures to limit trade in military and luxury items, as Pyongyang's claim that it conducted an underground nuclear test defied the administration's efforts to stop the spread of weapons of mass destruction.

Japan, Russia, South Korea -- and, significantly, China, North Korea's closest ally -- joined the United States in condemning the reported test, giving the Bush administration hope that it might unify the international community against Pyongyang. But U.S. officials acknowledged uncertainty about whether that would translate into strict U.N. sanctions, given China's traditional reluctance to lean heavily on its ally.

There were questions yesterday about the strength and success of the reported North Korean explosion, but there was little doubt among White House officials, lawmakers and outside experts that the action added a volatile new ingredient to an already dangerous world environment.

President Bush, acknowledging he could not confirm that a nuclear test occurred early yesterday in North Korea, said that the claim was nonetheless a "provocative act" and that he is "committed to diplomacy." Noting that North Korea has transferred missile technology to Iran and Syria, Bush also seemed to draw a sharp line that he warned Pyongyang not to cross.

"The transfer of nuclear weapons or material by North Korea to states or non-state entities would be considered a grave threat to the United States, and we would hold North Korea fully accountable of the consequences of such action," Bush told reporters at the White House.

If the test is confirmed, North Korea will be the eighth member of the club of declared nuclear powers -- and one led by a reclusive Stalinist dictator known for cruelty and unpredictability.

Rep. Jim Leach (R-Iowa), chairman of the House International Relations subcommittee on Asia, said the action could prod Japan to drop its non-nuclear position, encourage Iran to harden its stance in negotiations over its own reported nuclear program and make it difficult to stop North Korea from marketing weapons to "undesirable parties."

The new claim also promised to renew scrutiny of the Bush administration's handling of North Korea and more generally its efforts to confront rogue states, just as crucial midterm elections are approaching. North Korea has ignored repeated warnings from the Bush administration on nuclear and missile testing.

Democrats quickly seized on the new North Korean claim as evidence that Bush has bungled his foreign policy, and even some conservatives voiced concern that the initial White House response yesterday was not stern enough.

"Unfortunately, on the Bush Administration's watch, North Korea's nuclear arsenal has grown to as many as a dozen bombs," Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) said in a statement. "Distracted by Iraq and paralyzed by internal divisions, the Bush Administration has for several years been in a state of denial about the growing challenge of North Korea, and has too often tried to downplay the issue or change the subject."

Sen. Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.), the majority whip, said of the Democrats: "It doesn't make any difference what [Bush] does, they just come out and trash him." McConnell said in an interview that he hopes that China might be encouraged to sign on to a plan for tough sanctions on North Korea, noting a Chinese Foreign Ministry statement that said Pyongyang "defied the universal opposition of international society and flagrantly conducted the nuclear test."

"For China, that's pretty tough language," McConnell said, echoing a statement voiced privately by Bush administration officials.

At the United Nations yesterday, the Bush administration proposed an arms embargo and financial and trade sanctions on North Korea, as well as international inspections of all trade going in and out of the country to enforce them. The measures were contained in a U.S. draft resolution presented to the 15-nation council yesterday.

John R. Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, told diplomats at a closed-door emergency session that the U.S. initiative is designed to limit North Korea's ability to import or export nuclear and ballistic missile technology and hinder its capacity to raise illicit money, citing the alleged manufacture of counterfeit U.S. dollars, senior council diplomats said.

The draft resolution would also bar the import of all luxury goods and demand that North Korea cease its nuclear activities and restart multiparty talks aimed at resolving the nuclear crisis. The resolution would give North Korea 30 days to comply with council demands or face "such further action as may be needed."

Britain and France voiced support for sanctions on North Korea but stopped short of endorsing the draft resolution.

Japan's U.N. ambassador, Kenzo Oshima, said his government "sees eye to eye" with the Americans on many of the proposals. The Japanese, in fact, offered amendments that in some cases go further; Japan called for a ban on all North Korean exports, for instance, and a ban on North Korean ships or aircraft calling on foreign countries.

China, meanwhile, cautioned that the Security Council should pursue only diplomatic means to persuade North Korea to stop its nuclear activities.

China's U.N. ambassador, Wang Guangya, said that Beijing opposes the North Korean test and that it is ready to discuss "how the Security Council could react firmly, constructively and prudently with regard to this challenge." But he declined to say whether Beijing would support a sanctions resolution. "The door to solve this issue from a diplomatic point of view is still open," he said.

Privately, U.S. officials said they are hopeful after private conversations with the Chinese that Beijing is sufficiently angry with North Korea to sign on to the U.S. plan.

"This was really a direct challenge to the Chinese, and indications are that they are not taking this lightly," said one senior U.S. official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitive deliberations. "We are hopeful that they will exert whatever influence they have left with the North Koreans."

Leach and Rep. Tom Lantos (Calif.), the ranking Democrat on the International Relations Committee, urged the administration to open direct talks with the North Koreans, which the White House has resisted except in the context of broader negotiations with China, Japan, Russia and South Korea.

"My impression is that the administration is profoundly divided in their approach to North Korea," Lantos said. "I am convinced that there are very senior people in the administration who agree with me that dialogue is needed."

But former House speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.), who has been critical of the administration's efforts on North Korea, drew a different lesson.

"We keep trying to find an official diplomatic technique for dealing with a regime that violates every norm of human decency," he said, adding that the administration needs to step up efforts to undermine the government by trying to get food and supplies to North Koreans via unofficial channels.

Pentagon Assesses Responses, Including A Possible Blockade (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

The New York Times, October 10, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 9 — Now that North Korea seems to have made good on its threat with what appears to be a nuclear test, United States military commanders and civilian policy makers are refining plans in the event that President Bush orders a blockade of North Korean shipments to prevent the sale of a completed bomb or nuclear components.

DOJ_NMG_0076870

Senior officers say Navy and Air Force combat and surveillance equipment are already in the region, and more could be deployed rapidly.

Still, any unilateral effort by the United States to cordon off North Korea by sea and air could founder along the country's lengthy land border with China.

"This is a tough question," one senior official with years of experience in military planning said Monday, speaking as did others on the condition of anonymity because he was discussing classified war plans. "The only good options were before North Korea got the bomb. There are no good options now."

For five decades, the American military has written war plans and deployed forces for a worst-case situation in the Korean peninsula: a major artillery, missile and ground attack from north to south across the demilitarized zone.

But a conventional war is no longer the most pressing military threat. It is nuclear proliferation.

Many staff officers contend that North Korea's ballistic missile and nuclear programs are not primarily intended as part of a plan for a land attack on South Korea.

If anything, North Korea probably regards its effort to develop a nuclear arsenal as a deterrent against an attack by the United States.

The North Korean nuclear efforts could also be intended to press South Korea for diplomatic and economic gain, and to hold Japan, another important American ally, at risk, gaining even more leverage against the United States.

Given that geopolitical geometry, American military officers and senior policy makers say, the Pentagon's abilities in the region, along with those of South Korea and Japan, are sufficient against the shifting North Korean military threat.

While land combat is not an imminent threat, Pentagon and military officials say, the prolonged deployments of ground forces in Iraq and Afghanistan have doubtless complicated planning for the Korean Peninsula.

Should more ground forces be required for South Korea, only a handful of combat brigades stand ready in the United States, Pentagon and military officials say. To bolster the force, additional combat units now getting ready for tours in Iraq could be pointed to the Pacific instead, with troops already in Iraq staying there longer than planned.

Although the decision to move a full combat brigade of American ground forces from South Korea to Iraq in 2004 generated much public debate on the peninsula, the Pentagon more quietly has shifted substantial numbers of heavy Air Force bombers and attack aircraft from the United States to bases throughout the region to offset the decrease in ground forces. The Air Force's stealth bombers, with intercontinental range, are also available from their base in the American Midwest.

Navy aircraft aboard carriers in the Pacific are on call, as are submarines equipped with a range of conventional and nuclear missiles. The most modern Patriot antimissile batteries have also been assigned to the region, as well as Aegis cruisers with abilities designed to track and shoot down missiles.

"Taken together, this has added a tremendous amount of capability more appropriate for the threat right now," a senior Defense Department official said.

Pentagon officials acknowledge that the sustained deployments to Iraq and Afghanistan have heightened the risks that would be faced if there were a Korean conflict because important equipment is committed to the Middle East.

Weapons systems that officers call "enablers" are routinely in short supply and are heavily engaged in Iraq and Afghanistan; they include intelligence equipment like the pilotless Predator surveillance aircraft. Likewise, large stockpiles of precision-guided munitions have been placed within striking range of Iraq and Afghanistan. While those weapons are also in the Pacific arsenals, senior officials would have to weigh the risk to both military theaters and decide how best to allocate limited resources.

Even senior commanders agree that the commitments to Iraq and Afghanistan have imposed risks on the American military, an assessment contained in a classified report to Congress last year from the departing chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Gen. Richard B. Myers.

General Myers wrote that the concentration of troops and advanced weapons in Iraq and Afghanistan limited the Pentagon's ability to deal with other potential armed conflicts.

Major combat operations elsewhere in the world, if ordered by the president, still would succeed — but would be more protracted and would produce higher casualties among American forces and foreign civilians, General Myers wrote. A range of senior officers have said that assessment still stands.

One of the most significant and worrisome complications is that American intelligence agencies have no confidence that they can locate all of North Korea's weapons depots, development laboratories, nuclear command centers and leadership hide-outs — though American intelligence abilities are said to have worried the North Korean leadership in the past.

American intelligence officials concluded that Kim Jong-il, the North Korean leader, went into hiding during the final buildup to the invasion of Iraq in 2003 because he feared that he, too, might be tracked and attacked.

After North Korea's newest announcement, military analysts continued Monday to assess whether its announcement that it had tested a nuclear device, in defiance of international opinion, represented a calculation by Mr. Kim that he was less vulnerable now — or that he needed to join the elite club of declared nuclear powers to deter a possible American attack.

World Condemns North Korea (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, October 10, 2006

Science: Seismic waves probably came from a nuclear explosion, but a weak one; Pressure: China may hold the key to forcing Pyongyang into serious negotiations; Impact: The test is seen as having a des

UNITED NATIONS — International condemnation poured down on North Korea on Monday for its announced nuclear test, as scientists tried to determine whether the underground blast was a successful nuclear explosion and diplomats conferred on how to contain the rogue regime.

The U.N. Security Council swiftly denounced the North Korean action and began work on a U.S.-sponsored resolution aimed at punishing the country for violating a moratorium on nuclear testing.

The measures advocated by the United States include an international arms embargo, a ban on all trade relating to weapons of mass destruction, a freeze on funds linked to North Korea's missile and nuclear programs or its suspected counterfeiting of U.S. dollars, and a ban on trade in luxury goods.

The U.S. proposal also would authorize international inspection of cargo to and from North Korea to prevent the regime in Pyongyang from selling nuclear technology to other countries or armed groups.

China and Russia, which had been North Korea's grudging protectors on the Security Council, seemed ready to join in at least some sanctions. Both nations hold veto power at the council, and China in particular would be key to any effort to enforce sanctions. Ambassadors of the five permanent council members worked on refining a resolution throughout the day, with meetings expected to continue today.

China has the greatest leverage over North Korea, its isolated and impoverished neighbor, because it supplies more than 70% of the nation's fuel and 40% of its food, according to intelligence analysts in the region. Beijing has been resistant to economic sanctions because officials fear that punishing North Korea too harshly could push the country — already subject to periodic famine — over the edge, resulting in a flood of refugees into China's neighboring Liaoning and Jilin provinces and spurring domestic instability.

U.S. intelligence officials accept the North Koreans' claim that they set off a nuclear device, but they note that the magnitude of the explosion was small by nuclear standards — less than a kiloton, a fraction of the power of the atomic bombs the United States dropped on Japan in World War II. The relatively small size of the explosion makes some scientists and intelligence experts believe there may have been a problem with the test or a flaw in the design of the device.

World leaders voiced their concern about the prospect of having North Korea as the latest entrant to the club of nuclear powers. They urged the North's leader, Kim Jong Il, to give up the country's nuclear program and return to negotiations.

Officials in Washington and other world capitals pointed to two potentially grim outcomes from North Korea's becoming a nuclear weapons state: a nuclear arms race in East Asia and an effort by Pyongyang to export atomic weapons.

Some U.S. military officials said Monday that Japan might come to believe that its only assurance against attack from North Korea would be to build its own nuclear bomb, reviving the Cold War doctrine of mutually assured destruction, often referred to by the acronym MAD. Even before the North Korean test, Japan's new prime minister, Shinzo Abe, had argued for a greater role for Japan's military.

"The question is: Does Japan develop nuclear weapons?" said an Army officer with extensive experience in the Korean peninsula, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss the matter publicly. "Do you have MAD all over Asia?

"It is very much in China's interest and Russia's interest to get North Korea back in the box," the official said. "China does not want to see a nuclear Japan."

President Bush, in his response to the North Korean announcement, focused on the danger of a spread of nuclear technology.

"Once again, North Korea has defied the will of the international community, and the international community will respond," Bush said after speaking by phone to the leaders of China, South Korea, Russia and Japan.

"Today's claim by North Korea serves only to raise tensions, while depriving the North Korean people of increased prosperity and better relations with the world" through talks, Bush said.

Bush criticized North Korea for passing missile technology to Syria and Iran, calling the Pyongyang regime "one of the world's leading proliferators." He said that if North Korea passed on nuclear know-how, it would be "a grave threat to the United States, and we would hold North Korea fully accountable [for] the consequences of such action."

The Chinese Foreign Ministry issued a sharply worded statement Monday in which it termed North Korea's action "brazen" even as it called for calm.

"The Chinese side strongly demands the North Korean side to abide by its pledges on denuclearization and to stop any action that would worsen the situation," it said.

China rarely speaks bluntly in public about its neighbor. Nor does it tend to issue statements within hours of an event, as it did Monday. Both actions indicate the gravity Beijing attaches to North Korea's announcement.

China has used its leverage with North Korea in the past. In early 2003, it reportedly turned off North Korea's oil supply for a few days, ostensibly because of "technical problems." That move quickly brought Pyongyang back to international negotiations it had abandoned.

Russian leaders also denounced Pyongyang's news. In Moscow, President Vladimir V. Putin said he would coordinate actions with the United States.

"Russia definitely denounces the tests conducted by North Korea," Putin said at a Cabinet meeting, according to the Russian news agency Interfax. "And this is not just a question of Korea itself. It is a question of the enormous damage done to the process of nonproliferation of weapons of mass destruction in the world."

But the U.N. ambassadors from Russia and China cautioned against abandoning diplomacy in the heat of the crisis.

Russian Ambassador Vitaly Churkin called for "cool heads" in dealing with the crisis, and Chinese Ambassador Wang Guangya said his government would support a "firm, constructive but prudent reaction from the council." He pointedly did not mention sanctions, saying that "the door to solve this issue from a diplomatic point of view is still open."

In an emergency Security Council meeting Monday morning, U.S. Ambassador John R. Bolton presented 13 elements for a resolution aimed at punishing North Korea.

He said both China and Russia seemed ready to join the rest of the council in the punitive action. "No one defended it. No one even came close to defending it," he said of the declared nuclear test. "We'll see how the negotiations go, but I think we're off to an important start here," Bolton said.

The United States has been urging other countries to join it in economic sanctions imposed last year aimed at shutting down North Korea's alleged money laundering and counterfeiting of U.S. dollars.

Russian officials also said they could enforce sanctions if the U.N. adopted them. "We have a very small border with North Korea," Churkin said. "I assure you there is no problem monitoring that part of the border."

In the shadow of the North Korean crisis, the Security Council also formally nominated South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki-moon to be the U.N.'s next secretary-general. The nomination will be passed on to the General Assembly for approval this week. Ban would take office when Kofi Annan steps down Dec. 31.

Ban held a news conference in Seoul to accept the nomination amid the flurry of discussions about Pyongyang. He said the decision was an honor for him and his country.

"This should be a moment of joy, but instead I stand here with a very heavy heart" because of the announcement of the nuclear test, he said.

Ban has said that as secretary-general, he would like to be personally involved in negotiations with North Korea, drawing on his expertise from three years of participation in international talks over the North's nuclear program.

He said he did not consider it a conflict of interest to be involved in an issue so integral to his country's well-being. "I would like to deal with North Korea personally, even go there, because I have experience and a deep understanding of this complex issue," he said in a recent interview. "I know I will be able to do my job as secretary-general with impartiality."

Bush Rebukes North Korea; U.S. Seeks New U.N. Sanctions (NYT)

By Warren Hoge And Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, October 10, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Oct. 9 — The United States proposed tough new United Nations sanctions on North Korea on Monday after its reported test of a nuclear weapon, and President Bush warned the North that he considered its activity a potential threat to American national security.

At an emergency meeting of the United Nations Security Council, the United States pressed for international inspections of all cargo moving into and out of North Korea to detect weapons-related material and a ban on all trading in military goods and services with the country.

At the White House, President Bush called the North Korean test “a threat to international peace and security” and condemned it as a “provocative act.”

But Russia and China, which have veto power and have consistently opposed tough sanctions, did not signal that they were ready to go along with the American proposal. Britain, France and Japan said they were also pressing for strong sanctions, which the Council is expected to debate in the coming days.

Coming just one month before the November midterm elections, North Korea’s reported test had immediate political ramifications. Democrats were already using their campaigns to argue that the war in Iraq had made the United States less secure by diverting attention away from threats like North Korea; now they are using the North’s claim to hammer away at their theme.

Mr. Bush also issued a pointed, albeit carefully worded, warning to the North not to export any nuclear technology it might have. In the past, North Korea has sold its weapons systems to other countries.

“The transfer of nuclear weapons or material by North Korea to states or nonstate entities would be considered a grave threat to the United States,” Mr. Bush said. “And we would hold North Korea fully accountable of the consequences of such action.”

The president has not used the phrase “grave threat” in the past with respect to North Korea, and analysts interpreted the remark as a signal that the White House was, in effect, raising the threshold on what kind of actions it would be willing to accept from the North, given that diplomacy has so far not worked.

“He has finally drawn a very clear red line, which is essentially: we know you have nukes, don’t even think about proliferating,” said Mike Chinoy, an expert in Korean security at the Pacific Council on International Policy, a research institution in Los Angeles.

“It’s kind of always been the unspoken administration red line,” Mr. Chinoy said, “because the reality is that, whatever the harshness of their rhetoric, the Bush administration has not been able to actually stop North Korea from staging this nuclear breakout.”

Democratic Party strategists quickly circulated a "talking points" memorandum to Democratic candidates, urging them to cast the reported North Korean nuclear test as "a colossal foreign policy failure of the Bush administration." Several picked up on that theme.

Claire McCaskill, a Democratic candidate for the Senate from Missouri, convened a conference call with Richard Ben-Veniste, a member of the commission that investigated the Sept. 11 attacks, to talk to reporters about North Korea. Representative Harold E. Ford Jr., the Democratic Senate candidate in Tennessee, issued a statement to reporters, as did Senator Robert Menendez, the New Jersey Democrat in a tough re-election fight.

"Today's nuclear test by North Korea confirms our worst fears and illustrates just how much the Bush administration's incompetence has endangered our nation," Mr. Menendez said in the statement, adding, "While George Bush bogged our military down to topple a regime that had no weapons of mass destruction, a brutal dictator in North Korea has strengthened a nuclear arsenal that has the potential to threaten the West Coast of the United States."

Republicans were more muted in their reactions; Senator Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the Republican whip, issued a brief statement that did not mention Mr. Bush's leadership at all, but simply called North Korea's claim a "confrontational move designed only to destabilize the region."

White House officials insisted that despite the talk of sanctions at the United Nations, the administration's goal remains persuading North Korea to return to the six-nation talks and give up its nuclear program. Those negotiations have dragged on for more than two years with no substantive results, and North Korea left them 13 months ago.

Mr. Bush spent more than an hour on the telephone Monday morning in separate calls to leaders of the four nations, aside from the United States and North Korea, that are participating in those talks: Japan, China, South Korea and Russia.

Asserting Washington's determination to protect Japan and South Korea, its principal allies in the region, Mr. Bush said the United States "will meet the full range of our deterrent and security commitments."

He was careful to say that intelligence officials were still working to confirm North Korea's statement about its test. But he said that "such a claim itself constitutes a threat to international peace and security."

China, North Korea's closest supporter and neighbor, called the action a "flagrant" violation of international opinion and said it "firmly opposes" North Korea's conduct. Russia's president, Vladimir V. Putin, said his country "absolutely condemns" the test.

John R. Bolton, the American ambassador to the United Nations, reported that the 15 members of the Security Council were "solid" in deploring the North Korean move, and he said he hoped for swift action. But by Monday evening the Council adjourned its deliberations and set further meetings for Tuesday while, Mr. Bolton said, they received instructions from their capitals.

Richard A. Grenell, Mr. Bolton's spokesman, said the United States was merging its suggestions with those from Japan and that a draft resolution was being composed on that basis.

In its 13-point proposal, the United States urged the Security Council to require North Korea to dismantle its nuclear program, suspend its building of ballistic missiles, freeze assets and transactions associated with the development of unconventional weapons, impose a ban on trade in luxury goods and prevent abuse of the international financial system, a reference to North Korean counterfeiting activities.

According to a draft amendment, the Japanese want to place additional restrictions on North Korean ships, aircraft and products, and prevent North Korean officials from being able to move outside the country's borders.

Japan is also suggesting that the secretary general "actively engage in this matter."

Earlier Monday, the Security Council formally nominated Ban Ki-moon, the foreign minister of South Korea, as the new secretary general, succeeding Kofi Annan when he retires Dec. 31. Mr. Ban had said in a Seoul news conference that he intended to make peace on the Korean Peninsula a high priority.

Mr. Bolton said the new resolution ought to be drawn up under Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter, which makes sanctions mandatory and militarily enforceable.

It is a procedure that China and Russia, both permanent members, traditionally resist. It was eliminated from the resolution passed in July condemning North Korean missile launchings.

While Wang Guangya, the Chinese ambassador, said Beijing condemned the North Korean action, which it had warned North Korea against taking, he turned aside questions on whether China would now support a sanctions resolution.

He said only that the Council should “react firmly, constructively and prudently,” adding that “the door to solve this issue from a diplomatic point of view is still open.”

Vitaly I. Churkin, the Russian ambassador, also declined to state whether Moscow’s view on sanctions had changed. “I think the North Koreans will be facing a very serious attitude on the part of the Security Council,” he said, without elaborating.

Moscow and Beijing would be particularly affected by the American call for border inspections of shipments in and out of North Korea since the borders involved are theirs.

U.S., Japan Lead Push To Sanction Pyongyang (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, October 10, 2006

NEW YORK -- The United States and Japan yesterday pressed the U.N. Security Council to approve tough new sanctions against North Korea, amid near-universal condemnation of Pyongyang's claim that it had tested a nuclear weapon.

Among the proposed steps was a forcible stopping and searching of ships traveling to and from North Korean ports to prevent the export of nuclear materials.

President Bush, speaking at the White House, said the North had "once again defied the will of the international community, and the international community will respond."

Mr. Bush warned that any attempt by Pyongyang to export its nuclear technology to rogue states "would be considered a grave threat to the United States, and we would hold North Korea fully accountable for the consequences of such action."

The purported test was sharply criticized by all of North Korea's neighbors, U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan, the leaders of the five permanent members of the Security Council and Mohamed ElBaradei, head of the United Nations' International Atomic Energy Agency.

North Korean officials said yesterday that they had conducted an underground nuclear test at a barren location in the country's northeast, sparking an intense day of diplomacy in New York and in capitals around the world. The purported test came just three days after the Security Council unanimously denounced the idea.

U.N. Ambassador John R. Bolton said yesterday that Washington and Tokyo are seeking a resolution under Chapter 7 of the U.N. Charter, which allows the council to impose military, economic and diplomatic penalties on nations to protect international peace and security.

Mr. Bolton said he was impressed by the unanimity of the council's approach to the North, in a morning session that lasted barely half an hour.

"No one defended [the missile test]; no one even came close to defending it," the U.S. representative said.

The Security Council meets again today on the crisis.

China, North Korea's main ally, has been reluctant in the past to support harsh measures against the North. But Mr. Bolton said Beijing had not objected when the tough measures were first outlined to Security Council ambassadors at yesterday's closed emergency session.

"I didn't see any protectors of North Korea in that room this morning," Mr. Bolton said.

Wang Guangya, China's U.N. ambassador, said his country was "formally opposed to [North Korea's] nuclear test."

"China is ready to discuss with other council members to see how the Security Council could react firmly, constructively, and prudently with regard to this challenge," he said.

Mr. Wang did not say whether Beijing would support the coercive Chapter 7 measures, but he noted that "the door to solve this issue from diplomatic point of view is still open."

Christopher Hill, the State Department's point man on the North Korean nuclear issue, told CNN that U.S. policy now would be designed to "make [North Korean leader] Kim Jong-il rue the day he made the decision" to proceed with the test.

U.N. diplomats said privately that Mr. Bolton told the Security Council session that Washington would view a North Korean attack on South Korea or Japan as an attack on the United States.

The U.S.-Japan draft resolution, in addition to urging North Korea to return to stalled regional talks on its nuclear program, proposed a range of sanctions against the secretive communist regime in Pyongyang, including:

•The inspection of all cargo shipped to and from North Korean ports to prevent nuclear proliferation.

•A ban on trade in luxury goods and military items with the North.

•A requirement that U.N. states freeze all assets related to North Korea's weapons and missile programs.

•Increased scrutiny and prohibitions on North Korean financial transactions that could support nuclear or military programs.

Pyongyang's U.N. ambassador, Pak Gil-yon, told reporters that the test would help "the maintenance and guarantee of peace and security in the Peninsula and the region." He said other nations should "congratulate" the North for its success.

A North Korean official said the United States should agree to hold direct talks with his government on security guarantees to avert a situation in which Pyongyang would feel compelled to launch nuclear-armed missiles, South Korea's Yonhap News Agency reported today.

"We want this situation to be concluded before the unhappy situation arises in which we fire nuclear missiles, and this depends on how the United States acts," the official was quoted as saying in Beijing on the condition of anonymity.

"What we want is North Korea's safety, including a guarantee of our regime," the official said.

North Korea did have one defender yesterday. Iran, which the United States and its European allies say is running its own clandestine nuclear weapons program, said on its state radio that U.S. "pressure and humiliation" had led North Korea to conduct the test.

North Korea's Political, Economic Gamble (WP)

By Anthony Faiola And Maureen Fan, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, October 10, 2006

Analysts Say Risks Include Loss of Key Regional Aid

TOKYO, Oct. 9 -- North Korea may have gained bragging rights on Monday as the world's newest nuclear power, but the pivotal question now is whether the secretive communist government can survive the political fallout.

While the United States and Japan have long pushed for a hard line against North Korea, there were early indications Monday that South Korea and China, the North's chief benefactors, may be reconsidering their support for the government of Kim Jong Il. There were also concerns that Pyongyang's claims of a nuclear test could touch off an arms race in Northeast Asia.

Analysts said any major development would threaten stability in the strategically vital region, in which the United States has long maneuvered diplomatically among friend and foe.

China and South Korea have poured billions of dollars in aid and investment into the North, effectively propping up Kim's government under the assumption that any collapse there would send millions of desperate refugees pouring across the country's borders. The risk of such an economic calamity, they have gambled, has outweighed the risk of a nuclear-armed North Korea.

But the announcement of a test, analysts said, may have represented a tipping point. In a telephone call with U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, China's foreign minister condemned North Korea for having "ignored universal opposition of the international community," the Chinese Foreign Ministry said in a statement. The minister, Li Zhaoxing, also stressed that the Chinese government was "resolutely opposed" to the nuclear test.

South Korea, meanwhile, immediately halted delivery of an emergency assistance package to help the North deal with recent floods. President Roh Moo Hyun suggested that his country's "sunshine policy" of engagement -- of which he was a vocal supporter -- had failed.

"The South Korean government at this point cannot continue to say that this engagement policy is effective," Roh said in a nationally televised speech. "Ultimately, it is not something we should give up on, but objectively speaking, the situation has changed. Being patient and accepting whatever North Korea does is no longer acceptable."

Any shift in policy by China or South Korea would be at least partly based on the anticipated reaction of Japan, the nation that today feels most threatened by North Korea's ballistic missiles. Analysts have assumed that a nuclear-armed North Korea would lead Tokyo to accelerate plans to redraft its pacifist constitution and rearm itself with a more aggressive military.

Last week, a U.S. congressional report went as far as to suggest that a test by the North could set in motion a domino effect in which Japan, South Korea and perhaps Taiwan pursue their own nuclear weapons, touching off an arms race that would dramatically escalate the consequences of any regional disputes.

Although some observers were quick to caution that China's criticism of North Korea might not necessarily translate into action, there was little question that the reported test had deeply embarrassed China. The Chinese government has taken the lead in the diplomatic effort to denuclearize North Korea at long-stalled six-party talks in Beijing, bringing the United States, Japan, Russia, and South Korea and North Korea to the table.

"It's a big slap to China," Zhu Feng, a professor of international studies at Peking University, said of the North's test. "It's time for a new approach, because we just got humiliated. For four years, we have been so good to North Korea, trying to make the right conditions for Kim Jong Il to abandon nuclear weapons in exchange for normalization with the U.S. and Japan and a lot of economic aid. China's goodwill has been relentlessly wasted."

Analysts said China will now be faced with heightened international pressure to accept tougher economic sanctions and reduce or even cut its aid -- including oil shipments -- to coerce Pyongyang back to the negotiating table. China's options are limited now, and although analysts say it will probably harden its stance against North Korea, it has in the past drawn the line at any action that would endanger Kim's government.

In effect, Beijing will have to make a difficult decision.

"If China votes for sanctions at the U.N., the China and North Korea relationship will break up," said Shi Yinhong, a professor of international relations at People's University in Beijing. "And if the United Nations really passes financial sanctions toward North Korea, the risk of a society collapse of North Korea is high."

For its part, Japan is likely to take an even harder line than before. The country's new prime minister, Shinzo Abe, on Monday vowed a tough response, saying he would "immediately consider taking stern measures."

Those are likely to include a ban on millions of dollars' worth of annual remittances sent home by North Korean nationals living in Japan.

But even coupled with sharper sanctions from the United States, analysts say, the pressure brought to bear on North Korea is unlikely to be enough without the full support of Beijing and Seoul.

Analysts say Kim has already succeeded in at least one way. With its declaration of a nuclear test, North Korea has made the price of a military solution to the standoff -- something Bush administration officials had largely dismissed given North Korea's arsenal of ballistic missiles and its million-man army -- even higher. Some suggested Monday that it may already be too late to turn back the clock.

"North Korea's message is that no matter how hard South Korea, Japan, the United States gang up on them, they won't budge," said Seung Joo Baek of the Seoul-based Korea Institute for Defense Analyses. "They want to be recognized as a nuclear power. They are assuming that it is the only thing that will keep them safe. We will have to wait and see if they are right."

Fan reported from Beijing. Special correspondent Joohee Cho in Seoul contributed to this report.

Angry China Likely To Toughen Korea Stand Somewhat (NYT)

By Joseph Kahn

The New York Times, October 10, 2006

BEIJING, Oct. 9 — China's punctilious Foreign Ministry reserves the word hanran, which translates as brazen or flagrant, for serious affronts to the nation's dignity by countries that have historically been rivals or enemies.

When the previous Japanese prime minister visited the Yasukuni Shrine, which China condemns as honoring Japan's World War II-era militarism, he was described as "brazen." When the United States bombed the Chinese Embassy in Belgrade in 1999, Beijing called that act "flagrant."

North Korea, a longstanding ideological ally, has had increasingly testy relations with China in recent years. But it was not until Monday, moments after North Korea apparently exploded a nuclear device, that China accused it of a "brazen" violation of its international commitments.

The wording is just one indication that a nuclear test would cross a red line for China, which has devoted years of painstaking diplomatic effort, and staked its delicate relationship with the United States, on the premise that it could deliver a peaceful, negotiated solution to the nuclear standoff with North Korea.

That policy, Chinese analysts say, seems to have failed, and North Korea's action leaves Beijing little choice but to take a tougher approach. But Chinese leaders still see highly punitive sanctions as unpalatable and counterproductive, and the country's elite remains sharply divided over how far to distance China from its neighbor, and how closely to embrace the Bush administration, several senior Chinese foreign policy experts said.

"Hanran" has been applied to North Korea for the first time. But Japan and the United States, which favor the sharpest response to North Korea's test, have been "hanran" for years.

"China is disappointed and angry and will be willing to support stronger sanctions," said Jin Canrong, a foreign policy expert at People's University in Beijing. "But I think that is different from saying there will be a drastic change. It is still a question of the right balance."

The reason there is unlikely to be a major policy change, Mr. Jin and other experts here said, is that North Korea has sharply increased tensions without fundamentally changing China's calculation of its national interests.

Its priorities remain, first and foremost, promoting internal economic development, the key to longevity for the ruling Communist Party. China's cautious, authoritarian leaders concluded long ago that generating high growth in its gross domestic product required a benign relationship with the world's major powers, secure borders and open markets — in a word, stability.

China would like to achieve a denuclearization of the Korean Peninsula but has shown few signs of accepting war or a forced change of government as an acceptable way to achieve that goal.

"The core of the issue is not nuclear weapons," said Shen Dingli, a leading security expert at Fudan University in Shanghai. "The core of the issue is peace and stability. That is still strongly in China's interest."

While China has begun to think like a big power in some respects, its foremost strategic priority has been reclaiming Taiwan, or at least preventing the island from becoming formally independent of mainland China.

Conflict in North Korea or the toppling of Kim Jong Il's government there could upset both of those goals, Chinese analysts say. A war is viewed as the worst outcome, potentially creating a wave of refugees into China and even risking a broader engagement that could threaten the extended period of harmony in Northeast Asia.

Even peaceful change in North Korea could bring a new pro-American government to China's northeastern border as it faces continuing uncertainty over how to handle the pro-American government in Taiwan, off its southeastern coast.

"China must continue to look at North Korea through the prism of Taiwan," Mr. Shen said. "You cannot expect China to abandon its ally completely while America continues to back Taiwan and allow the independence movement to thrive there."

But analysts say it also cannot afford to alienate the United States, and Beijing has recently taken steps to repair its frayed relationship with Japan. Those ties may well depend on moving to punish North Korea for its nuclear test, and at least experimenting to see if firm pressure on North Korea will bring it back to the bargaining table.

China provides, by some estimates, 70 percent of North Korea's fuel and food and could almost certainly create severe economic hardship there by slowing shipments across its long, barren border.

In addition, China has joined the United States in seeking to crack down on North Korean counterfeiting of American dollars and Chinese yuan, as well as on the use of Chinese banks to launder profits from illicit North Korean exports of drugs including amphetamines. Tighter financial sanctions could further deprive North Korea of already scarce hard currency.

The question is how far down that path China can go, to maintain its cooperation with the Bush administration without foreclosing the possibility of luring North Korea back to negotiations.

"China has tried to persuade North Korea that talking with the outside world is in its interest," said Zhang Liangui, an expert on North Korea at the Central Party School, a research organization in Beijing run by the Communist Party. "Now China will have to demonstrate that there is a price to pay for ignoring that advice."

Mr. Zhang said North Korea's announcement amounted to a slap in the face for China. Even if the goal remains a negotiated solution, he said, China must first show that it is prepared to take a much tougher line before North Korea will bargain in earnest.

Susan L. Shirk, a State Department official responsible for East Asia during the Clinton administration, said she believed that the nuclear test could prove to be a turning point for China's approach to the problem. It will, she said, force China to choose between North Korea and a United States-led international consensus rather than split the difference between the two.

She said the timing of North Korea's announcement — the day after President Hu Jintao was visited by Japan's new prime minister, Shinzo Abe, and said they had made progress repairing troubled relations — also underscored the stakes for China's leadership.

"If they do not act strongly they could undo what they have worked to achieve with Japan, while also seriously straining relations with the U.S.," she said. "North Korea has really boxed them in."

Even so, many Chinese analysts still view North Korea as a strategic asset. It may be irresponsible and unruly, but it belongs more to China than to the United States. Sacrificing an ally to help achieve America's goals of stopping the spread of nuclear weapons may require a much stronger consensus within the Chinese elite.

"I do not believe that Chinese leaders are willing to expend major political capital on this issue," Mr. Jin of People's University said. "They would much prefer to follow the consensus. At the moment there is a heated debate, but no consensus of that kind."

U.N. Weighs Sanctions Against N. Korea (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 10, 2006

The world lined up against North Korea on Monday for staging a nuclear test denounced even by key allies. President Bush called it "a threat to international peace and security," and the U.N. Security Council weighed severe sanctions to punish the impoverished communist nation.

There was no talk of military action. But the Security Council quickly condemned North Korea's decision to flout a U.N. appeal to cancel the test after the reclusive regime announced it had set off an underground atomic explosion.

Russia was the only country to say it had "no doubts" over the North Korean claim. The U.S. and other experts said the explosion was smaller than expected and they had yet to confirm it was nuclear.

But the reaction of world governments reflected little doubt that they were treating the announcement as fact.

The 15-nation council urged Pyongyang to return to stalled talks, refrain from further tests and keep its pledge to scrap its clandestine weapons program.

Bush said the North Korean action "constitutes a threat to international peace and security" and requires "an immediate response" from the Security Council, though he stressed the U.S. remained committed to diplomacy.

The United States circulated a draft U.N. resolution late Monday that would condemn North Korea's nuclear test and impose tough sanctions on the reclusive communist nation for Pyongyang's "flagrant disregard" of the Security Council's appeal not to detonate a device.

The draft, obtained by The Associated Press, incorporates proposals circulated by the U.S. earlier in the day to prohibit all trade in military and luxury goods and crack down on illegal financial dealings.

It adds new calls from Japan to ban all countries from allowing any North Korean ships in their ports or any North Korean aircraft from taking off or landing in their territory if they carried arms, nuclear or ballistic missile-related material or luxury goods.

In addition, the Japanese proposals would impose travel restrictions on high-ranking North Korean officials, create a Security Council committee to monitor implementation of the sanctions, and ask the secretary-general "to actively engage in this matter."

The U.S. draft also seeks to prevent any North Korean financial transactions resulting from illicit counterfeiting, money-laundering and narcotics, and "any abuses of the international financial system" that could contribute to the transfer or development of banned weapons.

By comparison, the Security Council cut air links to Libya in 1992 to force Moammar Gadhafi's government to hand over two indicted men for trial in the 1988 bombing of a Pan Am jetliner over Lockerbie, Scotland. After Saddam Hussein's Iraq invaded Kuwait in 1990, the council banned the sale or supply of any commodities or products from either country using their flag vessels.

Japan's U.N. Ambassador Kenzo Oshima, the current council president, said earlier that all council members "emphasized that the response of the council should be strong, swift and very, very clear in its message and its action."

But just how long it will take members to agree on a resolution remains to be seen.

Council experts started discussing the proposals in meetings Monday afternoon and were expected to meet again Tuesday morning.

But it was unclear whether China and Russia — the North's closest allies — would support some of the tough measures, which also include international inspection of all cargo to and from North Korea to limit the proliferation of nuclear, chemical and biological weapons and to ban any material that could be used in the production of weapons of mass destruction.

Before the experts meeting, the ambassadors from the five veto-wielding council nations — the U.S., Britain, France, Russia and China — met with Oshima.

U.S. Ambassador John Bolton told reporters afterward that everybody agreed within 30 minutes that the council should condemn the action and respond quickly, saying "that's remarkable" to have such a unanimous decision.

But he wouldn't speculate when the council might act, noting that Japan and others already had other suggestions for the text.

"The fact is that in our half-hour, full council meeting this morning, there was no one who even came close to defending this test by North Korea," Bolton said.

The United States, France, Britain and Japan want the resolution under Chapter 7 of the U.N. Charter, which deals with threats to international peace, breaches of the peace and acts of aggression. It allows the council to authorize measures ranging from breaking diplomatic ties and imposing economic and military sanctions to taking military action to restore peace.

With U.S. forces strapped by the twin wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, the Bush administration repeatedly has said it has no plans to invade North Korea and discussion of military action was absent on Monday.

Neither Russia nor China would say whether they support a resolution that could pave the way for sanctions.

"I think we have to react firmly," China's U.N. Ambassador Wang Guangya said. "But also I believe that on the other hand the door to solve this issue from a diplomatic point of view is still open."

Russia's U.N. Ambassador Vitaly Churkin said the North Koreans "will be facing a very serious attitude on the part of the Security Council and the entire international community," but he said the council needs to discuss whether that will include sanctions.

South Korea's nuclear envoy said Tuesday after returning from Beijing that China appeared to have dropped opposition to tough U.N. sanctions.

"China seems to have different position than it had before on a Chapter 7 resolution," Chun Young-woo told The Associated Press

"I think (China) will employ all available means to prevent North Korea from further aggravating the situation and to bring them back into diplomatic efforts," Chun said after returning from a two-day trip and meetings with Chinese officials.

Still, he said Beijing reiterated its commitment to a peaceful diplomatic solution to the issue.

The reported test came one day after the ninth anniversary of reclusive North Korean leader Kim Jong Il's accession to power and a day before the 61st anniversary of the ruling North Korean Workers' Party.

There were no signs of heightened alert by security forces in Pyongyang. People also laid flowers by a statue of Kim Il Sung, the current leader's late father.

The test also coincided with the Security Council vote Monday to nominate South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki-moon to succeed Kofi Annan as the next U.N. secretary-general. The 192-nation General Assembly is expected to approve the recommendation later this month.

Ban said one of his priorities, if approved, would be to work to resolve the North Korean crisis.

DOJ_NMG_0076881

North Korea remained defiant. Pak Gil Yon, the North's U.N. ambassador, said the Security Council should congratulate the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, known as the DPRK, instead of passing "useless" resolutions or statements.

"The nuclear test in the DPRK will greatly contribute in increasing the world deterrence of the DPRK" and will contribute "to the maintenance and guarantee of peace and security in the peninsula and the region," he said.

The United States and its allies, and many of North Korea's neighbors, took the exact opposite view.

"This shows why we need actions and not just words about North Korea," Bolton told The Associated Press.

Although North Korea has long claimed it had the capability to produce a bomb, the test would be the first proof that it had done so.

If the test is confirmed, North Korea would join the current members of the nuclear club — the United States, Russia, Britain, France, India, Pakistan and China. Israel is widely believed to have the bomb but has not publicly declared.

Officials worried that a nuclear armed North would dramatically alter the strategic balance of power in the Pacific, and would undermine already fraying global anti-proliferation efforts.

While voicing concerns, Japan's Prime Minister Shinzo Abe, after meeting with the South Korean leader in Seoul, called for a "calm, yet stern response." The situation marked his first major foreign policy test since his recent election.

South Korea said it had put its military on high alert, but it had noticed no unusual activity among North Korea's troops.

Bolton told the Security Council that Washington would consider an attack on Japan or South Korea an attack on the United States, according to U.N. diplomats who spoke on condition of anonymity because the remarks were made at a closed council meeting.

The United States has defense agreements with the two Asian allies and thousands of U.S. troops are stationed in South Korea and Japan.

China said the North "defied the universal opposition of international society and flagrantly conducted the nuclear test" and urged the North to return to six-party nuclear disarmament talks.

Russian President Vladimir Putin told his Cabinet that Moscow "certainly condemns the test conducted by North Korea."

British Prime Minister Tony Blair said the test was a "completely irresponsible act."

Only Iran, which also faces Security Council action over its disputed nuclear program, expressed understanding for North Korea's action.

Iranian state radio blamed the North's reported nuclear test on U.S. pressure, saying the test "was a reaction to America's threats and humiliation."

The North has refused for over a year to attend six-party international talks aimed at persuading it to disarm, demanding instead that the U.S. drop financial sanctions it has imposed to punish Pyongyang alleged counterfeiting and money laundering. It pulled out of the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty in 2003 after U.S. officials accused it of a secret nuclear program, allegedly violating an earlier nuclear pact between Washington and Pyongyang.

Impoverished and isolated, North Korea has built up its military and nuclear programs while relying on foreign aid to feed its 23 million people since its state-run farming system collapsed in the 1990s following decades of mismanagement and the loss of Soviet subsidies.

South Korea said the nuclear test was conducted at 10:36 a.m. Monday (9:36 p.m. EDT Sunday) in Hwaderi near Kilju city on the northeast coast.

The North's official Korean Central News Agency said the test was successful, with no leak of radiation, and this was "a stirring time when all the people of the country are making a great leap forward in the building of a great prosperous powerful socialist nation."

South Korean officials said Tuesday they believe that North Korea tested a nuclear weapon as it claimed, but that it would take about two weeks to determine if the test was successful.

The North is believed to have enough radioactive material for a half-dozen bombs. It insists its nuclear program is necessary to deter a U.S. invasion.

The North has active missile programs, but it isn't believed to have an atomic bomb design small and light enough to be mounted on a long-range rocket that could strike targets as distant as the United States.

Reports about the size of the explosion were conflicting, ranging from South Korea's geological institute estimating it was the equivalent of 550 tons of TNT to Russia's Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov saying it was the equivalent of 5,000 to 15,000 tons of TNT.

A U.S. government official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the political sensitivity of the situation, said the seismic event could have been a nuclear explosion, but its small size was making it difficult for authorities to pin down.

Global Fury At N Korea Nuclear Test Claim (FT)

By Anna Fifield, David Pilling And Mark Turner

Financial Times, October 10, 2006

The major powers united in their condemnation of North Korea's claim to have tested a nuclear weapon on Monday, but could not reach immediate agreement at an emergency session of the United Nations Security Council on the scope of punitive sanctions proposed by the US.

North Korea described the underground explosion in a northern province bordering China and Russia as an "historic event that brought happiness to our military and people". It said there had been no radioactive leakage.

US and South Korean experts measured the explosion as a earthquake of magnitude 4.2 on the Richter scale. Scientists were poring over seismic and other data but could not confirm a nuclear explosion. However, several said the blast appeared significantly smaller than would have been expected from a plutonium bomb and could have been a dud.

At the UN, the US presented a list of 13 proposed measures that included the authorisation of international inspections of cargo to and from North Korea and the blocking of illicit financing activities, such as counterfeiting.

John Bolton, US ambassador to the UN, said Monday night that Russia and China were not throwing up obstacles and there was no disagreement over the need for a binding "chapter seven" resolution.

Chris Hill, the US envoy to six-party negotiations with North Korea that have been mediated by China but stalled since last November, said: "We are not going to accept that North Korea with its starving population is going to join the nuclear club."

The US and its allies would ensure that Kim Jong-il, North Korea's leader, "rued the day" and would be made to pay, Mr Hill said. He refused to say what measures the US would take, admitting that China would be a "key country" in the outcome.

Hu Jintao, China's president, took a measured approach in his telephone conversation with George W. Bush, the US president. Mr Hu said no actions should be taken that would lead to escalation or loss of control of the situation and urged caution, dialogue and negotiation.

Delivering a brief televised statement from the White House, Mr Bush said he had spoken to the leaders of China, Russia, South Korea and Japan and that they agreed that North Korea's actions were "unacceptable and deserve an immediate response by the United Nations Security Council".

Mr Bush accused North Korea of having already provided missile technology to Iran and Syria.

Shinzo Abe, Japan's new prime minister said the development constituted a "serious threat [that] would transform in a major way the security environment of north east Asia."

Roh Moo-hyun, South Korea's president, said his government was "losing its momentum" for continued dialogue with North Korea.

North Korea Condemned For Nuclear Testing (MCT)

By Tim Johnson

McClatchy Newspapers, October 10, 2006

BEIJING - Condemnation poured in from throughout the world Monday over North Korea's report that it has tested a nuclear weapon as financial markets wobbled in East Asia.

The United States and Japan pledged "decisive action" against Pyongyang at the U.N. Security Council.

In open defiance of the U.N. Security Council, which warned it on Friday not to test, North Korea said it conducted "a safe and successful underground nuclear test" which "caused absolutely no radiation" leakage. It called the test a "great leap forward" in its defensive capabilities.

If true, the test would leave East Asia on the cusp of an arms race. North Korea previously declared it had nuclear weapons, but had never tested one to prove it.

The Security Council condemned the test. The U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, John Bolton, said the United States would push for tougher measures to prevent North Korea from producing or exporting weapons of mass destruction or missiles.

U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan said: "This action violates international norms of disarmament and non-proliferation, as well as the current international moratorium on nuclear testing. It aggravates regional tensions in and around the Korean Peninsula, and jeopardizes security both in the region and beyond."

South Korea called the test an "intolerable provocative act" and put its military on heightened alert. Its chief spy agency said another nuclear blast might be in the offing.

South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun's government suspended a shipment of emergency relief aid to North Korea and said the national security council was reviewing a "sunshine policy" that appeased North Korea with huge investment.

The projects under review include the Kaesong joint industrial zone and a tourism business at Mount Geumgang in the North, which draws hordes of cash-paying South Koreans.

Any freeze on those projects would be a blow to the cash-strapped North.

President Bush spent 15 minutes on the telephone with Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe as Abe prepared to leave Seoul at the end of a two-day fence-mending trip to China and South Korea. The two vowed "decisive action," Japan's Kyodo news agency said.

At a news conference in Seoul, Abe called for "very strong measures" against North Korea and warned that the region may "be entering a new, dangerous nuclear age."

Experts around the world differed on the size of the nuclear blast, which reportedly occurred in an underground shaft near Kilju, a town near North Korea's northeastern coast not far from the border with China.

South Korea's semi-official Yonhap news agency said the blast triggered a tremor with a 3.58 to 3.7 magnitude, similar to what a nuclear explosion would cause.

It said the power of the explosion was equivalent to around 550 tons of TNT explosives, less than a twentieth of the size of the U.S. atomic bomb dropped on the Japanese city of Hiroshima during World War II. But Russian Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov said it was far more powerful, in the range of 5 to 15 kilotons.

China, Russia, Australia, Britain and a number of other countries condemned the nuclear test, calling on North Korea to return to six-nation disarmament talks.

China, which maintains a lifeline of oil supplies to North Korea, appeared stunned, describing the test as "brazen." "The Chinese government is firmly opposed to this," a government statement said.

British Prime Minister Tony Blair labeled it a "completely irresponsible act."

"This is a desperate act of a criminal regime," House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert said in Washington. "We are neither threatened nor impressed, but resolved to restore stability to the Pacific Rim."

But a policy expert in Seoul said he doubted that the world could coax North Korea's nuclear genie back in the bottle. "In the medium and long term, I think we have to learn to live with a nuclearized North Korea," said Moon Chung-in, a professor at Seoul's Yonsei University.

A Chinese scholar said North Korea believes it can get away with nuclear development, just as India and Pakistan did a decade ago, and weather tough sanctions.

"The North Korean leader believes that by testing a nuclear weapon, he will get a more favorable environment where he can survive," said Jin Linbo of the China Institute of International Studies, a Beijing think tank.

Despite its traditional support for North Korea, China may not oppose putting teeth in a new resolution, a security expert in Beijing said.

"If North Korea still refuses to back off from its nuclear ambitions, it is possible that China will agree with military sanctions. As China's ambassador to the U.N., Wang Guangya, said, no one can protect North Korea if it continues to develop nuclear weapons," said Zhang Liangui, a foreign affairs expert at China's ruling party Central Party School.

The nuclear test jolted financial markets. The Japanese yen skidded to an eight-month low against the dollar. Stocks in Seoul slumped 2.6 percent, and shares slid in Hong Kong, Singapore and Sydney. Markets in Japan were closed for a holiday.

Ruled by Kim Jong Il, one of the world's last totalitarian leaders, North Korea said only last week that it would test a nuclear weapon. Pyongyang announced in February 2005 that it had succeeded in making a nuclear bomb. Foreign intelligence officials say North Korea may have at least six to eight nuclear bombs now.

A nuclear test, if confirmed, would generate pressure within the United States and from Japan to take military action to curb North Korea's military program.

North Korea has said it is building nuclear weapons to forestall a military attack by the United States to topple the Kim regime, which President Bush once described as part of an axis of evil.

News of the alleged test gave added urgency to Abe's visit to Seoul. Earlier Monday, Abe concluded a one-day summit with China's three top leaders that put a thaw in chilly relations between China and Japan, regional rivals. It was the first summit of its kind since 2001.

Abe, who has been in office for less than two weeks and is a staunch conservative, was given red carpet treatment in Beijing, in an apparent snub to North Korea. China and Japan capped the summit with a statement that they had reached "a turning point" in their tense relations.

Abe, who at 52 is Japan's first leader born after the war, used frank language about his nation's wartime role, saying that Japan's "deep remorse" had not ebbed.

"I said we shall look at past history squarely," Abe said, adding that Japan knew it "had caused tremendous damage and suffering to the people of countries, especially Asian countries, and left scars among those people."

Tough Talk From Seoul, If Little Will For A Fight (NYT)

By Norimitsu Onishi

The New York Times, October 10, 2006

SEOUL, South Korea, Tuesday, Oct. 10 — South Korea warned on Monday that it would “sternly deal” with North Korea’s announcement that it conducted a nuclear test, saying that the action could lead to a “nuclear arms buildup” in the region.

President Roh Moo-hyun said that South Korea would coordinate its response with other countries, though he did not give details and suggested that he was not ready to give up yet on his country’s “sunshine policy” of engaging North Korea.

“This is a grave threat to peace, not only on the Korean Peninsula but in the region,” said Mr. Roh, whose government has been accused by critics both in and outside South Korea of coddling North Korea.

Mr. Roh said that South Korea “has lost ground in arguing for dialogue” against calls for stronger punitive measures, including economic sanctions, against North Korea.

The government’s response to the nuclear test was firmer and quicker than its reaction to North Korea’s missile launches in early July, when Mr. Roh remained silent for days and avoided harsh criticism.

Still, there was some ambiguity in his remarks, and experts in South Korea remained divided Monday over whether a nuclear test would simply re-emphasize the hard reality that the policy of engagement is the lesser of evils in dealing with its unpredictable and irascible neighbor.

The two Koreas were fierce cold war enemies until the late 1990’s. But the “sunshine policy” under Mr. Roh and his predecessor, Kim Dae-jung, has transformed South Korean attitudes. Increasingly, North Koreans have been viewed here as misunderstood cousins who must be prodded into behaving, and a national consensus has emerged that pits South Korea against the Bush administration, which has sought to isolate and confront North Korea.

“There is a general consensus in South Korea, not only among politicians but also in the general population, that engagement is the right policy,” said Han Sung Joo, a former ambassador to the United States. “But it doesn’t mean we have to rationalize this nuclear test.”

Mr. Han said that in the near future, South Korea’s assistance to the North would probably have to be limited to humanitarian aid. He said that plans to expand major projects to help North Korea develop its economy would probably be put on hold.

Analysts said that North Korea's action would weaken Mr. Roh and the governing Uri Party, but that the damage would not decisively help the opposition Grand National Party.

"When you look at the opposition's policies toward North Korea, you see that they are 95 percent in agreement with the ruling party's," said Choi Kang, a security expert at the Institute of Foreign Affairs and National Security in Seoul. "Both emphasize the need to push the North to democratize, to reform internally, by engaging it. What differs is the means. The opposition emphasizes the need for reciprocity — it shouldn't be unconditional."

"It's too premature to say this is the end of the engagement policy," Mr. Choi said.

South Korea's priorities remain peace and stability on the peninsula, so few South Koreans favor confronting North Korea and possibly causing a military conflict or its collapse. The United States, in contrast, is concerned about nuclear proliferation.

"Does South Korea share these concerns?" said Andrei Lankov, a Russian expert on North Korea at Kookmin University in Seoul. "No. If some crazy regime in Central America goes nuclear, or if terrorist groups or rogue states obtain nuclear arms, South Korea will never become a target.

"In the short term, South Korea will have to show solidarity with the international community and freeze exchanges with the North," he added. "But then they will start looking for a pretext to resume exchanges."

Others contend that the American unwillingness to negotiate directly with North Korea, as the North has sought, is to blame for the failure to soften North Korea's stance.

"That's why hard-liners in the North Korean government have gained a stronger voice," said Han Hong Koo, a historian at Sungkonghoe University in Seoul.

"There will be great pressure on the South Korean government to abandon its engagement policy," he added. But, "North Korea is already suffering from economic sanctions and is already isolated. There's no other card."

Japan Now Seems Likely To Rally Behind New Prime Minister's Call For A Stronger Military (NYT)

By Martin Fackler, International Herald Tribune

The New York Times, October 10, 2006

TOKYO, Oct. 9 — The last time North Korea tested a powerful new weapon, in 1998 when it fired a ballistic missile over the largest Japanese island, Japan reacted by upgrading its military and swinging politically to the right.

North Korea's claim that it tested a nuclear weapon on Monday appears likely to push Japan even further down the same nationalist path. Many political analysts say the test, which has yet to be confirmed, could weaken public support for the pacifism Japan adopted after World War II and prompt it to seek a growing regional security role.

But could the crisis be big enough to force Japan to break what might be its ultimate postwar taboo and go nuclear itself?

This is what some in East Asia have speculated it would do if the isolated and erratic Communist government to its north suddenly conducted an atomic bomb test. But for now, analysts say, domestic opposition runs too deep for Japan to reverse its renunciation of nuclear weapons.

"The nuclear test may prove to be an even bigger shock to public opinion" than the 1998 missile, said Yasunori Sone, a professor of political and policy analysis at Keio University in Tokyo. "It will get a minority of people here calling for Japan to build nuclear weapons."

The most likely result of North Korea's actions, analysts say, would be to rally public opinion around Japan's new prime minister, Shinzo Abe, and his calls for taking Japan in a more assertive direction. The crisis may also increase Mr. Abe's chances of revising the Constitution to allow Japan to possess full-fledged armed forces.

There have been no calls yet here to build atomic weapons. Still, that is not a far-fetched notion. Japan is known to have stockpiles of weapons-grade atomic material, used in its civilian nuclear power and research programs, and some studies have said it would be able to construct a bomb in a matter of months.

But Mr. Sone and other analysts say that despite North Korea's claim of a weapons test, Japanese proponents of acquiring nuclear weapons will remain a minority on the far-right fringe. Analysts say going nuclear would face broad and emotional opposition in Japan, which remains the only nation to have suffered atomic bomb attacks.

The prospect of a nuclear Japan might also send shudders through the rest of Asia, where memories of Japan's wartime aggression are still raw. Some fear it could even set off a new Asian arms race.

Mr. Abe appeared to be trying to take a leading role in responding to the crisis, analysts here said. He and other Japanese leaders were quick to condemn the reported test, saying Japan was working closely with the United States, its closest ally, and Asian neighbors like South Korea and China to find a response.

Speaking in Seoul, where he was meeting with President Roh Moo-hyun, Mr. Abe criticized the test as a "serious threat to the security of Japan and South Korea, and of neighboring countries."

"We have agreed that we must respond resolutely," Mr. Abe said in a news conference after the meeting. "We have entered a new and more dangerous era."

He also said Japan was considering imposing economic sanctions against North Korea and increasing its participation in a missile defense shield that it is developing with the United States. He said Japan had requested an immediate meeting of the United Nations Security Council.

In Tokyo, Yasuhisa Shiozaki, the chief cabinet secretary and top government spokesman, said Japan would try to work with the United States to seek United Nations action, possibly including global economic sanctions. "We will lodge a stern protest and condemn" the test, he said.

If North Korea has exploded a nuclear device, analysts said the effects on Japanese public opinion might take time to appear. When North Korea test-fired a multistage Taepodong missile over Japan in 1998, Japan's initial reaction was muted, but public opinion ended up moving sharply in favor of building a stronger defense.

That allowed Japan to begin adding weapons that once would have been unthinkable, including Japan's first spy satellite, a troop transport ship now under construction that experts say could serve as a small aircraft carrier, and aerial tankers that would allow Japanese fighter jets to refuel in midair to reach North Korea and other countries.

For now, analysts said most of Japan's action was likely to come on the diplomatic front. They also said the crisis offered an unexpected chance for Japan to patch up its ties with South Korea and China.

"This crisis allows Mr. Abe to say that all three countries face a shared enemy," Mr. Sone of Keio University said. "This is a chance for him to improve relations with Asia."

U.S. Doubts Korean Test Was Nuclear (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, October 10, 2006

U.S. intelligence agencies say, based on preliminary indications, that North Korea did not produce its first nuclear blast yesterday.

U.S. officials, speaking on the condition of anonymity, said that seismic readings show that the conventional high explosives used to create a chain reaction in a plutonium-based device went off, but that the blast's readings were shy of a typical nuclear detonation.

"We're still evaluating the data, and as more data comes in, we hope to develop a clearer picture," said one official familiar with intelligence reports.

"There was a seismic event that registered about 4 on the Richter scale, but it still isn't clear if it was a nuclear test. You can get that kind of seismic reading from high explosives."

The underground explosion, which Pyongyang dubbed a historic nuclear test, is thought to have been the equivalent of several hundred tons of TNT, far short of the several thousand tons of TNT, or kilotons, that are signs of a nuclear blast, the official said.

The official said that so far, "it appears there was more fizz than pop."

A successful nuclear detonation requires a properly timed and triggered conventional blast that splits atoms, setting off the nuclear chain reaction that produces the massive explosions associated with atomic bombs.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said assessing the validity of North Korea's claim of a successful nuclear test could take several days.

"We need to find out precisely what it is that took place yesterday, and that is something that's going to take awhile for the scientists and others to work through," Mr. Snow said.

"Nobody could give me with any precision how long it will take until they can say with certainty what happened."

Nuclear bombs make big waves, with clear signatures that make them fairly easy to detect, analyze and confirm that they were caused by splitting atoms. But smaller blasts -- as North Korea's appears to have been -- are trickier to break down, scientists told the Associated Press.

"It takes days, dozens of lab hours, to evaluate results. Now we can have only a rough estimate," said Russian nuclear physicist Vladimir Orlov of the Moscow-based Center for Policy Studies in Russia, a nonproliferation think tank.

Elements of the blast were detected by U.S. and allied sensors as it was set off in an underground tunnel in the north-central part of North Korea. U.S. intelligence agencies have been monitoring several tunnels thought to be nuclear test facilities and have not ruled out Pyongyang's conducting another test.

U.S. officials said the test was timed to coincide with several anniversaries in North Korea, including the end of mourning for the death of North Korean leader Kim Jong-il's father, Kim Il-sung. The test was thought to have been linked to the commemoration.

North Korea's military thinks that joining the world's seven other acknowledged nuclear powers is key to preserving the power of the communist regime.

There were wide variations in seismic data of the North Korean blast. The French atomic agency estimated about 1 kiloton, and South Korea's geological institute said half of that. But Russia's defense minister expressed "no doubt" that North Korea detonated a nuclear test and said the force of the underground blast was equivalent to 5,000 to 15,000 tons of TNT.

"People have different ways of cross-cutting the data and interpreting them," said Lassina Zerbo, director of the International Data Center at the nuclear-test-ban preparatory commission, which is based in Vienna, Austria.

The Bush administration is pushing for the United Nations to adopt economic sanctions against North Korea that would include a blockade of all goods moving into and out of the country.

Key to the imposition of the tough sanctions will be support from China and Russia, two states that in the past opposed sanctions.

The most immediate impact of the underground test is that U.S. officials fear Japan will take steps to develop nuclear weapons as a deterrent.

Official North Korean press for the past several years has been asserting that the United States is planning a pre-emptive nuclear attack on North Korea over its secret uranium-enrichment program.

Intelligence reports from several years ago indicated that North Korea was engaged in a covert program to develop a uranium-based nuclear program with the help of Pakistani nuclear scientist Abdul Qadeer Khan. The Khan network supplied centrifuges and nuclear-weapons design techniques to Libya, Iran and North Korea.

What U.S. officials have been unable to confirm is whether North Korea received small warhead design information from the Khan network.

Chinese-language documents on how to build a nuclear warhead for missiles were found in Libya and were supplied by Khan network associates. U.S. intelligence officials think Iran and North Korea received similar warhead design documents.

North Korea in July conducted flight tests of seven missiles including a long-range Taepodong-2.

U.S. officials think the plutonium for the pit of the North Korean device was produced by the reactor at Yongbyon, the regime's declared nuclear facility.

U.S. intelligence agencies estimate that North Korea has some 88 pounds of plutonium and that about 13 pounds were used in the recent test.

The remaining plutonium is enough for North Korea to make about six bombs.

Device Produced A Small Yield, Maybe Due To Flaw (LAT)

By Greg Miller And Karen Kaplan

The Los Angeles Times, October 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0076888

WASHINGTON — Shock waves emanating from North Korea on Monday probably came from the explosion of a nuclear device, but one that did not achieve its full potential because of a failure or a design flaw, U.S. intelligence officials and weapons experts said.

Analysts believe the explosion produced about 3% of the power of the bombs dropped on Hiroshima and Nagasaki more than 60 years ago, raising questions about whether a bigger device malfunctioned, or the regime in Pyongyang was testing only a component of a larger weapon.

The combination of the low strength of the explosion and the failure in July of a missile test over the Sea of Japan is likely to reinforce intelligence assessments that North Korea remains years away from developing a nuclear warhead that could be fitted to a missile and delivered any significant distance, let alone to the shores of the United States.

Still, officials said Monday's test demonstrated that North Korea had crossed a dangerous technological threshold, and they added that the blast served as an experiment from which Pyongyang could garner valuable information it could use to improve its nuclear designs.

"Often you learn as much from a failure as you do a success," said Anthony Cordesman, a former Defense Department official and a military expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies. "If you have a test, even if it is only partly successful, you've proven not only you can do it but that you're on the way to developing more sophisticated systems."

Cordesman and others said it could be days before U.S. intelligence agencies and independent scientists are able to reach firm conclusions as to the nature of the test. Experts will analyze the seismic signature of the explosion, and attempt to collect atmospheric samples by "sniffer" spy planes.

Estimates of the force of the explosion were based on comparisons of seismic readings taken from monitoring stations in nations surrounding North Korea with seismic measures of past nuclear explosions.

The characteristics of the "seismic pulse" have usually enabled officials to rule out earthquakes or natural phenomena. But officials said the relatively small size of Monday's blast might make it difficult to use seismic data to determine whether the explosion was caused by a nuclear device or conventional explosives. Analysts haven't ruled out that the seismic shock could have been caused by conventional explosives, but a consensus seemed to be forming Monday that a nuclear device had been detonated.

American and foreign intelligence agencies are expected to focus on detecting and measuring telltale radioactive particles in atmospheric samples collected by planes and unmanned aerial vehicles routinely patrolling the coastline of the Korean peninsula.

The Vienna-based Comprehensive Nuclear Test Ban Treaty Organization, which monitors the globe for possible nuclear activity, said it probably would take about 72 hours to gather all the information necessary to judge whether the seismic event in North Korea was a nuclear explosion.

North Korea claimed that it had completely contained the radioactive fallout from the explosion. But experts were skeptical, saying it would require a level of technical sophistication North Korea was unlikely to possess to prevent the release of any contamination into the atmosphere.

"Sooner or later something escapes," said Daniela Rozgonova, a spokeswoman for the test ban group. "Then we will know for sure."

The test was underground and probably carried out in a horizontal tunnel under a mountain, said David Albright, a former weapons inspector who now directs the Institute for Science and International Security. Unlike vertical tests, which leave a massive crater, he said, horizontal tests leave little external trace.

Experts said that using conventional explosives to create a blast of the magnitude recorded Monday — equivalent to about half a kiloton of TNT — would be difficult to accomplish.

"A kiloton would be 2 million pounds of TNT," said Arthur Lerner-Lam, associate director for seismology and geology at Lamont-Doherty Earth Observatory at Columbia University. "It takes a lot of technology to get all of that to go off at once."

As a result, officials and experts focused on other, more plausible, explanations for the small yield.

Officials said North Korea could have detonated a small device in order to conserve fissile material. American intelligence agencies believe North Korea probably has enough plutonium for about eight nuclear weapons — other estimates suggest it could build between four and 13 weapons — and does not possess any enriched uranium.

Pyongyang also may have been testing a component of a larger system, but experts said such a step would be highly unusual because of its limited experimental value.

As a result, a consensus seemed to be emerging among analysts and experts that North Korea conducted a test of a full-scale device, but one that failed to compress the plutonium fuel at rates capable of producing maximum yield.

"The lower yield could be because of bad luck or bad design," said Michael Levi, a nuclear weapons expert at the Council on Foreign Relations.

"The fizzle of a 15- to 20-kiloton weapon would be about a kiloton or two," added Owen Cote, associate director of the security studies program at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

American intelligence agencies have struggled to collect meaningful data on North Korea's nuclear program, and have scant information on Pyongyang's ability to make a warhead small enough to mount on a medium- or long-range missile. North Korea's test in July of a long-range missile ended in failure.

Pakistan's nuclear bomb, built on a Chinese design, can be put atop a ballistic missile, but it is not clear whether these design details were passed on to the North Koreans as part of the proliferation network operated by Pakistani scientist Abdul Qadeer Khan.

Monday's test may not provide any answers because the weight of a nuclear weapon — as opposed to its yield — would not necessarily be detectible from an underground test.

"You could test a device as big as a house," said Gary Samore, who handled nuclear proliferation issues on the Clinton administration's National Security Council. "There is no way to verify that from the seismic activity we'll get."

Low Yield Of Blast Surprises Analysts (WP)

By Dafna Linzer, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 10, 2006

The explosion set off by North Korea yesterday appears to have been extremely small for a nuclear blast, complicating U.S. intelligence efforts to determine whether the country's first such test was successful or signaled that Pyongyang's capabilities are less advanced than expected, several senior U.S. and foreign government officials and analysts said.

A variety of seismic readings around the world yesterday appear to have resulted from no more than a half-kiloton explosion, three officials said -- equivalent to 500 tons of TNT and far smaller than the 21- to 23-kiloton plutonium bomb the U.S. military dropped on Nagasaki, Japan, in August 1945.

A senior intelligence official called it a "sub-kiloton" explosion detonated inside a horizontal mountain tunnel and said its low yield caught analysts by surprise. "For an initial test, a yield of several kilotons has been historically observed," the official said.

A U.S. government official said the North Koreans, in a call to the Chinese shortly before the test was conducted, said it would be four kilotons. The official said it is possible the explosive yield was as low as 200 tons. France and South Korea both issued sub-kiloton estimates, and officials dismissed as inaccurate an early Russian estimate that the blast resulted from a five-to-15-kiloton explosion.

President Bush said early yesterday that U.S. experts were "working to confirm North Korea's claim." By the end of the day, intelligence officials were still piecing together data and waiting to review intercepted communications that might shed light on what exactly the North Koreans set out to accomplish in the test and how it was conducted.

If confirmed, North Korea's ascension into a growing nuclear club -- joining the United States, Britain, France, Russia, China, India and Pakistan -- would likely have a major impact on efforts to halt the spread of nuclear weapons. (Israel is widely believed to have nuclear weapons, although it apparently has never conducted a test.) It is the only country to walk away from the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty and then violate its central tenet -- a commitment to refrain from building nuclear weapons.

Intelligence and administration officials said yesterday they believed North Korea had managed a nuclear test of some sort, but because of the secrecy of the Pyongyang regime and the lack of scientific data, some observers would not eliminate the possibility that the blast was created by conventional explosives.

The relatively small size of the explosion, along with North Korea's public statement that the test did not produce any radioactive leakage, led some to question how well the test had gone. Small amounts of leakage are normal during nuclear tests, though it can take several days for the ventilation to register. One U.S. official said radiation detectors in the region were being monitored for any signs in the air from the nuclear test.

One analyst, who was not authorized to speak publicly about the topic, said North Korea's statement on leakage may have been political, rather than technical: "It could be their way of showing that they are a member of the nuclear club, as advanced, responsible and capable as other states." Another said the statement may have been intended to lessen environmental concerns in neighboring countries.

Intelligence officials were looking at four possibilities to explain the size of the blast, the most likely of which appeared to be that only a fraction of the device's core exploded. If that were the case, the test would still be considered successful, officials said, because some plutonium was exploded. But it may also lead the North Koreans to conduct additional tests to determine what went wrong.

It is also possible, two analysts said, that Pyongyang used less plutonium because it has less stockpiled than U.S. intelligence believed. Considered more unlikely by experts were theories that the North Koreans had succeeded in manufacturing a smaller, more sophisticated nuclear device or that engineers had set out to test the device's design rather than its yield.

"A low yield can be a failure in design or it can be bad luck," said Michael A. Levi, a nuclear expert at the Council on Foreign Relations. "Anything is possible," he said, including simulating a low-yield nuclear explosion by using large quantities of TNT, as the U.S. military had planned to do last summer.

"But you don't hear anyone who thinks it's a conventional [explosives] test," he said.

One senior government nuclear specialist said it is hard to discern a nuclear detonation from a conventional one just by looking at seismic data. "Explosions are explosions," the analyst said. "They push equally out in all directions and that's what you see at a distant seismic station; you just see the explosion force and you can't tell."

To discriminate between the two, intelligence experts also rely on a string of gas and radiation detectors.

The Bush administration had been expecting a nuclear test for months and was briefly relieved after a set of North Korean ballistic missile tests failed in July. Intelligence analysts in the U.S. government think Pyongyang is still years away from being able to marry a nuclear device to an advanced delivery system.

"I don't think we perceive a great threat that North Korea will attack anyone with nuclear weapons," said Robert J. Einhorn, who was assistant secretary of state for nonproliferation until 2001. "One of the main threats is that in desperation, it might sell its nuclear assets. Another danger is that eventually the government might collapse into chaos, and then we won't know who is in control of those assets."

Bomb Fallout Explosion By North Koreans Imperils Nuclear-Control Effort (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 10, 2006

U.S. Pushes U.N. Sanctions, Including Military Steps; China to Play Critical Role Blast Smaller Than Expected

North Korea's claim that it successfully exploded a nuclear device signals a major failure of U.S. and Chinese diplomacy and threatens to unravel the international treaty system that has worked to contain the spread of nuclear bombs for nearly 40 years.

The blast, which took place near the northeastern town of Kilju, was apparently small by nuclear standards, suggesting the test may not have been entirely successful, or may have been made with conventional explosives. South Korean geologists estimate the explosion had less than 4% of the force of the atomic bomb dropped by U.S. pilots over Hiroshima 61 years ago.

Although the U.S. and its allies already suspected that North Korea had produced a small number of nuclear weapons, a publicly announced test is frightening because it represents such a brazen flouting of the system for controlling the spread of nuclear arms. North Korea's action might encourage other states -- Iran, Japan, Taiwan, or even Saudi Arabia and Egypt -- to go nuclear.

"The biggest threat is not North Korean missiles hitting Hollywood," said Robert Alvarez, a former U.S. Energy Department adviser who worked on shutting down North Korea's nuclear program in the 1990s. "The real risk is the unraveling of the nonproliferation regime. That is not something we should take lightly."

U.S. diplomats are hoping to turn the announcement into a plus for American policy by bringing together nations that have previously hesitated to take a hard line on North Korea -- in particular China and South Korea. U.S. officials want the United Nations to back measures that would effectively cut off North Korea's interaction with the global financial system and its ability to import or export materials for weapons of mass destruction. Washington wants to ratchet up the pressure by having the U.N. authorize military force to back up sanctions. That could include a threat to inspect any vessel leaving or entering North Korea.

While the U.N. Security Council unanimously condemned the reported North Korean nuclear test, it is unclear whether the Security Council is ready to endorse the U.S. ideas -- which are precariously close to declaring war on North Korea. Until now, South Korea and China, which provide much of North Korea's food and energy, have favored negotiations over sanctions. Some Bush administration officials would like to see economic pressures topple the North Korean regime, but that is what China and South Korea -- which share borders with the country -- fear most.

Japan, which has taken the lead in calling for sanctions against North Korea, may now push harder to strengthen its military. "The test opens Pandora's box in Northeast Asia," said Han Seung Soo, a former South Korean ambassador to the U.S. and U.N. and former president of the U.N. General Assembly. "The strategic position of every country just took a dramatic change for the worse."

Another concern is that North Korea, a big exporter of missiles to Iran, Syria and Pakistan, could also sell nuclear weapons to other countries, or use its smuggling networks to provide weapons technologies to al Qaeda and other terrorist groups.

North Korea is the first state to withdraw from the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty and then follow up by declaring itself a nuclear power and claiming to test a weapon. Security Council members are also pressing Iran to halt sensitive nuclear activities that could produce fuel for nuclear weapons and were set to discuss possible actions against Tehran this week.

China's position on sanctions will be critical. Beijing fears losing a buffer zone against U.S. troops in South Korea and wants to avoid a North Korean collapse, which could send millions of impoverished refugees fleeing into China. The tradition of close ties between China and North Korea dates to the 1950-53 Korean War when China fought on North Korea's side against U.S.-led U.N. forces.

China's Foreign Ministry condemned the North Korean test but also called for a "peaceful resolution through consultation and dialogue" and said the response should be "cool-headed."

Some Chinese analysts said Beijing may be ready to take a tougher line against Pyongyang in the wake of the failure of six-party talks spearheaded by Beijing. The talks bringing together the two Koreas, the U.S., China, Japan and Russia have been held off and on since 2003.

"Chinese leaders have lost all hope in North Korea," said Chu Shulong, a professor at Tsinghua University in Beijing. "The soft approach didn't work, so they have to take a harder stance." Mr. Chu said China may back U.N. sanctions and could cut off its exports of oil, electricity and fertilizer to North Korea, although it would probably continue sending food and medicine on humanitarian grounds. In July, China voted in favor of limited sanctions after North Korea test-fired a long-range missile and six military rockets into the waters between the Korean peninsula and Japan.

China had set itself up as a mediator to work for a nuclear-free Korean peninsula, reflecting its ambitions in global diplomacy. Chinese leaders took great pride in the six-party talks, which were hosted in Beijing, the only place where North Korean negotiators felt comfortable.

Mei Renyi, director of the U.S. Studies Center of Beijing Foreign Studies University, said North Korea's announcement puts China in a difficult spot because it took a "leadership position" in the talks. "For a long time, all the countries in the Asia-Pacific region tolerated North Korea's nuclear threat, but its nuclear test today puts it in total isolation," he said.

For the Bush administration, the claim of a nuclear test represents a failure for its goal of blocking the spread of weapons of mass destruction. For more than five years, the Bush administration has been split internally over how to handle North Korea. Betraying that lack of consensus, it has engaged in off-and-on multilateral negotiations with Pyongyang while pursuing limited pressure tactics aimed at discomfiting the regime there. The approach delivered neither a diplomatic breakthrough nor a breakdown of the regime of North Korean leader Kim Jong Il, as advocated by U.S. hard-liners.

President Bush condemns12 early reports of North Korea's nuclear testing, calling such testing is "a threat to international peace and security." Plus, reporter Gordon Fairclough discusses13 the announcement and senior special writer John Harwood explains14 the global implications for the North Korea's nuclear testing. FROM THE AP

John Bolton, ambassador to the U.N.,15 discusses the U.N. Security Council's immediate response to North Korea's actions.

The North Korean announcement likely has more symbolic than military value. North Korea already possesses a strong deterrent against military attacks through its arsenal of rockets and missiles aimed at the South Korean capital of Seoul, a city of 10 million just 30 miles from the Korean border.

Global markets yesterday largely ignored North Korea's announcement. U.S. and Japanese stocks were virtually unchanged, although South Korea's benchmark stock-market index closed down 2.4%.

North Korea's test device exploded with a force of 550 tons of TNT, according to an estimate by South Korean geologists. That is 200 times the size of the truck bomb that destroyed the federal building in Oklahoma City in 1995. Even if it is proved that North Korea tested a nuclear device and not conventional explosives, analysts say North Korea still probably has some more work to create a functioning nuclear weapon.

U.S. officials said they are trying to ascertain what was tested. The blast "was far smaller than most people would have predicted," a U.S. official said yesterday. Nonetheless, he said, "we have to take what the North Koreans say at face value."

During a midday television news program broadcast in North Korea yesterday, an anchorwoman read the official announcement with a smile. "The nuclear test was conducted with indigenous wisdom and technology, 100%," she declared.

North Korea's weakening economic position may have driven its decision to go ahead with the test. It is chronically short of food. Washington has also tried to limit North Korea's ability to use the international banking system. Mr. Kim may have concluded that a nuclear test will give North Korea the bargaining chip it needs to loosen the straitjacket tightening around it. It is the logic of an extortionist, but it has served North Korea well in the past.

"The tests are clearly in response to the financial sanctions and their comprehensive nature," said Selig Harrison, a Washington-based academic who met with senior North Korean officials in Pyongyang last month. "They see sanctions as moves toward forcing regime change." International aid organizations note that North Korea's food production has been reduced this year by extensive flooding that hit districts around Pyongyang.

Members of the World Food Program, the U.N. food aid agency, say they are seriously constrained in their ability to meet the food needs of more than six million vulnerable North Koreans. The WFP could largely run out of funds for North Korea early next year without more donations from member countries. The U.S. and Japan virtually stopped food aid in 2003, although South Korea and China have been providing significant assistance. "The public distribution system is under extraordinary stress," John Powell, a WFP deputy executive director, said in an interview late last month.

For years, North Korean leaders have believed their future hinges on reaching some type of accommodation with the U.S. After South Korea's economic and military strength surpassed the North's in the late 1970s, the North's longtime leader, Kim Il Sung, decided the country needed nuclear-weapons capability. He chose the small city of Yongbyon, 60 miles north of Pyongyang, for a nuclear-power plant in 1980.

North Korea signed the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty in 1985 but pulled out in 1993 as suspicions grew that the Yongbyon plant was part of a weapons program. The next year, North Korea agreed with the U.S. to close the Yongbyon reactor and store its spent fuel. In return, the U.S. promised to help build two nuclear reactors and move toward normalizing relations with the North. In October 2000, then-Secretary of State Madeleine Albright visited Pyongyang and met with Mr. Kim, raising hopes for a further thaw.

Mr. Bush, however, has a deep personal dislike for Mr. Kim and his government, aides say. At a summit meeting last year, he lectured South Korean President Roh Moo Hyun over Seoul's willingness to engage with Pyongyang despite human-rights abuses in the North, diplomats say.

In his 2002 State of the Union address, Mr. Bush branded North Korea as part of an "axis of evil" along with Iraq and Iran. Relations rapidly soured as North Korea lifted the freeze on its nuclear program, reopened Yongbyon and reprocessed its spent fuel.

That was the latest threat to the international community's effort to contain the spread of nuclear weapons. The principal vehicle has been the nonproliferation treaty, which was concluded in 1968. While allowing five nations -- the U.S., Britain, France, Russia and China -- to have nuclear weapons, the treaty requires all other signatories to forswear them. Under the treaty, nations such as South Africa and Belarus have unilaterally dismantled their weapons programs.

In recent years nonsignatory countries, including Pakistan, India and Israel, have developed weapons systems independently, weakening the treaty. Meanwhile Iran has challenged the treaty's efficacy by carrying out a nuclear program that it says is for peaceful purposes but that Western nations believe is aimed at producing a weapon. A separate agreement, the Comprehensive Nuclear Test Ban Treaty, forbids nuclear tests but the U.S. hasn't signed it.

In September 2005, the six-party talks on North Korea produced a tentative agreement for the North to abandon its nuclear-weapons pursuit in exchange for economic and energy assistance from the five countries. At nearly the same time, the U.S. threatened penalties against a bank in Macau, China, suspected of helping the North engage in money laundering. About $24 million in North Korean money has been frozen in the bank while local authorities investigate, and U.S. officials believe some of the money may be Kim Jong Il's own.

North Korea then abandoned the September agreement and pulled out of the six-party talks. It insisted instead on two-way negotiations with the U.S., a proposal Washington rejects.

Some counterterrorism experts in Washington believe the threat of North Korean weapons proliferation is so acute that Washington should consider a virtual cordon sanitaire of North Korea.

"We'll have to do challenging inspections," says David Asher, who until last year helped lead a State Department effort to curb Pyongyang's illicit business. "We're trying to stop their transnational criminal activities. But they haven't stopped. We're going to have to be extremely good at what we do."

Blast May Be Only A Partial Success, Experts Say (NYT)

By William J. Broad And Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, October 10, 2006

The North Korean test appears to have been a nuclear detonation but was fairly small by traditional standards, and possibly a failure or a partial success, federal and private analysts said yesterday.

Throughout history, the first detonations of aspiring nuclear powers have tended to pack the destructive power of 10,000 to 60,000 tons — 10 to 60 kilotons — of conventional high explosives.

But the strength of the North Korean test appears to have been a small fraction of that: around a kiloton or less, according to scientists monitoring the global arrays of seismometers that detect faint trembles in the earth from distant blasts.

“It’s pretty remarkable that such a small explosion was promptly apparent on seismometers all over the world,” said Paul Richards, a seismologist at Columbia University’s Lamont-Doherty Earth Observatory in Palisades, N.Y. “The detection of this was really good. You can’t hide these kinds of things, even very small tests.”

A senior Bush administration official said he had learned through Asian contacts that the North Koreans had expected the detonation to have a force of about four kilotons. Because classified information was involved and there was lingering uncertainty, he would not let his name be used.

Philip E. Coyle III, a former director of weapons testing at the Pentagon and former director of nuclear testing for the Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory, a weapons design center in California, said the small size of the test signaled the possibility of what might be described as a partial success or a partial failure.

"As first tests go, this is smaller and less successful than those of the other nuclear powers," he said.

Perhaps the North Koreans wanted to keep it small, he added. "But if it turns out to be a kiloton or less," Dr. Coyle said, "that would suggest that they hoped for more than that and didn't get it."

The United States Geological Survey said it had detected a tremor on the Korean Peninsula of 4.2 magnitude, which translates into an explosive force of roughly 1,000 tons. The agency listed 20 seismic stations as having initially picked up the blast's shockwave, including nearby ones in China, Japan and South Korea as well as distant ones in Ukraine, Australia, Nevada and Wyoming.

The Russian defense minister, Sergei B. Ivanov, told the Itar-Tass news agency that the Russian government believed the strength of the blast to have been 5 to 15 kilotons. The basis for his claim was not immediately clear.

In Washington, intelligence officials said they were still in the early stages of evaluating the North Korean blast. But one said analysts had estimated its force at less than a kiloton.

"We have assessed that the explosion in North Korea was a sub-kiloton explosion," said the intelligence official, who, like others, spoke on condition of anonymity because they were discussing classified information.

It will probably take several days to determine with confidence if the explosion was in fact nuclear, the official said. He added that so far, sensors had not detected radiation leaking from the blast site. But federal and private experts said it seemed unlikely that the North Koreans had faked an underground nuclear blast with a large pile of conventional high explosives.

First, they said, the political risks involved would seem disproportionate. More important, federal and private analysts said, the United States has long had spy satellites observing the North Korean site and appears to have found no signs of chemical explosives being unloaded.

"It's difficult to fake it when you know people are looking down on you," said Dr. Richards of Columbia. "The execution of a chemical explosion would be hard to hide."

Dr. Coyle, the former director of nuclear testing at Livermore, said small tests were more likely to leak radioactivity than large ones, because the intense heat and gigantic shock waves of bigger blasts tended to melt and pulverize nearby rock into impregnable barriers.

Experts said the United States, Japan and the Comprehensive Nuclear Test Ban Treaty Organization had equipment that could sniff the air and water around North Korea for signs of radioactivity.

The South Koreans estimated the seismic magnitude of the blast at roughly 3.6. William Leith, the coordinator of seismic monitoring at the United States Geological Survey, said the South Korean method was different from and not comparable with the American technique. He added that the American estimate of 4.2 was unlikely to change.

In Vienna, the Comprehensive Nuclear Test Ban Treaty Organization estimated the blast's magnitude at 4.0, which is within the error margin of the American estimate.

An American intelligence official said the blast had shaken a North Korean site that the nation's spy agencies had long monitored — the flank of a mountain not far from the northeastern coast.

The small size of the explosion, he said, "tells you they have a lot of work to do in terms of weaponizing what they've got." He added, "If the lower-yield estimates are valid, then it's not a militarized system, but also not something a terrorist would reject."

North Korea's Nuclear Claim May Help U.S. Efforts On Iran (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr. And Bill Spindle

While a clear setback in itself, North Korea's claim of conducting an underground nuclear test could present the Bush administration with much-needed leverage on another challenge: Iran.

For months, Tehran has rejected international requests to enter discussions on its nuclear program -- which it insists is for peaceful purposes -- and has declined to suspend nuclear enrichment before even beginning such talks. Pyongyang's claims of a test Sunday also place it at odds with many in the international community.

Administration officials say they hope North Korea's action will be a wake-up call to countries such as China and Russia, which have been reluctant to support even mild economic sanctions on Iran for uranium-enrichment work many see as a sign of weapons ambitions.

By the same logic, if North Korea emerges relatively unscathed from the provocative incident, that could further embolden Iran by showing it has little to fear in moving ahead on nuclear development.

U.S. officials say the key barometer in coming days will be how China responds to Pyongyang's action. Following the announcement, the Chinese Foreign Ministry called the test "brazen," a term Chinese diplomats say was meant to show the depths of Beijing's anger. Yet the official Chinese news agency Xinhua said Chinese President Hu Jintao told Mr. Bush that all countries should "avoid actions that may lead to escalation."

China hasn't made clear what measures it may support within the United Nations. U.S. officials hope that Chinese resolve in backing U.N. action on North Korea will bolster the chances for imposing similar measures on Iran.

"All eyes are on China -- and then Russia," a U.S. State Department official said.

The international struggle over both Iran's and North Korea's nuclear programs have reached the U.N. Security Council at the same time -- a collision of contrasting diplomatic efforts that the U.S. hopes to use to its advantage.

Germany along with the council's five permanent members -- the U.S., Britain, France, China and Russia -- decided last week to take up a sanctions resolution on Iran after Tehran turned down an incentives package and refused to give up its enrichment work.

North Korea last year also broke off international talks and turned down various incentives to give up its nuclear program.

The challenge for the U.S. now is to forge a strong international consensus on punitive steps toward North Korea that might spill over into talks later on Iran.

The cases of North Korea and Iran differ in many ways, as do China's interests in both countries. China long has been a close North Korean ally and economic lifeline. As a neighbor, Beijing fears the chaos of an economic collapse in North Korea at least as much as Pyongyang's new nuclear status. In Iran, China's interests are more sharply focused, since Tehran is China's largest single supplier of oil, accounting for nearly 18% of its oil imports.

The Security Council yesterday began to consider a sanctions package on North Korea that U.S. officials said would seek to block imports of nuclear and weapons technology and restrict a range of financial transactions. The proposed restrictions are very similar to ones the U.S. would like to see incorporated in a first Iran sanctions package.

With North Korea, the Bush administration is going to have to overcome deep concerns in China and South Korea that punitive measures will stir instability in the impoverished and isolated country.

The issues couldn't be more different in the case of Iran. All members of the Security Council except the U.S. have substantial trade and financial ties with Iran, which is one reason why they have had trouble agreeing on sanctions that would put pressure on Tehran. Sanctions that would really sting, such as blocking oil exports or substantial imports of gasoline, aren't being discussed.

Most experts believe Iran is several years away from mastering the technology needed to build a nuclear weapon.

Experts and officials inside Iran argue that Iran's leadership has become more determined not to accede to international demands, which they argue are driven by the U.S. "One of the places we have [internal] differences over is how to deal with the West, but those differences are fading," said Kazem Jalali, an Iranian legislator involved in foreign policy.

Iranian state radio responded to the incident by blaming it on the U.S., saying that North Korea was simply responding to the continued pressure of U.S. sanctions. "North Korea's nuclear test was a reaction to America's threats and humiliation," it said. U.S. officials insisted the tricky diplomacy involved in forging an agreement on a North Korea resolution shouldn't delay work on an Iranian package, which is expected to begin at the end of the week.

Experts: N. Korea Test May Embolden Iran (AP)

By Ali Akbar Dareini, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0076896

North Korea's claim to have tested an atomic bomb could embolden Iran as it defies the U.N. Security Council and the United States over its own nuclear program, analysts said Monday.

For months, Iran has been under close scrutiny by the United States and Washington's allies, who claim the country is secretly developing nuclear weapons. Tehran insists its program is solely for generating electricity.

The world's attention turned abruptly from Iran to North Korea on Monday when the isolated communist nation announced it had set off an underground nuclear blast.

The announcement was met with a barrage of global condemnation, with President Bush saying it posed a threat to global peace and security. China, a longtime North Korea supporter, also strongly condemned the act.

How the Security Council reacts to North Korea will be watched "very carefully" in Tehran, said Robert Einhorn, a former U.S. assistant secretary of state for nonproliferation and a senior adviser at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington.

"If the U.S. can't build consensus for a tough reaction to North Korea, Iran may see that it can go down the nuclear path with impunity," Einhorn said.

The international community's determination to confront Iran also may be diminished because the U.N. Security Council will be preoccupied with a new crisis, said Ray Takeyh, a senior fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations in Washington.

Hamid Reza Shokouhi, a political writer at the moderate Mardomsalari (Democracy) daily newspaper in Iran, said North Korea's reported test reduces pressure on Iran.

"The test doesn't mean Iran will pursue a similar path because Iran is not after a bomb, but will help Iran to buy time and pursue its program as the world concentrates on North Korea," he said.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has repeatedly rejected Western calls to halt uranium enrichment, brushing aside an Aug. 31 Security Council deadline to stop enrichment or face possible sanctions.

But international sanctions against Iran have never been a sure bet, even after Tehran rebuffed the Security Council resolution. Strategic and political partnerships have pitted Washington and Britain calling for punitive measures on one side, and Russia and China urging negotiations on the other.

The Security Council was scheduled to discuss possible sanctions against Tehran this week.

Iran, meanwhile, has used the deadlock to continue its vocal confrontation with the United States and beef up its argument that under the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty, it has the right to have nuclear technology.

Elias Hanna, a former general of the Lebanese army and a military expert, said the North Korean test gives Iran further ammunition to go forward with its plans regardless if they are peaceful or not.

"The Iranians have the intention to go on with the program until the end. In Iran, the nuclear program is related to the nation's dignity, the continuation of the regime and the future Iranian role in the region," Hanna said.

Iran was not among the nations calling for harsh sanctions against North Korea on Monday, instead urging the U.N. not to punish Pyongyang and blaming the test on U.S. policies.

"Not only did the United States not lift the sanctions it had imposed on North Korea, it even increased the diplomatic pressure. Such pressure finally led North Korea to conduct its nuclear test," Iran's state-run radio said in a commentary.

"North Korea's nuclear test was a reaction to America's threats and humiliation," it said.

British Prime Minister Tony Blair's spokesman declined to speculate on whether the North Korean test made resolving the standoff over Iran's nuclear program a more pressing concern, saying the "process on Iran will continue."

Einhorn said North Korea's reported test may defer Security Council talks on Iran for "days, even weeks," but that it will become the subject of intense talks again soon.

But reaching a consensus on Iran may take longer than on North Korea, he said.

"It looks like it will be somewhat easier to get consensus on North Korea because the Chinese are somewhat furious at this stage," Einhorn said.

Iran Warns Of Retaliation If Sanctions Imposed (AFP)

By Farhad Pouladi

AFP, October 10, 2006

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has vowed to impose retaliatory sanctions on world powers if the UN Security Council carries out threats to penalise Iran over its nuclear programme.

The warning came amid an intensifying global uproar Monday over North Korea's announcement of its first test of a nuclear weapon, a move which prompted Iran to declare it wanted a world free of atomic arms.

Ahmadinejad did not specify what kind of tit-for-tat measures might be imposed and Iran -- OPEC's second largest producer -- has always insisted it will not use oil as a weapon in the standoff.

"We will also impose sanctions on them," Ahmadinejad told reporters late Sunday in response to a question about a decision by the five Security Council permanent members plus Germany to discuss the prospect of sanctions.

"In the past 27 years they have always threatened us with sanctions and during this time they did everything they could," he said according to the student ISNA and semi-official ILNA news agencies.

"They do their thing and in return we will do ours."

Oil prices again spiked above 60 dollars a barrel in London trade as market players expressed fears the nuclear weapon test by North Korea might stiffen Iran's resolve in its standoff with the West.

Tehran, which is refusing to heed Western demands it suspend uranium enrichment, insists its nuclear programme is solely for peaceful energy needs, vehemently rejecting US allegations that it is seeking nuclear weapons.

Iran's foreign ministry spokesman called for negotiations after the North Korean nuclear test but stopped short of issuing an explicit condemnation of Pyongyang's actions.

"Iran's position is clear and Iran on principle believes in a world free of nuclear weapons," Mohammad Ali Hosseini was quoted as saying by a state television anchor.

"Iran is hopeful that negotiations on North Korea's nuclear activities can go ahead in the interest of both North Korea and the international community," he added.

In a meeting late on Friday, representatives from Britain, China, Germany France, Russia and the United States agreed to discuss sanctions against Iran after it refused to heed a new deadline to halt uranium enrichment.

Considerable momentum towards drafting a sanctions resolution as early as this week appeared to have been generated by the meeting between top diplomats in London after weeks of talks with Iran failed to win a breakthrough.

But it remains to be seen whether this can be maintained amid the growing uproar over the announcement by North Korea early Monday it had conducted its first test of a nuclear weapon.

The UN Security Council was expected to hold an emergency meeting later Monday to weigh how to respond to North Korea's test, which came in brazen defiance of a previous UN resolution.

Such moves could take up precious time that was to be devoted to the Iranian nuclear issue and further stave off the threat of UN action.

It also remains unclear whether Russia and China will support sanctions measures proposed by the United States and its chief ally Britain. Moscow and Beijing have always insisted on a diplomatic solution to the crisis.

The question of Iran's right to enrich uranium lies at the heart of the crisis. The process can be used to make nuclear fuel and, in highly extended form, the fissile core of an atomic bomb.

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who attended the London meeting, has said the United States wants a graduated series of sanctions, to be implemented through multiple UN resolutions that would ramp up pressure on Iran.

The first set of measures is expected to focus on preventing the supply of material and funding for Iran's nuclear or ballistic missile programmes.

Other steps could include asset freezes and travel bans on officials linked to possible Iranian weapons programmes.

Republicans Stand To Profit From Nuclear Test 'fear Factor' (FT)

By Edward Luce

Financial Times, October 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0076898

Within hours of North Korea's proclaimed nuclear test yesterday Dennis Hastert, the Republican speaker in Congress, and John Boehner, the Republican majority leader on Capitol Hill, issued politically charged statements. With only a month to go before mid-term congressional elections many Republicans believe the tests could help restore their waning prospects.

"This reckless move by North Korea highlights the importance of a US missile defence shield capable of protecting America against madmen with weapons of mass destruction," said Mr Boehner. "It is time for the Democrats . . . to abandon their long-standing policy of voting against missile defence programmes. It is now clear that such a position would put Americans in danger."

Republicans almost always benefit from any rise in the "fear factor" among voters in the US. However, Monday's move by Pyongyang could cut both ways. "Democrats can point to the zero progress that George Bush has made on the 'Axis of Evil' states since he identified them almost five years ago," said Bob Einhorn, who was a senior official in the Clinton administration dealing with North Korea in the late 1990s. "Iraq is a fiasco, Iran is close to getting nuclear weapons, and North Korea already has them."

On Monday the US president was more circumspect than his Republican colleagues in linking the test to the US's fetid electoral climate. In a statement condemning North Korea's "provocative action", Mr Bush hinted strongly that the US would take military action if it found evidence that Pyongyang was selling nuclear material or technology to terrorist groups or to other nation states.

Republican prospects have declined in the past two weeks following a scandal over a lawmaker's suggestive e-mails to teenage interns on Capitol Hill. The scandal, which has prompted calls for Mr Hastert's resignation as speaker, followed a revival in Republican fortunes in September that was linked to the "war on terror" after a series of speeches by Mr Bush around the fifth anniversary of the September 11 attacks.

Mr Bush's own approval ratings also rose in September in part because of public sympathy for the US president following attacks on him at the United Nations in New York by Presidents Hugo Chávez of Venezuela and Mahmoud Ahmadi-Nejad of Iran. There was also a rising focus on the Democratic party's divisions over the war in Iraq, with some party leaders calling for immediate withdrawal and others for a better military strategy on the ground.

Monday's tests could help the Republicans regain control of the news agenda. "Our message has been blown off course in the last few weeks," said Saul Anuzis, head of the Republicans in Michigan, one of the key battleground states. "To the extent this focuses people's minds on the dangers America faces it will help Republicans."

However, North Korea inhabits a far smaller space in the American mindset than Iran, in part because – unlike Tehran – Pyongyang poses no direct threat to Israel or to the increasingly combustible situation in Iraq. In addition, the Bush administration has come under attack from moderate Republicans for its reluctance to hold direct talks with either Iran or North Korea.

"The best thing both parties could do is issue a joint resolution condemning North Korea," said Michael Green, a former senior Bush official now at the Centre for Strategic International Studies. "North Korea misinterprets domestic criticism of Mr Bush as weakness. They do not understand our political system."

Republicans Point To Pyongyang In Bid To Garner Voter Support (WSJ)

By John D. McKinnon

The Wall Street Journal, October 10, 2006

WASHINGTON -- North Korea's claim of a successful underground nuclear test reverberated through U.S. politics, diverting attention from congressional scandals that have hurt Republicans' election chances.

Still, it was unclear whether the incident would help or hurt Republicans trying to rebuild credibility with voters on national security.

Republicans used Pyongyang's announcement to go on the attack in tight Senate races in Ohio and Pennsylvania, suggesting they see an opening to score points with security-conscious voters. Sen. Rick Santorum (R., Pa.), trailing Democratic challenger Bob Casey Jr. in polls, said the incident showed that "this is no time for inexperienced, weak leaders -- we must remain resolute in the fight to stop the spread of nuclear weapons to rogue nations." The national Republican Senate campaign issued a statement saying Mr. Casey has been endorsed by liberal foreign-policy groups and that he would oppose a national missile-defense system.

Democrats said President Bush's hard-line policy on North Korea and on global threats more broadly has failed. In a statement, party chairman Howard Dean said the North Korean announcement was "further evidence that President Bush has taken his eye off the ball, allowing a member of the so-called 'axis of evil' to allegedly test a nuclear weapon."

Democrats also suggested the Bush administration has paid insufficient attention to the North Korean threat while spending most of its time on Iraq and Iran. Some said Mr. Bush exacerbated the North Korean problem through his policy of refusing to negotiate with its leaders directly.

Republican strategists say that if the party's candidates can get voters to focus on terrorism and national security above all else, they will gain a significant advantage. Indeed, recent polls show that, of all the issues, national security is the one that breaks the most often in Republicans' favor. In a Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll in September, voters said they preferred Republicans over Democrats in handling the war on terrorism, by 38% to 24%. But their margin slipped substantially during 2005, and while it has climbed in recent weeks, the party hasn't recovered to 2004 levels. An ABC News/Washington Post poll yesterday found Republicans further behind in the congressional race this close to Election Day than they have been for 20 years.

To be sure, polls indicate the war in Iraq remains a bigger concern for most voters than the global war against terrorism.

Still, in the hours after North Korea's announcement, most foreign-policy experts said the incident likely would give Republicans at least a short-term boost -- and not just by changing the subject from the House leadership's responses to the Mark Foley scandal. They said a test of a North Korean nuclear weapon -- which would be the first since 1998, when India and Pakistan both set off bombs -- also underscores the danger of nuclear proliferation among groups and nations hostile to the U.S. North Korea already is an exporter of missile technology to governments unfriendly to the U.S.

"The reaction quite broadly will be validation...of North Korea as a substantial threat," said Michael Levi, a fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations. "The big picture for Democrats is that this takes away attention from...the congressional scandals" where they had scored heavy political damage. By contrast, it will be difficult for Democrats to get much attention for their criticisms "because no one wants to hear anything but condemnation of [North Korean leader] Kim Jong Il."

But others played down the effect. "We now have evidence that the wildest and craziest regime in the world has working nuclear weapons," said Richard Betts, director of Columbia University's Saltzman Institute of War and Peace Studies. But, Mr. Betts added, "It's not a shocker -- we've known this could happen anytime."

In fact, the U.S. stock market shrugged off the news. The Dow Jones Industrial Average edged up 7.60 points to finish yesterday's session at 11857.81.

History has shown that a late-breaking national-security development -- the so-called October Surprise -- can affect U.S. elections. Al Qaeda circulated a videotape of Osama bin Laden just before the 2004 election in which the terrorist leader mocked Mr. Bush and warned American voters to stop electing candidates who harm Muslims, or risk another attack like 9/11. But the tape appeared to solidify voter support for Mr. Bush.

Bush: World Leaders United Over N. Korea (AP-Y)

By Deb Riechmann

AP-Yahoo, October 10, 2006

Facing the prospect of a nuclear-armed North Korea, President Bush on Monday called the communist regime's claim of a nuclear test a provocative act and warned Pyongyang against exporting nuclear materials.

"Once again, North Korea has defied the will of the international community, and the international community will respond," Bush said.

Other world leaders joined Bush in calling for an immediate and harsh rebuke from the United Nations against North Korean leader Kim Jong Il, who wants to join the club of nuclear-armed nations.

Bush has made national security a key issue in the midterm congressional elections, and Democrats said North Korea's success in raising the stakes in the nuclear standoff was evidence that Bush's policy was flawed.

The president called the leaders of South Korea, Russia, Japan and China, and he said they all reaffirmed a commitment to a nuclear-free Korean peninsula. At the United Nations, the U.S. proposed stringent sanctions, including a trade ban on military and luxury items, the power to inspect all cargo entering or leaving the country, and freezing assets connected with its weapons programs.

While concerned that North Korea could use a nuclear weapon offensively, the United States is equally worried about it selling nuclear materials or weapons to others. North Korea is believed to have enough plutonium for as few as four and as many as a dozen nuclear bombs.

Bush said that North Korea already is one of the world's leading proliferators of missile technology, including transfers to Iran and Syria.

"The transfer of nuclear weapons or material by North Korea to states or nonstate entities would be considered a grave threat to the United States," Bush said in a brief statement in the diplomatic reception room at the White House. "And we would hold North Korea fully accountable for the consequences of such action."

North Korea has been a major security problem for successive U.S. administrations. In 2002 the Bush administration accused the North of reneging on a 1994 nuclear freeze agreement by secretly undertaking a uranium enrichment program. That agreement became inoperative, and in the ensuing months, a defiant North Korea withdrew from the Nuclear Non-Proliferation treaty and ended the nuclear freeze.

In 2003, the United States joined with China, South Korea, Japan and Russia in an effort to negotiate the dismantlement of North Korea's nuclear weapons program in exchange for economic concessions. There have been no negotiations since November 2005 because of what Pyongyang describes as hostile U.S. policies.

Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill said a tough U.N. resolution would help protect the United States from the potential spread of nuclear technology and make it harder for North Korea to get the finances needed to fund a nuclear program.

"What the North Koreans have in mind is that if they go ahead and test, we may be angry now but at some point we'll get over it and we'll deal with them as a nuclear weapons state," Hill, the chief U.S. envoy to the North Korea nuclear talks, said in an Associated Press Television interview. "We're not going to deal with them as a nuclear weapons state. I don't think China will deal with them. I don't think any of their neighbors will deal with them."

Democrats condemned North Korea's actions and cited the reported test as evidence that Bush's foreign policy strategy is ineffective. They point to six-party talks with the United States, Russia, China, Japan, South Korea and North Korea that have stalled and so far failed to quell North Korea's nuclear ambitions.

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev, said the Bush administration has for several years been in a state of denial about the growing challenge of North Korea, and has tried to downplay the issue.

Rep. Edward Markey, D-Mass., co-chairman of the House Bipartisan Task Force on Nonproliferation, said the test might have been avoided if the Bush administration had been more willing to fully engage North Korea diplomatically. "The Bush administration has spent six years without a coherent North Korea policy, leaving the United States rudderless in the face of Pyongyang's brinkmanship," he said.

Senate Majority Whip Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., said Democrats are acting as if Bush, not North Korea, is the enemy. He said Democrats have attacked Bush for having a go-it-alone strategy in Iraq and criticize his multilateral approach to North Korea.

"The Democrats need to take a deep breath and realize that this is not about the election, and that Americans don't want anyone playing partisan politics with the threat of nuclear weapons. Rather than attack the president, we ought to be coming together to support his efforts to protect America," he said.

The United States has not yet confirmed the test.

"We're leaving it to the scientists," White House press secretary Tony Snow said Monday. "It could take as much as a couple of days. The scientists are still going through all of it."

One U.S. official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the politically sensitive situation with North Korea, said the working assumption among government experts is that, more likely than not, it was a nuclear test. However, various government agencies were still evaluating the data, the official said.

The official said it can't yet be ruled out that conventional explosives could have caused a seismic event of this size. It could also be that the test — or even one stage of it — failed. In addition, the official said, if the test was conducted in a particularly cavernous area, the shockwave could have been muffled.

Bush Seeks Action From U.N., 6 Parties (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, October 10, 2006

President Bush yesterday called for an "immediate response" from the United Nations Security Council to North Korea's assertion that it had tested a nuclear weapon, as Senate Democrats demanded that the administration engage in one-on-one talks with the nation's increasingly belligerent leader, Kim Jong-il.

The White House rejected those calls, saying direct negotiations failed miserably during the Clinton administration and that the Bush administration plans to stick with six-party talks in an effort to persuade regional leaders, such as China, to apply pressure on North Korea.

"There's strength in numbers," White House spokesman Tony Snow said.

Using carefully crafted diplomatic language, the president said in a brief statement yesterday morning that he spoke with the leaders of China, South Korea, Russia and Japan and that all agreed "that the proclaimed actions taken by North Korea are unacceptable."

Mr. Bush stopped short of threatening a direct U.S. response, instead saying "the United States remains committed to diplomacy."

"The United States condemns this provocative act. Once again, North Korea has defied the will of the international community, and the international community will respond," he said.

He said the United States and its allies will keep all options open.

"I reaffirmed to our allies in the region, including South Korea and Japan, that the United States will meet the full range of our deterrent and security commitments," he said.

Mr. Bush did not confirm that the North Korean test was nuclear, and early reports suggested that the blast may have been a failed nuclear test. "Nonetheless, such a claim itself constitutes a threat to international peace and security," he said.

In New York, John R. Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, said the United States would move quickly to seek a Security Council resolution condemning and possibly sanctioning North Korea.

"We've been working very, very closely with the government of Japan on this," Mr. Bolton said. "We're looking, as the president said in his comments, for very swift action by the Security Council."

Congressional Democrats, meanwhile, sought political advantage from the reported nuclear test.

"On North Korea, as in other national security policies, the Bush administration and the Republican-controlled Congress have made America less secure," said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat. "Now the White House must rally the international community and must directly speak with the North Koreans so they understand we will not continue to stand on the sidelines."

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat, said: "We need a strategy that convinces the North to stop making bombs and put all of its fissile material under international monitoring. I believe that strategy must include direct engagement with the North."

Sen. John Kerry, Massachusetts Democrat, said, "Weapons of mass destruction pointed at our allies and strategic partners represents a shocking failure of President Bush's security policy, and a threat to the interests of peace and stability in the world."

House Majority Leader John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican, backed Mr. Bush. "It is critical that we support President Bush and our diplomats as they work with other members of the international community to demand North Korea's immediate disarmament," he said.

The reported test brings full circle the president's charge in his 2002 State of the Union address when he labeled Iraq, Iran and North Korea an "axis of evil."

Mr. Snow said the White House has been considering a "menu" of punitive sanctions for several weeks, but he did not indicate what action would be taken.

Earlier yesterday, he said the North Koreans alerted the Chinese about the test. The Chinese then notified the U.S. Embassy in Beijing, which passed the word to other U.S. officials.

Down, But Flush With Cash (NYT)

By John M. Broder

The New York Times, October 10, 2006

With only a month to go before the midterm elections, aftershocks of the reported nuclear test in North Korea reverberated through the political world. The crisis could prove an opportunity for President Bush and Republicans to change the subject after weeks of bad political news for them and refocus voters on the issue they think works best for the party, national security.

But the footing for Republican incumbents is still treacherous. Details emerge every day in the scandal surrounding Mark Foley's sexually explicit messages to teenage House pages and the Republican House leadership's handling of the matter. Political handicappers say the number of competitive races is expanding, with virtually all of the movement favorable to Democrats. At least 40 Republican-held House seats are considered competitive, with Democrats needing to win 15 to take control.

Republicans are fighting back with their most potent remaining weapon: money. The National Republican Congressional Committee spent $7.8 million last Friday alone on behalf of endangered incumbents. The committee reported spending an additional $300,000 on Monday. The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee spent $700,000 on Friday and over the weekend, according to finance reports.

North Korea And The Bomb (NYT)

Let us all agree: North Korea's government is too erratic, too brutal, and too willing to sell what it has built to have a nuclear bomb. There is also no military solution, not least because intelligence experts haven't a clue where Pyongyang has hidden its weapons labs or its stock of plutonium.

So after years of temporizing and denial, the world's leaders need to figure out how to force this terrible genie back into the bottle. It is a truism that no country that has tested a nuclear weapon has ever been pressured or cajoled into giving it up. But neither has any nuclear postulant been as vulnerable to outside pressure and bribery as this regime.

The Bush administration seems to want to impose limited sanctions on North Korea — and inspections of all cargo going into and out of the country — until it agrees to abandon its entire weapons program. We fear that won't be enough to quickly change Pyongyang's mind — while key players like China won't sign on to never-ending punishments.

We believe this must instead be a two-step process, starting with a Security Council-ordered ban on all trade, until the North agrees to stop expanding its arsenal. Pyongyang must be told that there will be no further attempt at negotiation until it halts all plutonium production, forswears additional tests and readmits United Nations inspectors.

In practice, the North Koreans are likely to back down only if China chokes off their oil supply and other essential trade. Until now Beijing has refused to use its enormous leverage, fearing that too much pressure could topple the North Korean government and unleash a mass of refugees over its border. When told they were enabling their neighbor's nuclear ambitions, Chinese diplomats blithely insisted that the North was likely bluffing about having a weapon. Now, Washington, Tokyo, Moscow and others have to make clear that China will be judged by its willingness to confront this problem.

The Security Council must also make clear that it is still demanding the complete dismantlement of Pyongyang's nuclear weapons program. For that, negotiations are the only hope. It is impossible to know whether North Korea will give up its weapons at any price. But it has never been tested — mainly because the Bush administration has not made the sort of serious offer, including security guarantees, that might make a bargain worthwhile.

The administration has indulged in its own denial and temporizing. Last year, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice dismissed the North's declaration that it had nuclear weapons as a bid for attention. "I do think the North Koreans have been, frankly, a little bit disappointed that people are not jumping up and down and running around with their hair on fire," she told The Wall Street Journal.

Since then, United States policy has whipsawed between negotiations and posturing, incentives and sanctions. It has been months since negotiators even sat down at the table. Administration hawks suggested last week that perhaps the best thing would be for the North to test, so the world would know exactly what it was dealing with. The hawks appear to have gotten their way. So why don't we feel safer?

North Korea's Nukes (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 10, 2006

With great danger comes great clarity. By ordering his country's first-ever nuclear weapons test, Kim Jong Il lay bare this generation's greatest challenge: How far will the world go to impose order on rogue states intent on acquiring weapons of mass destruction?

History offers cold comfort. Only nine nations in the post-Soviet era possess nuclear weapons, but many more, including Tehran's mullahs, are seeking them. The U.S. and other responsible democracies have persuaded a few nations -- Ukraine, South Africa, Libya -- to disarm or abandon their weapons programs. In our globalized world, however, WMD proliferation is a potent threat, as proven by Pakistan's former nuclear-secrets merchant, A.Q. Khan.

Pyongyang, like Iran today, never hid its ambitions. For over a decade, the North has built up the world's fourth-largest military, threatened its neighbors and engaged in drug dealing, counterfeiting and WMD proliferation -- with little rebuke. At one point, the Hermit Kingdom threatened to turn Seoul into a "sea of fire." In 2002, Pyongyang announced it had nuclear weapons.

The world rolled over. After signing on to the nonproliferation treaty in 1985, Pyongyang later admitted to hiding additional nuclear reactors. China and South Korea continued to trade with the regime. In 1998 after North Korea lobbed a missile over Japan, the Clinton Administration agreed to food aid, and South Korea's then-President Kim Dae Jung began a policy of appeasement. After July's missile launches, the United Nations passed a resolution with limited sanctions.

South Korea shoulders much of the blame. By sticking to its "sunshine policy," Seoul undermined every diplomatic effort to exert nonviolent pressure on the North. Two-way trade between North and South Korea passed $1 billion last year, according to the U.S. State Department, a huge chunk of the North's total income. By tolerating Pyongyang's proliferation ambitions, President Roh Moo Hyun and his foreign minister, Ban Ki Moon, have allowed the current crisis to explode on its doorstep.

China, the North's largest trading partner, shares responsibility for this crisis. Fearing a torrent of refugees over its northeastern border -- and opposed to the idea of a strong, unified democratic Korean peninsula -- Beijing has provided 80% to 90% of the North's energy needs, plus critical food aid. Beijing likes to say in public that it doesn't have much leverage over the North. Privately, Chinese officials admit that they're not powerless.

Only with the drumbeat of a possible nuclear test had the public rhetoric of both begun to shift. Seoul warned last week that "North Korea should take full responsibility for all consequences" of a nuclear test. In a rare public rebuke, a Chinese spokesman told the North to "exercise necessary calm and restraint." It remains to be seen whether Beijing's post-test response will equal its pre-test rhetoric.

A nuclear North Korea may change both countries' strategic calculations. China fears a nuclear arms race in the region, particularly with Japan whose new Prime Minister warned yesterday that the world is entering a "dangerous nuclear age." He's right. South Korea, too, may finally acknowledge the threat, not least because yesterday's test will renew the debate in Washington about the wisdom of keeping U.S. troops in the South.

What to do now? South Korea and especially China should rethink appeasement. It has failed. A full cut-off of energy supplies and foreign aid would help pressure Kim Jong Il. Opening the Chinese border to North Korean refugees would do so as well. Most important, the world should tighten the screws it already has in place, with success, on the North's external financial accounts. No dictator can run a rogue state without money. Kim might give up the nukes if the alternative was regime collapse. And to encourage the world's actors to get real about North Korea, the U.S. should make clear that a military response is not off the table.

Yesterday's test marks a new reality that will change security calculations in Asia and the world. We're about to find out how responsible an actor China wants to be on the world stage, or if it prefers having one of its clients creating trouble for the U.S. and Japan. At the very least Kim Jong Il has to know, and will have to be told, that any use of nuclear weapons by his regime or by anyone who can be traced to North Korea will result in his government's annihilation. U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill said the other day that North Korea "can have a future or it can have these weapons."

There will be renewed calls for bilateral talks between Washington and Pyongyang. This would be a mistake. Putting new money on the table and pulling sanctions off would be seen by Pyongyang and all others as a reward for defying the world and building a bomb. The next "development" will be another nuclear nation, starting with Iran.

Kim has opened a Pandora's box. Closing it won't be easy. The effort needs to be made to avoid the alternative: a new world disorder.

Responding To North Korea (WP)

NORTH KOREA'S objective in the aftermath of its reported nuclear test will undoubtedly be to force its neighbors and the world to accept it as an established nuclear power. India and Pakistan succeeded in riding out sanctions and winning acceptance as "strategic partners" of the United States after their bomb tests. Kim Jong Il will try to repeat that history. Whether he succeeds will depend, above all, on the outcome of what we hope will be some serious rethinking by the governments of South Korea and China.

North Korea's neighbors, and not the United States, bear the burden of the North's decision to proceed with what it said was a nuclear explosion -- the small yield raised questions yesterday about whether the test could have been a flop or a fake. Beijing and Seoul have propped up Mr. Kim's despotic regime with heavy subsidies of fuel and food, reasoning that keeping it alive was better than a collapse that could flood their countries with refugees. The underlying logic was that the North's nuclear program was little more than a bargaining chip with the United States and did not pose a genuine military threat.

Both countries have to recalculate now. Is an outlaw dictatorship with nuclear weapons on the border really tolerable? Is the possibility that Japan or Taiwan will respond by building nuclear weapons less of a threat than a tide of refugees? What poses a greater risk of war: the possible collapse of the Kim regime, or an attempt by that regime to use its new weapon either to extort concessions from the South or to achieve its stated goal of conquering the whole Korean Peninsula? Most important: If subsidies and bribes have failed to moderate North Korean behavior over the past few years, is it reasonable to bet that they will do so in the future?

The Bush administration's response to the test should be uncomplicated. It will rightly press hard for new U.N.-sponsored sanctions. It should take any further measures that could increase the pressure on the North or prevent it from exporting its technology. It also should be prepared to talk to Mr. Kim about disarmament in the unlikely event he elects to take up the framework that was agreed on a year ago in the "six-party" negotiations. That agreement promised him substantial economic aid, security guarantees and normal relations with the United States; it's fanciful to suggest that the United States hasn't been forthcoming enough.

In the absence of workable military options, the United States probably cannot force North Korea to give up its bomb, nor can the United States overturn the regime. The real leverage lies with South Korea and China. Without their continued material support, and their insistence on shutting their borders to the North's desperate people, the Kim regime could not survive for long. Beijing and Seoul have said they would not accept the nuclearization of the Korean Peninsula. In fact, they do not have to. They do, however, have to choose between two unpleasant options: accepting a North Korean nuclear weapon or risking the "instability" in the North that they have tried so hard to prevent.

Kim Jong Il's Challenge To China (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, October 10, 2006

WHETHER NORTH KOREA'S self-proclaimed nuclear test turns out to have been a big bang or a little pop, it already has done incalculable damage to global security. Yet however radioactive the geopolitical fallout, it cannot be allowed to damage relations between Beijing and Washington.

Recriminations already have begun in Washington, with politicians and pundits simply adjusting their debate to take Monday's events into account. The question is no longer how to persuade North Korean leader Kim Jong Il to abandon his quest for nuclear weapons but whether he could have been persuaded — and whether the approach was too bellicose toward Kim or too obliging to China.

This argument is now even more fruitless. But it could turn ugly if members of Congress already hostile to China because of its position on Taiwan or because of trade issues are joined by those who ask why Beijing didn't do more to stop North Korea from going nuclear.

The Bush administration should be careful not to let criticism from members of Congress distract it from diplomatic efforts to win more complete cooperation from the Chinese. But the Chinese need to decide once and for all whether they want to play the leading role in this crisis or whether they are content to continue to criticize the U.S. for failing to do so.

Beijing has implied that the administration's refusal to hold one-on-one negotiations with North Korea has made it impossible to make headway with Pyongyang. But if China doesn't want the U.S. to behave like a global hegemonist and doesn't want Japan to abandon its pacifist constitution, then it must share the responsibility for deterring and containing North Korea — or better yet, persuade it to disarm.

Chinese officials are said to roll their eyes in private at North Korean intransigence and to downplay their influence over Kim. Their act isn't terribly convincing. China is North Korea's last friend and ally and its biggest supplier of food and fuel. In 2003, it briefly shut off gas pipelines to make the point that Pyongyang had better agree to six-party negotiations over nuclear disarmament.

Chinese and South Korean reluctance to punish North Korea economically, lest privation trigger floods of refugees across their borders, is understandable. But both nations must now realize that their interest would be far more threatened by a nuclear arms race in the region and beyond.

With South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki-moon poised to become the next United Nations secretary-general, the international community should begin planning for humanitarian assistance for North Korean refugees. Such plans would be wise in any case — in the event stiff international sanctions are applied or Kim's regime collapses because of its own suicidal economic and political policies.

Meanwhile, the best course for the U.S. and China is to present a united, anti-nuclear stance to the world. Beijing's denunciation Monday of North Korea's actions was its strongest and swiftest in years. May it soon be matched by Chinese action.

Talking With The Monsters (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, October 10, 2006

If there's one overriding lesson from North Korea's apparent nuclear test, it's this: We need to negotiate directly even with hostile and brutal regimes.

It's probably too late to clean up the mess that President Bush has made on the Korean peninsula, but there is time to apply the lesson to Syria and especially Iran — where we may soon be facing a third military conflict in a Muslim country.

As former Secretary of State James Baker noted in an ABC News interview on Sunday: "I believe in talking to your enemies. ... It's not appeasement to talk to your enemies."

The administrations of both the first President Bush and of President Clinton talked to North Korea. That engagement sometimes seemed distasteful, but it averted war and created incentives for North Korea to moderate its behavior — just a bit.

The bottom line is reflected in the plutonium obtained by North Korea. Here's the scorecard: Amount obtained during the Clinton administration, zero; amount obtained under this administration, enough for about eight nuclear weapons. (North Korea has also tried since late in the Clinton administration to enrich uranium for a separate path to nuclear weapons, but apparently still hasn't succeeded and perhaps never will.)

"By not having any contact, we've lost any way of controlling or directing the outcome," noted James Laney, a longtime Korea specialist and former ambassador to South Korea. "As this test indicates, we're completely out of the picture."

The real culprit, of course, is not President Bush but Kim Jong-il, North Korea's "Dear Leader." That said, if Colin Powell and other administration moderates had been allowed to engage North Korea as they had wanted, we would not now be caught in this nuclear crisis.

Administration hard-liners believe that North Korea's regime may collapse at any moment. Maybe. But when I visited last year, the regime seemed as solid (and repressive) as when I first visited in 1989. Sure, it will collapse at some point, but waiting for disintegration is not a strategy.

Indeed, North Korea may be less vulnerable now, partly because its economy has improved significantly since the late 1990's as a result of increasing trade with China. Last year, North Korea's trade with China was double the level of 2002 and quadruple that of 1999.

The China-North Korea border crossing at Sanhe has just expanded its operations, and trade could rise sharply if the two countries follow through on discussions to expand rail links and export Chinese containers from the North Korean port of Rajin.

Mr. Bush's push for tough U.N. resolutions is welcome but is no substitute for direct talks. The reality is that even if China and South Korea were willing to apply tough economic sanctions to the North — which they are not — the Dear Leader would stick to his guns. After all, this is a man who imported Mercedes-Benzes in the late 1990's while two million of his compatriots were dying in a famine.

So our huffing and puffing won't cause North Korea to back down, but we could drift toward greater dangers: If we move to enforce naval inspections of ships coming in and out of North Korea, the Dear Leader will threaten war. I doubt if he means it — but I still wouldn't buy real estate in Tokyo, Okinawa or Seoul right now.

So what should we do?

While proceeding with U.N. resolutions, we should also talk to North Korea directly. It's probably too late to persuade it to give up its nuclear arsenal, but it's plausible that it would freeze plutonium production and suspend missile and nuclear tests. Those are feasible goals that China might use its leverage to help achieve.

To show that talking with enemies doesn't mean rolling over, we can also insist on raising human rights issues. American conservatives have led the way in protesting brutality in North Korea, but the protests simply aren't effective. The U.S. government could add to the pressure by going public with satellite images of concentration camps and publicizing other intelligence about North Korean human rights abuses.

The challenge is larger than North Korea, though — it concerns how to stand up to all of the world's rogue regimes. Notably, in the two where Mr. Bush has tried engagement he has enjoyed bits of success. Those are Sudan and Libya.

Even though Mr. Bush says that Sudan is engaging in genocide in Darfur, we continue (quite properly) to negotiate with Khartoum — and that helped end the war between north and south Sudan, after two million deaths. Likewise, negotiations with Libya led it to give up its W.M.D. programs.

In contrast, we eschewed most direct diplomacy with North Korea and Iraq, and the result has been disastrous. So as we lurch ahead toward a showdown with Iran, let's remember the historical evidence: We sometimes do better talking to monsters than trying to slay them or wish them away.

Mutually Assured Disruption (NYT)

By David Frum

The New York Times, October 10, 2006

Washington

THE North Korean nuclear test — if that indeed is what it was — signals the catastrophic collapse of a dozen years of American policy. Over that period, two of the world's most dangerous regimes, Pakistan and North Korea, have developed nuclear weapons and the missiles to launch them. Iran, arguably the most dangerous of them all, will surely follow, unless some dramatic action is soon taken.

It is, alas, an iron law of modern diplomacy that the failure of any diplomatic process only proves the need for more of the process that has just failed. Thus those who have long supported negotiating with North Korea are now calling for the Bush administration to begin direct talks with the Kim Jong-il regime. Sorry, but all this would accomplish would be to reward an actual proliferator in order to preserve the illusion that the world still has a meaningful nonproliferation regime.

Some even suggest, in worried tones, that the North Korean test might provoke Japan to go nuclear, as if the worst possible consequence of nuclear weapons in the hands of one of America's direst enemies would be the acquisition of nuclear weapons by one of America's best friends.

A new approach is needed. America has three key strategic goals in the wake of the North Korean nuclear test. The first is to enhance the security of those American allies most directly threatened by North Korean nuclear weapons: Japan and South Korea.

The second is to exact a price from North Korea for its nuclear program severe enough to frighten Iran and any other rogue regimes considering following the North Korean path.

The last is to punish China. North Korea could not have completed its bomb if China, which provides the country an immense amount of food and energy aid, had strongly opposed it. Apparently, Beijing sees some potential gain in the uncertainty that North Korea's status brings. If China can engage in such conduct cost-free, what will deter Russia from aiding the Iranian nuclear program, or Pakistan someday aiding a Saudi or Egyptian one?

To meet these three goals, the United States should adopt four swift policy responses:

• Step up the development and deployment of existing missile defense systems.

The United States has already fielded 11 missile interceptors, nine in Alaska and two in California. The Navy has designed ship-based interceptors as well. As we well know, they are not perfect — but they are something.

Until now this lack of perfection has been allowed to block full deployment of the technology. But missile defenses do not need to be perfect to complicate any aggressive action by a comparatively weak power like North Korea against the United States or its allies.

And deploying a missile defense of growing effectiveness also helps achieve another goal — it would indirectly punish China by corroding the power of the missiles China uses to intimidate Taiwan.

• End humanitarian aid to North Korea and pressure South Korea to do the same.

Since 1995, the United States has provided more than two million tons of food aid to North Korea, plus considerable energy assistance. Officially, Washington says it has "delinked" its humanitarian aid from strategic concerns. Many United States officials believe that continuing this aid will sustain hopes for a better American-North Korean relationship in the future. Yet if the United States continues to send such aid even after an illicit nuclear test, North Korean leaders may well conclude that their aggressive actions have won them almost absolute impunity.

An end to humanitarian aid would not only exact a considerable direct price from North Korea, but it would also hurt China. Chinese leaders often justify their refusal to pressure North Korea by citing the risk of an economic collapse that would send millions of refugees northward into China. We could call that bluff: if a North Korean economic collapse is a thing China fears, why should the United States and South Korea shoulder the cost of helping to avert it? Let China pay the full cost of underwriting its aggressive client state.

• Invite Japan, South Korea, Australia, New Zealand and Singapore to join NATO — and even invite Taiwan to send observers to NATO meetings.

Perhaps North Korea and China imagine that the nuclear test has tilted the strategic balance in the Pacific in their favors. Now would be a good time to disabuse each of them of any such illusion. We need a tighter and stronger security arrangement in the Pacific region, one from which rogue states and those who support them are pointedly excluded. The NATO allies have agreed to expand the organization well beyond Western Europe; now we need to persuade them to make it global.

• Encourage Japan to renounce the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty and create its own nuclear deterrent.

World War II ended long ago, and it's time to put an end to the silly pretense that today's democratic Japan owes a burden of guilt to today's rising China. A nuclear Japan is the thing China and North Korea dread most (after, perhaps, a nuclear South Korea or Taiwan).

Not only would the nuclearization of Japan be a punishment of China and North Korea, but it would go far to meet our goal of dissuading Iran — it would show Tehran that the United States and its friends will aggressively seek to correct any attempt by rogue states to unsettle any regional nuclear balance. The analogue for Iran, of course, would be the threat of American aid to improve Israel's capacity to hit targets with nuclear weapons.

Countries like North Korea and Iran seek nuclear weapons because they imagine that those weapons will enhance their security and power. The way to contain them is to convince them otherwise. When nonproliferation can be prevented by negotiation, that is always preferred. But when negotiation fails, as it has failed in North Korea and is failing in Iran, rogue regimes must be made to suffer for their dangerous nuclear ambitions.

In A Test, A Reason To Talk (WP)

By Selig S. Harrison

The Washington Post, October 10, 2006

Bilateral Diplomacy Could Still Roll Back North Korea's Nuclear Arms Effort

"You have learned to live with other nuclear powers," said Vice Foreign Minister Kim Gye Gwan, North Korea's chief nuclear negotiator, leaning forward over the dinner table in Pyongyang. "So why not us? We really want to coexist with the United States peacefully, but you must learn to coexist with a North Korea that has nuclear weapons."

"That doesn't sound like you are serious when you talk about denuclearization," I replied.

"You misunderstand me," he said. "We are definitely prepared to carry out the Beijing agreement, step by step, but we won't completely and finally dismantle our nuclear weapons program until our relations with the United States are fully normalized. That will take some time, and until we reach the final target, we should find a way to coexist."

This exchange foreshadowed the North Korean test of a nuclear explosive device that has prompted demands for a naval blockade or military strikes against known North Korean nuclear facilities. But my conversations with six key North Korean leaders on a recent visit indicated that the test opens up new diplomatic opportunities and should not be viewed primarily as a military challenge.

Paradoxical as it may seem, Pyongyang staged the test as a last-ditch effort to jump-start a bilateral dialogue on the normalization of relations that the United States has so far spurned. Over and over, I was told that Pyongyang wants bilateral negotiations to set the stage for implementation of the denuclearization agreement it concluded in Beijing on Sept. 19, 2005, with the United States, China, Russia, Japan and South Korea.

Washington focuses on Article One of the accord, in which North Korea agreed to "abandon all nuclear weapons and existing nuclear programs." But what made the agreement acceptable to Pyongyang was the pledge in Article Two that the United States and North Korea would "respect each other's sovereignty, exist peacefully together and take steps to normalize relations."

In North Korean eyes, it was a flagrant violation when, four days after the agreement was signed, the United States in effect declared economic war on the Kim Jong Il regime. The Treasury Department imposed financial sanctions designed to cut off North Korean access to the international banking system, branding it a "criminal state" guilty of counterfeiting and money laundering.

The sanctions issue has given the initiative to hard-liners in Pyongyang, who can plausibly argue that the sanctions are the cutting edge of a calculated effort by dominant elements in the Bush administration to undercut the Beijing agreement, squeeze the Kim regime and eventually force its collapse.

To be sure, the United States should take action against any abuse of its currency. But the financial sanctions are not targeted solely against counterfeiting and any other illicit North Korean activity. They go much further by seeking to cut off all North Korean financial intercourse with the world. The United States has warned financial institutions everywhere, Treasury Undersecretary Stuart Levey said Aug. 23, "of the risks in holding any North Korean accounts."

Foreign businessmen and diplomats in Pyongyang told me of numerous cases in which legitimate imports of industrial equipment to make consumer goods have been blocked by the banking sanctions. This slows down the efforts of North Korean reformers to open up to the outside world and curtails economic growth. So far, the sanctions do not appear to be undermining the regime, but North Korean leaders can feel the noose tightening.

The Bush administration says that it is not pursuing a policy of "regime change," but the president did tell Bob Woodward that he would like to "topple" Kim Jong Il, according to Woodward's book "Bush at War." Recently, when a State Department official told Levey that the sanctions should distinguish between licit and illicit North Korean activity, Levey replied, "You know the president loves this stuff." Robert Joseph, John Bolton's successor as undersecretary of state for arms control, said at a recent State Department meeting that he hoped the sanctions would "put out all the lights in Pyongyang."

To advance U.S. security interests, the United States should agree to bilateral negotiations. It should press North Korea to suspend further nuclear and missile tests while negotiations on normalization proceed, freeze plutonium production and make a firm, timebound commitment to return to the six-party talks. In return, the administration should negotiate a compromise on the financial sanctions that would reopen North Korean access to the international banking system, offer large-scale energy cooperation and remove North Korea from the State Department's list of terrorist states, thus opening the way for multilateral aid from the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund and the Asian Development Bank, all of which North Korea is actively seeking to join.

Playing games with "regime change" has become much too dangerous and should now give way to a sustained diplomatic effort to roll back North Korea's nuclear weapons program while it is still in its early stages.

Iran: Sanctions Threat A 'Rusty' Weapon (AP)

By Nasser Karimi

AP, October 9, 2006

Iran called the threat of international sanctions over its disputed nuclear program a "rusty" weapon and repeated Sunday that it would not abandon uranium enrichment.

The six countries at the center of efforts to persuade Iran to drop uranium enrichment — a key step toward making nuclear weapons — said Friday they have agreed to pursue possible sanctions.

However, all five permanent security council members — the U.S., France, Britain, Russia and China — along with Germany stopped short of demanding Iran be punished by the U.N. Security Council.

"Both officials and people in Iran have always viewed threats of sanctions as a rusty and derelict weapon," Foreign Ministry spokesman Mohammad Ali Hosseini said at a weekly news briefing. "They are accustomed to the threats."

However, Hosseini said Iran does not "welcome sanctions" and that they would damage both Iran and the countries that impose them.

Although he reiterated Iran's determination to continue enriching uranium, Hosseini said "negotiation is the best way."

He said Iran will resume negotiations with European nations, talks that are seen as a final attempt to avoid a full-blown confrontation between Tehran and the Security Council. Hosseini did not offer specifics on the talks, such as when they might begin.

In September, European Union envoy Javier Solana and Iranian envoy Ali Larijani ended two days of talks in Berlin with no agreement on the enrichment issue. They insisted, however, that they had made progress on ways to open broader discussions.

Those talks came after Iran ignored an Aug. 31 deadline to suspend uranium enrichment or face punishment.

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad on Sunday told a cabinet meeting: "Some bullying powers, applying intimidation and threats, intend to confront Iran's nuclear rights but our nation has strongly and smartly resisted," according to state television.

Iran Refuses To Halt Enrichment Despite Sanctions Moves (AFP)

By Stuart Williams

AFP, October 9, 2006

Iran flatly refused to suspend uranium enrichment despite moves at the UN Security Council to draft a sanctions resolution against it for failing to halt the sensitive nuclear work.

"The suspension is completely unacceptable and we have rejected it," foreign ministry spokesman Mohammad Ali Hosseini told reporters. "It has no place in Iran's peaceful nuclear programme."

His comments marked an unequivocal refusal from Tehran to back down in the face of pressure to suspend uranium enrichment, a process which the West fears could be diverted towards making nuclear weapons.

"The greatest sanction would be for a generation to deprive its own people and future generations of nuclear technology," he added.

In a meeting late on Friday, representatives of the five UN Security Council permanent members plus Germany agreed to discuss sanctions against Tehran after it failed to suspend sensitive uranium enrichment operations.

Senior US official Nicholas Burns said the so-called "5+1" group would start drafting this week a sanctions resolution, although he admitted finding a consensus on the extent of punitive measures would be difficult.

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad also maintained his defiant stance, brushing off the intensifying moves to impose sanctions against Iran over its nuclear programme.

"The Islamic Republic of Iran is interested in talks and negotiations, and resorting to the language of force and threats will have no results with Iran," official media quoted him as saying.

Ahmadinejad also said in a meeting with his cabinet that Western powers "intend to achieve their aims through intimidation and threats".

"But our people are strong, wise and steadfast, and will not back down on their rightful position," he added, according to the ISNA news agency.

General Yahya Rahim Safavi, head of the Revolutionary Guards, warned that "in this sensitive situation we have to be ready to confront the probable foreign threats," ISNA also reported.

Alaedin Borujerdi, the head of parliament's foreign affairs committee, said any hasty measures by the West would spark "as a consequence a reaction by the parliament and national security council."

However the momentum towards imposing some kind of UN sanctions regime on Tehran appears strong after the London meeting, which gathered US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and top diplomats from the five other countries.

In a statement issued by host Britain, the group agreed to discuss sanctions and lamented Tehran's refusal to suspend uranium enrichment, but insisted that the door remains open to negotiations if Tehran were to back down.

Burns, the US under secretary of state for political affairs, said that work on a new Security Council resolution under Article 41 of the UN charter, which allows for diplomatic and economic sanctions, would start next week.

It remains to be seen what kind of sanctions regime will be acceptable to Russia and China, which have both always insisted on the importance of a diplomatic solution to the crisis.

Hosseini claimed the world powers were split over what action to take against Iran.

"Divisions have even appeared within the UN Security Council. With the policy of Iran's government, these divisions have become more apparent," he said.

Iran's insistence on its right to enrich uranium lies at the heart of the crisis. The process can be used to make nuclear fuel and, in highly extended form, the fissile core of an atomic bomb.

Tehran insists its nuclear programme is solely for peaceful energy needs, vehemently rejecting US allegations that it is seeking to manufacture nuclear weapons.

Rice has said the United States wants a graduated series of sanctions, to be implemented through multiple UN resolutions that would ramp up pressure on Iran if it persists with its nuclear work.

The first set of measures is expected to focus on preventing the supply of material and funding for Iran's nuclear or ballistic missile programmes.

Other steps could include asset freezes and travel bans on officials linked to possible Iranian weapons programmes.

Domino Effect Of N Korean Nuclear Test Will Harden Iran's Resolve (AFP)

By David Millikin

AFP, October 9, 2006

A North Korean nuclear test could set a chain reaction rippling across Asia and to the doorstep of Iran, hardening the Islamic Republic's resolve to develop its own atomic arsenal, analysts warn.

North Korea's threat this week to carry out its first test of a nuclear bomb came just as the major world powers were finally on the verge of imposing timid sanctions against Iran over its far less developed nuclear program.

Foreign ministers from the five permanent UN Security Council members -- Britain, China, France, Russia and the United States -- plus Germany were expected at a meeting in London Friday to set in motion a UN resolution punishing Iran for refusing to suspend its nascent uranium enrichment program.

Iran insists it has the right to enrich uranium for use as fuel for nuclear power stations, but the West fears the fuel could be further enriched to provide material for nuclear weapons -- a development experts say is in any case years away.

The United States is confident a UN vote imposing even limited sanctions will have a powerful symbolic impact on Iran, strengthening the hand of moderates worried about their country's relations with the world and eventually leading Tehran back to the negotiating table.

But if North Korea carries out its threat -- and some predict it may test a bomb as soon as this weekend -- it could negate the impact of any sanctions on Iran and undermine attempts to take harsher steps in future if Tehran persists with its enrichment activities, analysts said.

"Iran is going to be watching the situation with North Korea very closely," said Joseph Cirincione, a foreign policy expert with the Center for American Progress in Washington.

"If North Korea is not deterred or punished, it will embolden Iran to accelerate its own nuclear efforts," he said.

More broadly, he said, a North Korean test would set off an "Asian nuclear chain reaction" that could spur an arms race from South Korea, Taiwan and Japan to India, Pakistan and Iran.

"You could let loose a dynamic that you're not going to be able to stop. The non-proliferation treaty will be in tatters," he said.

Even if North Korea can be dissuaded from going ahead with the test, the diplomatic capital spent on the effort by China and Russia -- the key players in both stand-offs -- could make them more reticent to act against Iran, said George Perkovich, a non-proliferation expert at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace.

"The Chinese are reluctant users of the Security Council and reluctant to be real tough on proliferation, so if you're going to want them to do something on North Korea, it's going to make them even more resistant to doing something on Iran," he said.

If dissuasion fails and North Korea goes ahead with a test, it remains uncertain how far China, and to a lesser extent Russia, are willing to go in shutting off the flow of oil and other goods that prop up their erratic and poverty-stricken neighbor.

"They fear a nuclear North Korea, but they fear an unstable nuclear North Korea even more," said Cirincione, echoing the widely held view that severe sanctions would cause the collapse of Kim Jong-il's regime and send millions of refugees over the country's borders.

Many analysts say the only solution to both crises lies with Washington meeting North Korean and Iranian demands for direct, bilateral negotiations -- a move opposed by hawks in President George W. Bush's administration.

The hardliners, led by Vice President Dick Cheney and Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld, say such a concession would reward "rogue states" for their bad behavior.

Proponents of talks, believed to include Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, point to the success of secret negotiations which led Libya to renounce terrorism and give up its illicit weapons programs three years ago.

The New York Times threw its weight behind negotiations in an editorial Friday, calling on Bush to drop his "ambivalence over whether to negotiate with Kim Jong-il or try to overthrow him" and engage in "real diplomacy to get the north out of the nuclear weapons business".

There have been calls for Rice or her top aides to make an emergency trip to northeast Asia for talks aimed at forestalling a test by North Korea, but her spokesman said Friday there were no immediate plans for such travel.

Iran Arrests Outspoken Cleric Who Opposes Religious Rule (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi

The New York Times, October 9, 2006

TEHRAN, Oct. 8 — A senior cleric who opposes religious rule of Iran and a number of his followers were arrested Sunday after clashes with the riot police over the weekend, news agencies reported.

DOJ_NMG_0076912

About 1,000 supporters of the cleric, Ayatollah Mohammad Kazemeni Boroujerdi, gathered outside his home and on the streets leading to it on Saturday, the semiofficial ILNA news agency reported. They were there apparently to protect him from arrest and to protest the arrests over the past month of other supporters who had tried to protect him after a court had summoned him.

Another news agency, Entekhab, also reported that Ayatollah Boroujerdi and some supporters had been arrested. News reports quoted officials as saying that members of the crowd came armed with knives and daggers, and the reports said the riot police used tear gas to disperse them.

Ayatollah Boroujerdi said that he had written to the United Nations secretary general, Kofi Annan, to the European Union foreign policy chief, Javier Solana, and to Pope Benedict XVI and others seeking protection and asking them "to make efforts to spread traditional religion," separate from politics, ILNA reported.

"I believe people are fed up with political religion and want traditional religion to return," ILNA quoted Ayatollah Boroujerdi as saying.

Protesters who were interviewed on opposition radio and satellite television channels Saturday said that the supporters of Ayatollah Boroujerdi were prepared to die in his defense.

The Iranian authorities are wary of any challenge, particularly from top clerics, to the system of clerical rule that was established after the 1979 Islamic revolution by the revolutionary leader, Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini.

Iran has an elected president and Parliament, but final authority lies with the supreme leader, currently Ayatollah Ali Khamenei.

Iranian authorities had charged Ayatollah Boroujerdi with lacking sufficiently senior religious credentials to speak out on the matter. They also accused him of sacrilege.

He had been summoned over a month ago to the Special Court for the Clergy, but refused to surrender.

Haniyeh: Hamas Won't Recognize Israel (AP-Y)

By Sarah El Deeb, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 9, 2006

Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh said Sunday his Hamas-led government will not recognize Israel and has problems with a widely touted Arab peace plan because it does.

International assistance to the Palestinians has dried up because the militant Hamas movement will not recognize Israel and renounce violence.

But Haniyeh repeated the Islamic militant group's hardline principle the despite the crippling Western sanctions which have bankrupted his government, led to strikes and demonstrations by public service workers and clashes between Hamas forces and police identified with the rival Fatah.

Haniyeh, addressing an "Iftar" feast at the end of a day of Ramadan fasting, said Hamas and the government "will not recognize or normalize" relations with Israel.

He also said the main problem with the Arab peace plan, presented in 2002 by Saudi Arabia and endorsed by an Arab summit, is that it recognizes Israel in exchange for an Israeli pullout from the West Bank, Gaza Strip, east Jerusalem and Golan Heights.

Haniyeh said he still hopes for a unity government with Fatah. But Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, who heads Fatah, said last week that negotiations have broken down. Abbas was expected to travel from the West Bank to Gaza Monday and may present Hamas a deadline for agreeing to a unity government. Otherwise, aides say, Abbas might call a new election.

Haniyeh hinted that peacemaking with Israel could be left up to Abbas. Haniyeh said the unity concept "leaves a lot of room for political maneuvering" for Abbas.

The U.S. has made it clear that the option of a Hamas-led government maintaining its militant policy while Abbas conducts peace talks is unacceptable.

DOJ_NMG_0076913

The United States and Europe have insisted that any Palestinian government must accept three basic conditions before the West resumes its aid: recognition of Israel, renunciation of violence and acceptance of previous Israeli-Palestinian peace deals.

Jordan's foreign minister warned Sunday that Palestinians face "a humanitarian tragedy" unless peacemaking with Israel resumes quickly.

"It is absolutely necessary to consolidate international efforts to provide assistance to the needy Palestinian people," Abdul-Ilah al-Khatib told visiting U.N. Mideast envoy Alvaro De Soto in Amman, the Jordanian capital.

Israeli Vice Premier Shimon Peres advised patience.

"In the end, (Palestinian) people will be disappointed" with Hamas' inability to govern and turn it out of office. "Hamas let people down" by its inability to pay its workers, Peres told Israel's Channel 10 TV.

The deteriorating financial situation and the political infighting spilled over into violence last week, killing 11 people in Gaza. Addressing 300 religious and political leaders in Gaza at a "unity and reconciliation" feast on Sunday, Haniyeh appealed for calm.

"We may criticize each other, raise our voices," he said. "However, it is certainly our concern and religious and moral commitment that matters don't come down to conflict, infighting and civil war."

The West imposed its aid cutoff in March, when Hamas formed a government after sweeping Fatah out of office in a parliamentary election. Since then, the government — the main Palestinian employer — has paid out little money to its 165,000 workers.

Angry workers threatened Sunday to widen their protests, paralyzing the West Bank and Gaza Strip by bringing employees of the petroleum authority into their strike and drying up local fuel supplies if the government does not pay them.

"In our hands are cards that have not been used yet," said Ahmad Assaf, a spokesman for the Union of Civil Servants.

In violence Sunday, two Palestinians were killed in the West Bank. Palestinian gunmen ambushed Israeli forces in a refugee camp next to Nablus, and a militant was killed, Palestinian security and the military said.

In the afternoon, a Palestinian man was shot and killed on his way to break the Ramadan fast with family, relatives said. Israeli media said he was circumventing an Israeli checkpoint. The army said it was unaware of any shooting incident in the area and its forces had not opened fire.

Qatar Emerges As A Mediator Between Fatah And Hamas (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, October 10, 2006

JERUSALEM, Oct. 9 — Qatar, which has not traditionally played a major role in Palestinian affairs, tried Monday to revive stalled negotiations on a national unity government between the feuding Palestinian factions, Fatah and Hamas.

In Gaza City on Monday night, Qatar's foreign minister, Sheik Hamad bin Jassim al-Thani, shuttled between the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, of Fatah, and Prime Minister Ismail Haniya, of Hamas.

The Qatari diplomat was seeking to bring the Palestinian leaders back into face-to-face negotiations that fell apart after a tentative agreement was reached last month to form a united government.

Until last week, Egypt was the main Arab mediator in the bitter rivalry between Hamas and Fatah. The feud erupted into deadly street battles in Gaza on Oct. 1 and 2.

At about the same time, Qatar's role began to emerge when Mr. Abbas and the exiled Hamas political leader, Khaled Meshal, both turned up in the tiny gulf state. While there was no indication that the two Palestinians met, both reportedly held talks with Qatari officials, including the foreign minister, who presented a six-point plan for the Palestinian unity government.

Last week's talks did not appear to yield progress. When Mr. Abbas returned to his headquarters in the West Bank city of Ramallah, he said that negotiations with Hamas had collapsed and that he was prepared to use his presidential powers to dismiss the government.

But Mr. Abbas traveled to Gaza, the Hamas stronghold, and met for 90 minutes on Monday night with Sheik Hamad. Immediately afterward, he met Mr. Haniya nearby.

"Nothing has failed," Mr. Abbas said in brief comments to reporters after his meeting. "God willing, it will all be resolved."

Since assuming power in the spring, the Hamas government has barely functioned. Western countries cut off assistance, Israel has arrested dozens of Hamas legislators and cabinet ministers, and unpaid Palestinian government workers have gone on strike.

A unity government would seek a restoration of Western aid and could help end, or at least reduce, the Palestinian infighting. But the factions have been unable to agree on several core issues, including a formal recognition of Israel, which Fatah accepts and Hamas rejects.

Qatar's plan, as reported in the Palestinian media, calls for a two-state solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, which could be viewed as an implicit recognition of Israel.

It also calls for a prime minister who is not directly connected to either Hamas or Fatah. Hamas has said it will not be pushed out of positions it holds based on its victories in the January elections.

While Qatar has not been a major player in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, it has maintained contacts with both sides and has sought a more prominent role, said Mkhaimar Abusada, a political science professor at Al Azhar University in Gaza City.

Qatar established low-level ties with Israel, and it also allowed Hamas leaders to live within its borders for a time when Jordan forced them to leave years ago, Mr. Abusada noted. "Qatar has long wanted to play this role as mediator," he said.

Meanwhile, in violence on Monday, a 15-year-old Palestinian boy, Mahmoud Nasser, was killed and four more Palestinians were wounded by an Israeli artillery strike in northern Gaza, Palestinian medical workers and the Israeli military said.

The military said that it launched artillery at a Palestinian who was retrieving a rocket launcher that had been used Saturday to fire into southern Israel. The militants fled after firing the rocket, leaving the launcher behind.

Palestinian medical workers said the youth had apparently been working in a farming field and approached the launcher. Mahmoud's father, Jamal Nasser, 50, was one of those wounded, the Palestinians said.

Near the West Bank city of Nablus, an Israeli soldier shot dead a Palestinian man who pulled a knife at a military checkpoint and tried to stab another soldier, the military said.

Danish Web Videos On Muhammad Taken Down (WP/AP)

By Jan M. Olsen

The Washington Post, October 10, 2006

COPENHAGEN, Oct. 9 -- Videos showing anti-immigrant party members mocking the prophet Muhammad were pulled from Web sites Monday as two youths seen in the clips were reported in hiding and the Foreign Ministry warned Danes against traveling in the Middle East.

Muslim clerics from Egypt and Indonesia condemned the video broadcast in Denmark last week showing members of the Danish People's Party youth wing with cartoons of a camel wearing the head of Muhammad and beer cans for humps. A second drawing placed a turbaned, bearded man next to a plus sign and a bomb, all equaling a mushroom cloud.

In a move aimed at defusing tension, the Danish Foreign Ministry invited ambassadors from Muslim countries to discuss the video Monday. It was unclear how many diplomats took part in the meeting or which countries they represented.

Prime Minister Anders Fogh Rasmussen condemned the youths in the video Sunday, saying that "their tasteless behavior does in no way represent the way the Danish people or young Danish people view Muslims or Islam."

Citing critical media reports from many Muslim regions, the Foreign Ministry cautioned against travel to the Gaza Strip, the West Bank, Saudi Arabia, Lebanon, Jordan, Egypt, Iraq, Iran, Syria and Turkey.

The video was produced by an artists' group, Defending Denmark. In a message posted along with the video, the group said it had infiltrated the Danish People's Party Youth for 18 months "to document [their] extreme right-wing associations."

"This is not an example of something that is meant to provoke. This is an example to show how things are in Danish politics," artist Martin Rosengaard Knudsen told Danish public radio.

In Jordan on Monday, a powerful umbrella group for about 200,000 professionals including engineers, doctors and journalists called on Muslims to sever relations with Denmark, saying the video "reveals hatred toward the Prophet who came to the world with a message to enlighten the people."

DOJ_NMG_0076915

Hard-line Muslims and leftists in these professional associations have repeatedly called on the government to abolish a 1994 peace treaty with Israel.

The episode comes in the aftermath of an outcry across the Muslim world over the September 2005 printing in a Danish newspaper of 12 cartoons portraying Muhammad. For most Muslims, any artistic rendition of Muhammad is taboo.

Venezuela Has Deficit As Chávez's Spending Outpaces Oil Gains (WSJ)

By Raul Gallegos

The Wall Street Journal, October 10, 2006

CARACAS, Venezuela -- Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez's spending has exceeded his government's gains from oil sales this year, resulting in a deficit that many believe will grow in coming months. The Andean country's accumulated deficit stood at 4.9 trillion bolivars ($2.28 billion) at the end of July, according to the latest central-bank figures.

Venezuela's oil industry accounts for about one-third of gross domestic product and one-half of government revenue. "We expect to see a deficit of $7.7 billion this year," or 4.3% of gross domestic product, said Andreas Faust, an economist at Banco Mercantil in Caracas.

Mr. Chávez has continued to fund popular social programs that include free health care, education and subsidized food, as he seeks another six-year term in office in December elections. He has raised salaries of state workers, continues to fund state enterprises and gives soft loans to favored industries. Many analysts expect total spending to surpass 120 trillion bolivars or almost 40% of GDP by year's end.

State spending has pushed up prices for goods and services, resulting in 12.5% inflation as of September.

The Venezuelan economy grew 9.6% during the first half of the year. Central bank officials expect the year to end with economic growth of 7% to 8%.

Most economists agree the Chávez administration has enough money to fend off fiscal trouble for at least 18 months in the unlikely case that prices for Venezuela's heavy crude basket fall significantly. Mr. Chávez has set aside an estimated $47 billion in discretionary funds.

Briefly: LA PAZ, Bolivia -- Bolivian Vice President Álvaro García Linera said he is confident his government and foreign energy companies can agree on new gas contracts before a Nov. 1 deadline. The "nationalization" decree signed by President Evo Morales on May 1 called for the transfer of a 51% ownership stake in all energy projects to a state-owned energy company, and said if new contracts aren't signed with six months, the companies -- including Brazil's Petrobras, France's Total SA and Spanish-Argentine Repsol-YPF -- would lose their concessions.

Arab League Nations Offer Peacekeeping Troops For Darfur (WP/AP)

Associated Press

The Washington Post, October 9, 2006

CAIRO, Oct. 8 -- Arab countries have launched a new effort to push Sudan toward a compromise over U.N. peacekeepers for Darfur, offering to dispatch a force of Arab and Muslim troops to the troubled region, diplomats said Sunday.

The Arab League diplomats said Sudan's president rejected the initial proposal -- as he has all suggestions for a U.N.-affiliated contingent, regardless of the makeup -- but promised to suggest an alternative soon, in a sign that the Arab effort might show more promise than other attempts to stop the humanitarian crisis.

"The situation is deteriorating and needs intervention," said Hesham Youssef, a top aide to the league's secretary general, Amr Moussa.

Youssef said the Arab negotiators believed that the world community and the United States should be flexible.

"The Americans should realize that there should be a compromise," he said.

The new push could be a significant step in the stalled effort to reach a compromise over Sudan's rejection of a U.N. Security Council resolution that would let the United Nations take control of and significantly expand a peacekeeping force in the western Darfur region, run so far by the African Union.

The two sides are still far apart, however. And it was unclear how much leverage the Arab countries -- close neighbors and supporters of Sudan's Arab-dominated government -- have or how strongly they intended to press the proposal.

The United States has asked its moderate Arab allies such as Egypt to take a greater role on Darfur, with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice making it a key mission of her Mideast trip last week.

The violence began in 2003, when the Sudanese government, backed by a local Arab militia called the Janjaweed, mounted a bloody military campaign against civilians suspected of supporting Darfur rebel groups. War and disease have left as many as 450,000 people dead, and 2 million have been displaced.

Fears that the tensions could spread were highlighted this weekend when Sudanese soldiers crossed the border into eastern Chad to fight a group of Darfur rebels, leaving more than 300 people injured, an aid worker said Sunday, speaking on condition of anonymity because he was not allowed to divulge information to the news media.

Chadian government spokesman Hourmadji Moussa Doumgor said he had no information about the battle.

Some analysts have said they believe Arab countries will be loath to press their proposal too hard unless the United States makes progress on other issues important to them, such as Israeli-Arab peace efforts.

Another possible negotiator, China, is believed to have strong leverage with Sudan because it is Sudan's main oil partner. But China so far has indicated it believes Sudan has the right to keep the peacekeepers out.

African-Arab nations such as Algeria, Egypt and Mauritania already have small contingents operating in Darfur with the African Union peacekeepers.

Ruling Belgium Coalition Takes Hit (AP-Y)

By Constant Brand, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 9, 2006

Early results showed the party of Belgium's prime minister giving ground to a far-right, anti-immigrant party in bellwether local elections Sunday, less than a year before national elections are expected.

Prime Minister Guy Verhofstadt sought to put a brave face on the losses of his Liberal Democrats.

"The average trend of the Flemish Liberal Democrats is not so good," Verhofstadt said. "We must acknowledge that the government has had a few bad months and we know that whoever leads faces the most fire."

The biggest winners in Sunday's vote were the right-wing Flemish Interest party and the Christian Democrats.

"We have gone so far ahead. ... We have won spectacularly. We are the winners of this election," said Flemish Interest party Chairman Frank Vanhecke. The party made big gains in almost all the 308 municipal councils across the region of Flanders.

The party attributes its success to efforts to tap into concerns about a perceived rise in crime, degradation of inner-city neighborhoods and an increase in asylum seekers and illegal immigrants.

It expanded well beyond its traditional support base of Antwerp to win the most votes in seven municipalities outside of that city. It was another major victory for a party that has been scorned by the country's political class.

Flemish Interest, which ran on an anti-immigrant platform, has been kept in opposition in Antwerp by an unlikely coalition whose only common cause is keeping the city out of the hands of the far right.

That scenario is likely to be repeated in other areas after Sunday's election. Despite its strong showing overall, the party is unlikely to take part in governing, even in municipalities where it now has the largest number of seats on the city council.

Early results also showed losses for Verhofstadt's Socialist coalition partners in the southern Wallonia region and in the capital region of Brussels.

Verhofstadt had hoped to stem major losses before national elections expected in either May or June and to keep in place his fragile coalition for a run at a third term in office.

Danish Tape Galls Muslims (NYT)

The New York Times, October 9, 2006

FRANKFURT, Oct. 8 — Danish state television broadcast videotape on Friday showing young members of the right-wing Danish People's Party engaged in a competition to draw humiliating cartoons of the Prophet Muhammad.

The images were videotaped in August by an artist who posed as a member of the party to document attitudes among young members.

DOJ_NMG_0076917

Muslim leaders in Denmark condemned the video but said they would not be goaded into taking action. Last fall a Danish daily published derogatory cartoons of Muhammad that prompted protests.

Vietnam Trade Plan Upsets Some Retailers (USAT)

By David J. Lynch, Usa Today

USA Today, October 9, 2006

Officials want bill passed before Bush trip to Hanoi

WASHINGTON — An unusual Bush administration maneuver designed to pave the way for congressional approval of normalizing trade relations with Vietnam has triggered an uproar among major retailers.

The administration's dealmaking has imperiled prospects for expanded trade with Vietnam and invited a host of trade-affected industries to seek their own special deals, the retailers say. "We're pretty upset," says Eric Autor, vice president of the National Retail Federation.

The administration wants the Vietnam trade bill passed before President Bush journeys to Hanoi for the Nov. 18 opening of the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation (APEC) summit. But Sens. Elizabeth Dole, R-N.C., and Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., had blocked a vote, fearing the impact of low-cost Vietnamese clothing on Carolina mills.

In response, trade officials offered unique protections for the textile industry, including a twice-yearly Commerce Department review of "whether there is sufficient evidence to initiate an anti-dumping investigation of any textile or apparel goods from Vietnam," said a Sept. 28 letter signed by Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez and Susan Schwab, the U.S. Trade Representative.

The letter also said any anti-dumping penalties could be applied "retroactively" to retailers such as Target, Liz Claiborne and The Gap, effectively encouraging them to buy from countries such as Cambodia or Bangladesh rather than Vietnam. If Vietnam exports sag, their ability to buy more U.S. products will be in doubt, Autor says.

Textile industry supporters insist they need new defenses. "Vietnam has a state-owned and state-subsidized textile and apparel sector. They can underprice not only our goods, but those of every other country in the world," says Cass Johnson, president of the National Council of Textile Organizations.

The industry, which blames foreign competition for the loss of 179,000 textile jobs in the past five years, worries that Vietnam will take clothing orders from Central American garment makers who use U.S. yarns and fabrics.

Under anti-dumping law, industries claiming damage from unfairly priced imports must petition the government for an investigation. But they can only complain about foreign makers of the same products they make. So North Carolina's fabric mills can't complain about Vietnamese clothing shipments.

The government has the authority to start investigations on its own, but rarely does. The last case, against Canadian softwood lumber shipments, was in 1991, the Commerce Department says.

Susan Esserman, who administered U.S. anti-dumping law as an assistant secretary of Commerce in the Clinton administration, says the new textile deal "is a very unusual move. It would create uncertainty and risk, and have a chilling effect on trade."

But Esserman, now a partner at Steptoe & Johnson, a Washington law firm, says anti-dumping investigations of Vietnamese shipments won't automatically mushroom. And Stephen Norton, a spokesman for the U.S. Trade Representative's office, rejected the idea that other industries might win similar protection.

"Our commitment is … specific to Vietnam and specific to this case," he said.

Johnson, however, says textile makers may seek similar protection against Chinese imports when current safeguard measures expire Jan. 1, 2009.

US Think-tank To Launch China Policy Centre (FT)

By Edward Luce In Washington

Financial Times, October 9, 2006

The Brookings Institution, one of the US's oldest think-tanks, will this week launch a China policy centre in Washington and Beijing.

DOJ_NMG_0076918

It will be funded by John Thornton, former chairman of Goldman Sachs who quit the investment bank in 2003 to teach at Tsinghua University in Beijing. He has committed $2.5m (€2m, £1.3m) a year for the next five years.

Brookings says the initiative – the first time it has launched a centre devoted to one country and its first centre outside the US – is aimed at improving the US's understanding of what is seen as the world's foremost emerging power.

"China's rise is the most important geopolitical event of our lifetime," said Mr Thornton during an interview.

"American policymakers need to acquire a much more sophisticated understanding of what is happening in China domestically and why – a grasp that is often lacking in Washington."

Strobe Talbott – the head of Brookings, who was deputy secretary of state during the Clinton administration – said that it would scrutinise China's growing diplomatic, economic and military power and analyse questions such as the impact of China on global warming.

"It is clear we are living in a post-Kyoto [the climate change agreement] world," said Mr Talbott.

"One of the most pressing questions is how and whether China will become part of the solution to the crunch between its energy needs and global warming. What we need is a Shanghai protocol on climate change."

Mr Talbott said the other two pressing questions about China were how it would manage its political system as it opened up to the world, and what impact China's rise would have on international institutions such as the United Nations and the World Trade Organisation.

Brookings is also planning a centre dedicated to India, the world's other emerging economic superpower.

"The triangular relationship between the US, China and India will shape the world in the coming decades," Mr Talbott said.

He said the evolution in the Bush administration's stance – from branding China a "strategic competitor" in 2001, to calling on it to become a "responsible stakeholder" – was positive.

"China talks of its own 'peaceful rise'," he said. "It is important America engages with China in a way that assists that process."

But the US should be wary of exaggerating China's military clout and painting it into a corner on other disputes, such as its currency overvaluation and growing trade surplus with the US, he said.

Mr Thornton said the approach of Hank Paulson, the US treasury secretary and a former colleague of his at Goldman Sachs, who visited China last month, set a benchmark for how US officials should interact with their Chinese counterparts.

China's Iron Grip (WP)

By Fred Hiatt

The Washington Post, October 9, 2006

It's no secret that China in recent years has stepped up its repression of political, religious and journalistic freedoms, to only the mousiest of objections from the outside world.

Less well known is that China feels so unconstrained that it is brazenly harassing dissidents in the suburbs of Washington, D.C., too.

Just ask Rebiya Kadeer, who now lives in Fairfax County. In April, Kadeer's grandson noticed four men videotaping and photographing the family's ground-floor apartment from a car parked outside. He called to his mother, who wrote down their license plate number. Kadeer passed that on to Rep. Frank Wolf (R-Va.), who enlisted the FBI, which determined that three of the four men in the rented car were Chinese agents.

Of course, surveillance and intimidation are the least of what China's regime has inflicted on Kadeer. She was the victim of a mysterious hit-and-run accident in January; her children back home in China have been beaten and jailed; she herself spent nearly six years in prison.

Which leads to the question: Why would this 60-year-old grandmother with a sparkling smile arouse such fear and hatred in the powerful Communist rulers of Beijing? And what does that tell us about the nature of the regime that will be hosting the Olympics in less than two years?

These questions have come to the fore because Rebiya Kadeer has been nominated for the Nobel Peace Prize, the winner of which will be announced this week. Of course scores of people are nominated every year, but the talk alone has so infuriated Chinese officials that they have taken to threatening Norwegian officials with grave consequences if Kadeer should win.

So who is she? Former laundress, self-made businesswoman, mother of 11, member of the Turkic minority known as Uighurs who live in far western China. In the 1990s, China's regime elevated her to the national parliament, where she behaved as though China's virtuous laws on ethnic rights and autonomy were meant to be enforced.

She found out otherwise, and in 1999 was imprisoned for providing "state secrets" to foreigners. The "secrets" were newspaper clippings. Last year she was freed early from her eight-year sentence and exiled to the United States on the condition that she keep quiet.

"I nodded my head, for fear they would not let me go," she told me in an interview last week. "I had no choice. But after I came out, I couldn't not speak out for my people."

Her people consist of about 9 million Uighurs in China and 2 million or so elsewhere, mostly in Central Asia. Like the Tibetans, they have been subjected to decades of grinding repression that has left them, as a group, "nearly in a comatose state," Kadeer said. Forced abortions; children taken away to be raised in what she calls "mainland China"; history falsified; native language disfavored; jobs and natural resources delivered to ethnic Chinese -- the story is familiar.

Repression intensified in 1997, Kadeer says, when the Chinese government felt that its rising power allowed it to stop even pretending about autonomy. It worsened again after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. The Uighurs are Muslim, and among them are a few violent separatists; the Chinese took advantage of the "war on terror" to imprison thousands of peaceful Uighurs as terrorists.

Kadeer has now been similarly labeled, though an official dispatch in June gave away the real Chinese objection. Kadeer "promised not to take part in any activities endangering the security of the People's Republic of China," the dispatch complained, but "immediately upon arriving overseas she shed her pretense" and became active with pro-democracy forces. Kadeer, in other words, is a threat because she is an effective, engaging spokeswoman for her cause.

Ten years ago, when Kadeer still had hope for the Chinese system, so did American officials: engagement, trade and rising prosperity would lead to openness and political freedom, or so the theory went.

Instead, as a rare open letter to President Hu Jintao from 54 China experts around the world noted on Sept. 29, there has been a "sharp increase in official retaliation" against human rights advocates and their families "through persistent harassment, banishment, detention, arrest, and imprisonment."

Even in Fairfax County.

Putin Promises Probe Of Journalist's Slaying (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, October 10, 2006

MOSCOW, Oct. 9 -- President Vladimir Putin pledged to President Bush on Monday that authorities would do everything they could to find the killers of an investigative journalist who was a fierce critic of Kremlin policy toward Chechnya.

In a phone conversation, Putin said that "all necessary efforts will be made for an objective investigation into the tragic death" of Anna Politkovskaya, gunned down in an apparent contract killing Saturday.

Putin's remarks were his first on the slaying of the 48-year-old award-winning reporter who uncovered abuses of civilians in Chechnya.

Her newspaper has offered a reward of nearly $1 million for information that would help solve the crime, which provoked worldwide condemnation.

Colleagues said she had been working on a story about torture and abductions in the war-ravaged province -- abuses she blamed on the Moscow-backed prime minister, Ramzan Kadyrov. "I dream of seeing him tried," she said in an interview days before her death.

Moscow Rally Memorializes Slain Reporter (WP)

By Peter Finn, Washington Post Foreign Service

MOSCOW, Oct. 8 -- Hundreds of Russians attended a rally in Moscow on Sunday to commemorate Anna Politkovskaya, a veteran journalist who was fatally shot in an apparent contract killing Saturday, and the country's top law enforcement official said he was taking personal charge of the investigation because of its "particular importance and its wide resonance within society."

"The investigation will focus on possible links between the killing and Politkovskaya's work," said Marina Gridneva, a spokeswoman for the prosecutor general, Yuri Chaika, who is now heading the probe into the journalist's death.

The killing of Politkovskaya, a fierce critic of the Kremlin and its proxies in the conflict in Chechnya, was the second assassination of a crusading figure in Moscow in less than a month. In September, Andrei Kozlov, a Central Bank official who had led a campaign against corruption, was gunned down as he left a soccer match in the city. That case remains unsolved.

The two killings challenge the notion that President Vladimir Putin has eradicated the vicious score-settling that marked Russian society in the 1990s or that his centralization of power has fostered stability. The killings also raise questions about whether it is safe for journalists, bureaucrats or opposition activists to challenge the country's vested interests, whether public or private.

"The murder is a diagnosis for this society," Igor Yakovenko, head of the Russian Union of Journalists, said of Politkovskaya's death. "But our society is unconscious."

The Kremlin has issued no statements about the killing. Putin on Sunday held a government meeting that usually results in statements on any number of issues.

Politkovskaya, 48, was shot in the chest and head Saturday afternoon in the lobby of her apartment building in Moscow. The gunman threw the weapon at her feet, the signature of an assassin. Police say a surveillance camera just outside the building captured an image of a suspect, a young man who was wearing dark clothes and a baseball cap.

The killing of Politkovskaya, whose work had long focused on human rights abuses by Russian forces and their Chechen allies through two wars in Chechnya, generated a wave of domestic and international revulsion and calls for the Russian authorities to solve the crime -- something that signally failed to happen after the killings of other journalists here.

Politkovskaya, who worked for the Novaya Gazeta newspaper, was the 13th journalist killed since Putin came to power in 2000. She was the third Novaya Gazeta journalist slain in the past 15 years, according to the paper's deputy editor, Vitaly Yaroshevsky.

Politkovskaya had received numerous death threats in the past and at one point fled to Vienna after credible evidence of a plot against her surfaced. In her reporting in Chechnya, she braved the hostility of Russian officers, who feared and loathed her. In 2000, she was detained, beaten and subjected to a mock execution by her military captors. Last year, her daughter, one of two adult children, was nearly forced into oncoming traffic while driving Politkovskaya's car, which was then smashed by unknown assailants.

"It is extremely important to break the circle of inconclusive investigations . . . of the recent murders of journalists in Russia," Miklos Haraszti, a representative on media freedom for the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, said in a statement. "The violent death of any member of the media stifles the free spirit of journalism. But in this case, the expediency of action is extremely important also because Anna Politkovskaya was an outspoken critic of government policies."

"It's amazing that we haven't heard a single word from Putin," said Vladimir Korsunsky, editor of the news site Grani.ru, who attended a roundtable discussion about the killing with other prominent journalists Sunday evening. The group called for a national day of mourning on Tuesday.

According to Novaya Gazeta, Politkovskaya was about to publish an exposÃ© of torture and kidnappings by forces allied with Chechnya's prime minister, Ramzan Kadyrov, a frequent subject of her work.

"We never got the article, but she had evidence . . . and there were photographs," Yaroshevsky told Echo Moscow radio.

Kadyrov told the Russian news agency Interfax that he was "deeply aggrieved to hear the news of Politkovskaya's murder. I was shocked by this bloody terror act."

But he added, "One cannot speak about any 'Chechen trail' based only on assumptions."

One of Novaya Gazeta's co-owners, Russian billionaire Alexander Lebedev, said he was offering a nearly $1 million reward for information leading to the capture of those who ordered and carried out the killing. Former Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev also owns a minority stake in the newspaper.

DOJ_NMG_0076921

The rally in Moscow on Sunday was originally organized to call attention to the plight of Georgians living in the city who have been harassed by authorities because of heightened tension between Russia and Georgia, according to human rights activists. But the Georgian focus of the event was overshadowed by Politkovskaya's death.

"Judging by the gathering today, there are people who are willing to do something," Georgy Satarov, head of the Indem Foundation, a nongovernmental organization that monitors corruption, said after speaking at the rally. "But there are not enough people to change the situation."

Slaying Of Russian Reporter Jolts Nation (WT)

By Michael Mainville, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 9, 2006

MOSCOW -- The slaying of investigative journalist Anna Politkovskaya sent shock waves across Russia yesterday and raised fresh doubts about press freedoms under President Vladimir Putin.

Russian Prosecutor General Yuri Chaika took personal charge of the investigation into her shooting death Saturday at her Moscow apartment, citing the case's "particular importance and its wide resonance within society."

Press reports said police were focusing on footage from a security camera in the lobby of her apartment building that showed the suspected killer, a tall young man wearing dark clothing and a black baseball cap.

A 48-year-old mother of two, Mrs. Politkovskaya was the 13th reporter to die in a contract-style killing since Mr. Putin came to power, according to the Committee to Protect Journalists. Most have gone unsolved.

Mrs. Politkovskaya had gained recognition at home and abroad for her relentless reporting of human rights abuses in Russia, particularly in Chechnya. She was one of the few remaining journalists in Russia willing to report on abuses in the southern province and openly criticize Mr. Putin.

She had been repeatedly threatened and had fled to Vienna, Austria, in 2001, before returning to Moscow after several months. She was convinced that she had been poisoned on a flight to cover the 2004 school siege in Beslan, in which more than 330 people died when troops stormed a school held by Chechen rebels.

Mrs. Politkovskaya had said she fell unconscious after drinking a cup of tea during the flight and woke up in intensive care.

Her colleagues in Russia said they have no doubt Mrs. Politkovskaya's killing was connected with her work.

"There can be no other reason she died [than] because of her duties as a journalist. This was a politically motivated killing," said Vitaly Yaroshevsky, a deputy editor at Mrs. Politkovskaya's newspaper, Novaya Gazeta.

Mr. Yaroshevsky said that in the days before her death, Mrs. Politkovskaya had been working on a story documenting new cases of kidnapping and torture in Chechnya. It was to be published today.

In a radio interview on Thursday, Mrs. Politkovskaya hinted at the explosive nature of her story, saying she would be appearing as a witness in an abduction and torture case directly implicating the Kremlin-backed prime minister of Chechnya, Ramzan Kadyrov.

Human rights groups have repeatedly accused Mr. Kadyrov's forces in Chechnya of widespread abuses, but Mr. Kadyrov has always denied any personal involvement in torture. In the interview, she called him the "Stalin of our times" and a "heavily armed coward."

Her killing came two days after Mr. Kadyrov's 30th birthday, prompting some speculation that the assassination was served up as a present. Saturday was also Mr. Putin's birthday.

Hundreds of people gathered in central Moscow yesterday to pay tribute to Mrs. Politkovskaya and denounce attacks on the press. "The Kremlin has killed freedom of speech," read one poster at the gathering.

Born in New York, where her parents were Soviet diplomats at the United Nations, Mrs. Politkovskaya began her journalism career at the newspaper Izvestia and started covering Chechnya for Novaya Gazeta in 1999.

Elegant, with large reading glasses and gray hair, Mrs. Politkovskaya hardly fit the picture of a war correspondent. Yet her detailed and harrowing accounts of killings, torture and beatings of civilians by Russian servicemen in Chechnya were considered some of the finest reporting from the region.

"My notes are written for the future. They are the testimony of the innocent victims of the new Chechen war, which is why I record all the detail I can," she wrote in her 2003 book "A Dirty War: A Russian Reporter in Chechnya."

In 2004, she published "Putin's Russia" -- a highly critical political biography that accused Mr. Putin of failing to shake off his past as a KGB agent. "He persists in crushing liberty just as he did earlier in his career," she wrote in the book's introduction.

In a postscript written in July 2004, she said the killing a day earlier of Paul Klebnikov, the American-born editor of the Russian edition of Forbes, reflected the worst of what Russia had become under Mr. Putin.

"Yes, stability has come to Russia. It is a monstrous stability [in which] nobody in his or her right mind seeks protection from the institutions entrusted with maintaining law and order, because they are totally corrupt.

"Lynch law is the order of the day, both in people's minds and their actions. An eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth."

No Suspects In Russian Journalist's Slaying (WSJ)

By Guy Chazan

The Wall Street Journal, October 9, 2006

MOSCOW -- The killing of investigative reporter Anna Politkovskaya has underscored Russia's status as one of the deadliest places in the world for independent journalists and highlights the dangers facing Russians who seek to expose abuses of state power.

Ms. Politkovskaya, whose reporting on Russian atrocities in Chechnya won her numerous international awards but also made her a host of enemies, was shot dead in the elevator of her Moscow apartment block Saturday afternoon. Investigators said the contract-style killing appeared to be linked to her work as a journalist, but they haven't identified any suspects.

Ms. Politkovskaya's reporting had in recent years featured hard-hitting criticism of the pro-Russian authorities in Chechnya. Colleagues at her newspaper, Novaya Gazeta, said she had been working on an article for today's edition claiming torture of Chechen civilians by security forces loyal to the region's pro-Moscow prime minister, Ramzan Kadyrov.

Although no one has been charged, Ms. Politkovskaya's death has cemented Moscow's reputation as a world capital of high-profile, politically tinged murders, few of which have been solved. Journalists have often been targeted: Two years ago the American reporter Paul Klebnikov, editor of the Russian edition of Forbes, was shot dead in downtown Moscow. Senior officials also aren't immune. Last month, Andrei Kozlov, a central banker who led a crusade to clean up Russia's crime-infested banking sector, was gunned down outside a Moscow sports stadium.

Such assassinations have persisted in Russia despite President Vladimir Putin's pledge to institute a "dictatorship of law." Although his crackdown on the opposition has ensured a measure of political stability, crime and corruption have eroded popular confidence in the state.

Ms. Politkovskaya's killing could have a chilling effect on a journalistic community already cowed by Mr. Putin's crackdown on the independent press. "Anna's murder was political," said Liudmila Alekseyeva, one of Russia's best-known human-rights campaigners and head of the Moscow Helsinki Group. "She wrote about the crimes of the state...and the only way the state could silence her was by killing her."

Ms. Politkovskaya's slaying "is a terrible murder, and it is being dealt with at the highest level," said Dmitry Peskov, a spokesman for Mr. Putin. "Police and investigators will spare no effort to find those responsible."

In Washington, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said the U.S. was "shocked and profoundly saddened" by the murder and urged an immediate and thorough investigation to bring her killers to justice.

Some observers expressed skepticism that the perpetrators would be found. Few of the 12 murders of reporters in the past six years have been solved. "Russia is one of the most murderous places in the world for journalists, and it has a long history of impunity in these killings," said Joel Simon, executive director of the New York group Committee to Protect Journalists.

A mother of two grown children, Ms. Politkovskaya, 48, worked for Novaya Gazeta, a muckraking weekly publication partly owned by former Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev. She joined in 1999, just before Russia sent troops into the southern region of Chechnya to crush a separatist revolt, and quickly made a name for herself with her dramatic reports from the war zone.

She was one of the only Russian journalists to travel regularly to Chechnya and chronicle the sufferings of Chechen civilians while also describing the hardships suffered by ill-fed and ill-equipped Russian soldiers. Her articles later came out in a book, "A Small Corner of Hell: Dispatches from Chechnya," which sealed her reputation in the West as one of the bravest voices in Russian journalism.

In 2001, Ms. Politkovskaya received death threats from a Siberian policeman, Sergei Lapin, whom she had accused of torturing and kidnapping civilians while stationed in Chechnya. Fearing for her safety, Ms. Politkovskaya's editors placed her under protective guard and later bundled her off to Austria for a few months. Meanwhile, on the basis of her reports, Mr. Lapin was tried in March 2005 and sentenced to 11 years in jail.

Then, in September 2004, Ms. Politkovskaya, who had by then emerged as one of the most outspoken domestic critics of Mr. Putin, claimed she was poisoned while flying to southern Russia to cover the seizure of hostages by militants at a school in Beslan. She was hospitalized and nearly died.

In recent years the focus of her reporting shifted to Mr. Kadyrov, the controversial Chechen strongman handpicked by the Kremlin to impose order in the rebel region. In her last published article, she claimed his security force -- known as the "Kadyrovtsy" -- was dominated by petty criminals and murderers who had switched to the pro-Russian camp solely to settle personal scores. Mr. Kadyrov has repeatedly denied claims that members of his forces have engaged in criminal activity or abused human rights.

In an article on its Web site yesterday on the slaying, Novaya Gazeta said one theory is that Ms. Politkovskaya may have been killed by enemies of Mr. Kadyrov in an attempt to discredit him. Mr. Kadyrov turned 30 last week, making him eligible for the Chechen presidency. He has many foes in a region where blood feuds often last generations.

"What's clear is that she somehow threatened the interests of very high-placed people in Russia, and as we can see, very dangerous people," said Vitaly Yaroshevsky, deputy editor of Novaya Gazeta.

Another Russian Journalist Murdered (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 9, 2006

On Saturday, one of the Russian President Vladimir Putin's fiercest critics was shot dead in her apartment block. Anna Politkovskaya was famous for her coverage of human rights abuses in Chechnya -- a conflict largely ignored by most of the increasingly state-controlled Russian media. She accused the region's Moscow-backed prime minister, Ramzan Kadyrov, of torture and abductions of civilians.

In her last interview, given to U.S.-run Radio Free Europe, Ms. Politkovskaya said she was a witness in a criminal case against the Kremlin's strongman in Chechnya. "These are cases of kidnappings, including one criminal case concerning an abduction personally involving Ramzan Kadyrov, a kidnapping of two people, whose photographs are now on my desk," the AP quoted from Sunday's rebroadcast on Ekho Moskvy.

Today, her newspaper Novaya Gazeta had planned to run her latest investigative report on the dirty war in Chechnya. Her death disrupted the publication. "We never got the article, but she had evidence about these (abducted) people and there were photographs," Deputy Editor Vitaly Yerushensky told Ekho Moskvy radio, according to the AP.

Prosecutor-General Yury Chaika personally took charge of the investigation of her murder, his office said Sunday. We'd have more confidence in the state's determination to find the killer and his contractors if the death of journalists, particularly critics of the Kremlin, wasn't such a routine affair. Ms. Politkovskaya is the 13th journalist murdered in Russia since former KGB agent Putin has become president. Among the many unsolved murder cases is that of American journalist Paul Klebnikov. The editor of Forbes Russia was gunned down in Moscow in 2004. Then-Prosecutor General Vladimir Ustinov also said he'd take "personal control" of the investigations. Two years later, the Klebnikov family is still waiting for any convictions.

Where lawlessness rules, reporters run a particular risk. According to the New York-based Committee to Protect Journalists, Russia is the third deadliest place in the world for journalists, behind Iraq and Algeria. Ms. Politkovskaya is the most prominent, and one of the bravest, free voices to be extinguished in Mr. Putin's Russia.

Anna Politkovskaya (WSJ)

By Garry Kasparov

DOJ_NMG_0076924

NEW YORK -- The news came when I was getting ready to sit down in front of an audience with the New Yorker's editor, David Remnick, at the New Yorker Festival on Saturday. Suddenly we had a tragic new topic for our talk about the crisis in Russia today. Anna Politkovskaya was dead, shot down in cold blood in her apartment building. One of the few remaining voices of independent journalism in Russia, Anna was a fearless journalist best known for her reporting on the government's atrocities in Chechnya.

To know Anna was to know how profoundly she cared. She felt the pain of others deeply and communicated that passion in her work. She documented the illegal acts of the Russian security forces in the Northern Caucasus and the brutality of Ramzan Kadyrov and other Kremlin proxies in the region. She tenaciously investigated the government cover-ups around the Beslan and the Nord-Ost theater terrorist attacks, in which hundreds of civilians were killed. She took on the most sensitive stories and the most painful subjects. She was an inspiration because she was never intimidated, because she never wrote a line she didn't believe in passionately.

And on Saturday -- President Vladimir Putin's 54th birthday -- Anna Politkovskaya was murdered. Her killers made no attempt to disguise what their act was, no attempt to make it look like anything other than a politically motivated assassination. Even Russian politicians who always worked to contradict and downplay her reports are calling it a political murder.

But what does that mean in a country where one person is in control of everything? This brutal episode cannot be taken outside the context of recent events in Russia. The forces in control here are facing an impending crisis and fault lines are beginning to appear in the Kremlin's vertical power structure. The authoritarian structure that Mr. Putin has built in Russia has been very profitable for his circle of friends and supporters. Income is siphoned off from every region of the country. Business and politics have been combined into a streamlined process for bleeding the nation dry. Now, however, Mr. Putin and his associates are approaching a dilemma. The president's term of office ends in 2008 and this efficient machine is threatening to explode. Should Mr. Putin stay or should he go?

The chaos that will surely occur if Mr. Putin leaves office is relatively easy to understand. Any mafia-like structure is based on the authority of the top man. If he leaves, or appears weak, there is a bloody scramble for his position. Whoever wins that battle must then eliminate the others to consolidate his grip, so the fighting is fierce. Perhaps only 10% of the combatants will pay in blood or incarceration and ruin, but nobody knows who will be in that 10%.

To avoid that dangerous uncertainty, some of Mr. Putin's closest lieutenants are dedicated to making sure the top man stays right where he is. The problem with this plan is that Mr. Putin is constitutionally prevented from staying in office beyond the end of his term in 2008. The main obstacle is not the Constitution, which can be easily adjusted to the Kremlin's requirements; the obstacle is that, after he has made so many statements about his intent to step down in 2008, Mr. Putin would lose almost all his legitimacy in the West if he exercised this option. Of course, his regime has never shown concern for the voices of America and Europe, and feeble indeed those voices have been. But the money his associates have become so adept at squeezing from Russian assets resides almost entirely in Western banks. If the Russian government loses its veneer of legitimacy, these accounts could begin to receive an unpleasant amount of scrutiny.

So what can the ruling elite do to avoid both the chaos of succession and the loss of easy relations with Europe and the U.S.? The answer is becoming clearer every day if you read the headlines and look at the big picture. The Kremlin is exaggerating and fabricating one crisis after another, all combining to create an image of imminent peril. Those who believe they have burned every bridge and cannot afford to see Mr. Putin step down are trying to build a case that he is the only alternative to anarchy.

The political showdown with Georgia has led to a government-sponsored racist campaign against Georgians living in Russia. Mr. Putin's latest statement on this issue was trumpeted as a major victory by Russian ultranationalists, who were delighted to hear his unequivocal endorsement of their platform. Inflammatory language of this sort is, of course, prohibited by our Constitution, which the president is sworn to protect. But what of that!

I am not even certain whether or not Mr. Putin himself desires to stay on. It's a stressful job and he certainly will not lack for material comforts when he retires, unless of course the next government finds itself in need of a scapegoat.

There is little to be gained from speculating about who exactly ordered the murder of Anna Politkovskaya. The system that encouraged the crime, the logic that made it politically expedient for some of those in power, that is the true face of Mr. Putin's

Russia. This is the same Russia that chairs the G-8 and the same Russian leader who received the Grand Cross of the Legion of Honor from Jacques Chirac. With the assassination of Anna Politkovskaya, the forces of corruption and repression in Russia have now made it plain that there is nothing they won't do to stay in power. This is obviously bad news for my country. But it is catastrophic for every nation that these forces continue to receive the approval of the leaders of the free world.

A Moscow Murder Story (WP)

By Anne Applebaum

The Washington Post, October 9, 2006

She wasn't charismatic, she didn't fill lecture halls and she wasn't much good at talk shows either. Nevertheless, at the time of her murder in Moscow Saturday, Anna Politkovskaya was at the pinnacle of her influence. One of the best-known journalists in Russia and one of the best-known Russian journalists in the world, she was proof -- and more is always needed -- that there is still nothing quite so powerful as the written word.

The subject of Politkovskaya's writing was Russia itself, and in particular what she called Russia's " dirty war " in Chechnya. Long after the rest of the international press corps had abandoned Chechnya -- it was too dangerous for most of us, too complicated, too obscure -- she kept telling heartbreaking Chechen stories: The Russian army colonel who pulled 89 elderly people from the ruins of Grozny but received no medals, or the Chechen schoolboy who was ill from the aftereffects of torture but could get no compensation. A hallmark of her books and articles was the laborious descriptions of how she tried, and invariably failed, to get explanations from hostile and evasive Russian authorities. At the same time, she had no patience for the fanatical fringe of the Chechen independence movement either.

Over the years Politkovskaya won scores of international prizes. At home she was threatened, arrested and once nearly poisoned by the same Russian authorities who refused to respond to her questions. The only official acknowledgment of her status was backhanded: In 2002, when Chechen rebels stormed a Moscow theater, she was called upon to help negotiate the release of hostages. She failed to keep them alive, and now she is dead too.

Politkovskaya was not, it is true, the first Russian journalist to be murdered in murky circumstances since 2000, when President Vladimir Putin came to power. Among the worst crimes -- all, of course, unsolved -- were the murders of two provincial journalists from the city of Togliatti, probably for investigating local mafia; of Paul Klebnikov , the American editor of Forbes magazine's Russian edition, probably for knowing too much about Russia's oligarchs; and of a Murmansk television reporter who was critical of local politicians.

Nevertheless, Politkovskaya's murder marks a distinct turning point. There was no attempt to disguise the murder as a theft or an accident: Her assassin not only shot her in broad daylight, but he left her body in the elevator of her apartment building alongside the gun he used to kill her -- standard practice for Moscow's arrogant hit men. Nor can her murder be easily attributed to distant provincial authorities or the criminal mafia: Local businessmen had no motivation to kill her -- but officials of the army, the police and even the Kremlin did. Whereas local thieves might have tried to cover their tracks, Politkovskaya's assassin, like so many Russian assassins, did not seem to fear the law.

Of course if this murder follows the usual pattern in Russia, no suspect will ever be found and no assassin will ever come to trial. But in the longer term, the criminal investigation isn't what matters most. After all, whoever pulled the trigger -- or paid someone to pay someone to pull the trigger -- has already won a major victory. As Russian (and Eastern European) history well demonstrates, it isn't always necessary to kill millions of people to frighten all the others: A few choice assassinations, in the right time and place, usually suffice. Since the arrest of oil magnate Mikhail Khodorkovsky in 2003, no other Russian oligarchs have attempted even to sound politically independent. After the assassination of Politkovskaya on Saturday, it's hard to imagine many Russian journalists following in her footsteps to Grozny either.

There are jitters already: A few hours after news of Politkovskaya's death became public, a worried friend sent me a link to an eerie Russian Web site that displays photographs of "enemies of the people" -- all Russian journalists and human rights activists, some quite well known. Above the pictures is each person's birth date and a blank space where, it is implied, the dates of their deaths will soon be marked. That sort of thing will make many, and probably most, Russians think twice before criticizing the Kremlin about anything.

And there is, at the moment, a lot to criticize. With crises brewing in Iran, Iraq and North Korea, few have had time to notice the recent escalation of the political dispute between Russia and Georgia, or to ponder the political consequences of Europe's increasing reliance on Russian gas, or to worry much about minor matters such as the deterioration of press freedom in Russia. Critics of Anna Politkovskaya's writing did complain, on occasion, that her gloom could be overbearing: She was one of those journalists who saw harbingers of catastrophe in every story. Still, it is hard for me not to write about her murder in the same foreboding tone that she herself would have used. It is so much like one of the stories she would have written herself.

Another Killing In Moscow (NYT)

Anna Politkovskaya, gunned down over the weekend in Moscow, was the 13th Russian journalist killed since Vladimir Putin became president — and one of the bravest. We may never know who killed her because politically motivated crimes have a way of never being solved in Mr. Putin's Russia.

There is no question about whom Ms. Politkovskaya held responsible in years of unflinching reporting from Chechnya: the Russian Army and Mr. Putin himself. When he finally got around to acknowledging her death yesterday it was in a cold-blooded statement that the authorities "will take every step to investigate objectively the tragic death of the journalist Politkovskaya."

Ms. Politkovskaya was 48, the mother of two grown children. She lived alone, in part because of the dangers of her job. On Saturday, she was about to deliver a major report to her newspaper about torture in Chechnya when a killer ambushed her and fired four shots from a silenced Makarov pistol, one in her heart and three in her head.

Police investigators seized all her research materials from her home and her office at Novaya Gazeta, one of the few independent newspapers still functioning in Moscow. We hope they lead to arrests, and not a cover-up. It is hard to be optimistic.

The murder of Ms. Politkovskaya — like the murder last month of Andrei Kozlov, the deputy chairman of the Russian Central Bank who was trying to reform the banking system — had the stench of a political assassination. It would be hard to imagine that Mr. Putin's Kremlin, swollen with oil riches and power, could not find those who ordered her murder or so many others.

It is also hard to fathom why a president with Mr. Putin's hunger for respect would allow his country to sink so steadily in the world's esteem. Yet the former K.G.B. officer has presided over a systematic degrading of Russians' freedoms.

According to the Committee to Protect Journalists, Russia has been the third deadliest country for journalists over the past 15 years, after Iraq and Algeria. Despite the active hostility of the state, and the clear and ever-present danger, reformers have continued to speak up. Ms. Politkovskaya believed, as did Mr. Kozlov and many others, that Russia could become a freer country. We hope that her terrible death will rally those who share her faith.

U.N. Security Council Nominates S. Korean As Secretary General (WP)

By Colum Lynch And Joohee Cho, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, October 10, 2006

General Assembly Expected to Back Veteran Diplomat

UNITED NATIONS, Oct. 9 -- The U.N. Security Council voted unanimously Monday for South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki Moon to be secretary general, endorsing a discreet political survivor for the world's top diplomatic job. A formal vote by the 192-member U.N. General Assembly is expected to confirm Ban's selection, perhaps within a week.

The soft-spoken, patrician Korean functionary -- some call him "the man with no enemies" -- will take charge of a United Nations that is struggling to contain conflicts around the globe. Ban, 62, has expressed a desire to play a far more active role in resolving the nuclear standoff with North Korea than current Secretary General Kofi Annan, who will step down on Dec. 31 after a decade in the job.

Although he may lack the star power of Annan, a Nobel Peace Prize laureate once dubbed the secular pope, Ban is by most accounts a polished and patient diplomat who could help smooth over differences among the United Nations' most powerful members.

Japan's U.N. envoy, Kenzo Oshima, said Ban's intimate knowledge of North Korean affairs would make him an asset in the campaign to persuade Pyongyang to back down. But some question whether Ban may be too diplomatic to take on powerful governments, including the United States, if they violate international norms, or to publicly scold noted human rights abusers, including North Korea, Burma and Sudan.

"He will not ruffle feathers," said Robert Einhorn, assistant secretary of state for nonproliferation in the Clinton administration, who has worked closely with Ban. "He is very diplomatic in the traditional sense of the word."

The U.N. body has never opposed a previous council choice. If approved, Ban will lead a $5 billion-a-year organization that carries out functions in virtually every corner of the world, ranging from the publishing of U.N. postage stamps to operating the world's second-largest expeditionary force, which will top 100,000 blue helmets in 18 conflicts by the end of the year.

In a series of interviews and public speeches, Ban said his chief priority will be to restore public confidence in an institution that has been buffeted by political squabbling among its members, mismanagement of a massive humanitarian program in Iraq, and sexual misconduct scandals involving U.N. peacekeepers.

But Ban sought to dash expectations that he would submit to U.S. insistence that the next secretary general devote most of his time to administrative tasks, saying he was eager to mediate conflicts in Sudan, the Middle East and North Korea.

"I intend to be more visibly engaged as a secretary general in addressing the regional conflict issue while trying to delegate the significant portion of my day-to-day managerial duties" to subordinates, Ban told an audience at the New York-based Asia Society.

His selection has already established Ban as something of a political lightning rod. James Kelly, the former U.S. assistant secretary of state for East Asian and Pacific affairs, said Ban's successful campaign for the top U.N. job may have played a role in the timing of North Korea's reported nuclear test. Pyongyang has long resented its southern neighbor's power and prosperity and may have been looking to overshadow Ban's election, Kelly said.

Some human rights advocates are cautious about Ban, saying he has taken a low-key approach to abuses in North Korea. But they credit Ban with backing key institutions, such as the International Criminal Court, that hold rights abusers to account.

"He says the right things when you speak to him," said Kenneth Roth, the executive director of Human Rights Watch. "The big open question is, he is studiously bland. He seems determined not to give offense, and sometimes to effectively promote human rights you have to give offense."

Ban's selection marks the first time since the United Nations' founding that a secretary general has come from a military ally of the United States. And Ban actively pressed his government to send Korean troops to Iraq, backing a U.S.-led invasion that was bitterly opposed by Annan and most U.N. members.

Still, Ban has persuaded China and Russia that he will show sufficient independence from the United States.

"For him to get U.S. support was easy. He's very well liked in Washington," said Richard C. Holbrooke, a former U.S. ambassador to the United Nations who heads the Asia Society. "The fact that he could get the Chinese on board, provided he didn't make a private arrangement with them, providing there is no secret understanding, is . . . an extremely impressive achievement."

Ban was born into a upper class family in South Korea's North Chungchong province. His entry into the world of international affairs began as a teenager in 1962, when he won an English-language speech contest that led to a visit to the United States and a meeting with President John F. Kennedy. The trip inspired Ban to pursue a career in diplomacy.

Ban has since developed extensive experience in the United Nations, where he served South Korea as a junior diplomat and later as chief of staff of former U.N. General Assembly President Han Seung Soo. Han, the former South Korean foreign minister, led the world body after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

Han credits Ban with playing a key role in shaping the U.N. response to the terrorist attacks. "Ban appears to be soft-spoken, but he can be tough when needed," Han said.

Han described his former aide as "righteous man" who hails from a "very noble family that honors sacrifice for the greater good."

"When his son was drafted to one of the toughest divisions in the military, he could have used his power status to move his boy to a less dangerous post," Han said. "Ban flatly refused to do so, saying there's a line between public and private affairs."

Security Council Approves South Korean As U.N. Chief (NYT)

By Warren Hoge And Choe Sang-hun

The New York Times, October 10, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Oct. 9 — The Security Council on Monday officially nominated Ban Ki-moon, the foreign minister of South Korea, to become the next secretary general of the United Nations, essentially assuring him the post.

While Mr. Ban said it was an honor for him and his country, he noted that North Korea's announcement of a nuclear test cast a shadow on his nomination.

"This should be a moment of joy, but instead I stand here with a very heavy heart," Mr. Ban said in a news conference in Seoul. "Despite the concerted warning from the international community, North Korea has gone ahead with a nuclear test."

Kenzo Oshima, the ambassador of Japan, the Council president, announced that Mr. Ban had been approved by all 15 members by acclamation. His nomination had been assured after he won four informal polls of the Council's members over the summer, leading to the withdrawal last week of the six other candidates.

Mr. Ban, 62, will succeed Kofi Annan, who retires Dec. 31 after two five-year terms. Mr. Annan released a statement affirming "the highest respect for Mr. Ban" and pledging to help ensure a smooth transition.

Soft-spoken and retiring, Mr. Ban presents a sharp contrast to Mr. Annan, who won a Nobel Peace Prize, made strong pronouncements on violations of international law and gained diplomatic rock-star status before the mismanagement of the oil-for-food program, the sexual exploitation of women by some blue-helmeted peacekeepers and the scandals in the United Nations procurement office tarnished his reputation during his second term.

The Council took its action on Mr. Ban before convening an emergency meeting on North Korea's nuclear test. Mr. Oshima noted, "I think the fact the candidate is current foreign minister of the Republic of Korea is an asset in dealing with the situation in the Korean Peninsula that we are facing."

In a similar reference, John R. Bolton, the American ambassador, said, "It's really quite an appropriate juxtaposition that today, 61 years after the temporary division of the Korean Peninsula at the end of World War II, that we're electing a foreign minister of South Korea secretary general of this organization and meeting, as well, to consider the testing by the North Koreans of a nuclear device."

He added, "I can't think of a better way to show the difference in the progress that those two countries — great progress in the South and great tragedy in the North."

Mr. Oshima said he was sending a letter on Monday to the 192-member General Assembly, which, under the United Nations Charter, is responsible for appointing a new secretary general on receiving the choice of the Security Council.

The General Assembly will draw up its own resolution on the appointment and circulate it to the membership for action, expected before the end of the week.

Only a simple majority is required for approval, and the last four secretaries general were appointed by the General Assembly through a resolution adopted by consensus, without a vote. The assembly has never rejected the Council's selection.

Mr. Ban said he would "contribute as much as I can to the resolution of all kinds of problems, including the North Korean nuclear issue, that may threaten international peace and security."

He said the test "directly challenged" a Security Council resolution against such an act and was "a unilateral abrogation and annulment" of a 1991 nonnuclear agreement between the Koreas. He also called it "a grave and direct threat to peace and stability on the Korean Peninsula and in Northeast Asia."

In campaigning for the job, Mr. Ban presented himself as a reformer who "will lead by example" and as a "harmonizer and bridge-builder" who will try to expel the widespread "mistrust" of the United Nations.

Specifically, Mr. Ban said he would focus on the need to guarantee human rights, on the special responsibilities the world body had to the developing world and on overhauling the management of the United Nations — a priority of the United States and its allies.

"It is true that the U.N. has not lived up to the expectations of the international community in terms of efficiency, transparency and accountability," he said, adding, "I will do my best to make the U.N. Secretariat reborn into a more relevant and efficient organization."

South Korea's Ban Ki Moon Is Nominated For Top U.N. Position (WSJ/AP)

The Wall Street Journal, October 10, 2006

UNITED NATIONS -- South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki Moon was officially nominated as the next U.N. secretary-general hours after North Korea announced it had tested a nuclear weapon.

"This should be a moment of joy. But instead, I stand here with a very heavy heart," Mr. Ban told reporters in Seoul, South Korea. Mr. Ban pledged to work to resolve the North Korean nuclear crisis.

Mr. Ban, 62 years old, was nominated by the U.N. Security Council to succeed Kofi Annan, whose second five-year term ends at the end of the year. He faces likely confirmation by the U.N. General Assembly.

Japan's U.N. ambassador, Kenzo Oshima, asked the 192-nation world body to act promptly to give final approval to Mr. Ban so he can have a sufficient transition before taking over as U.N. chief on Jan. 1.

"I think the fact that the candidate is currently foreign minister of the Republic of Korea is an asset in dealing with the situation in the Korean peninsula that we are now facing," he said.

U.S. Ambassador John Bolton called Mr. Ban's selection "a very significant event," saying the United States looks forward to quick approval by the General Assembly.

"I can't think of a better way to show the difference in the progress of those two countries -- great progress in the South and great tragedy in the North," Mr. Bolton said.

In Seoul, Mr. Ban told reporters that if the General Assembly appoints him, he would "contribute as much as I can to the resolution of all kinds of problems including the North Korean nuclear issue that may threaten international peace and security."

North Korea hasn't mentioned Mr. Ban's bid to become U.N. secretary-general. It previously has accused him of blindly following the U.S. line by urging the North to resume negotiations and give up the atomic-weapons program.

Mr. Ban has been South Korea's foreign minister for more than two years and served as national security adviser to two presidents -- jobs that focused on relations with the North. He has served as a diplomat for nearly 40 years, including previous stints at the U.N. and in Washington.

Mr. Ban would be the eighth secretary-general in the United Nations' 60-year history, overseeing an organization with some 92,000 peacekeepers around the world and a $2 billion annual operating budget. Fighting hunger, assisting refugees and slowing the spread of HIV/AIDS are all programs that fall under the secretary-general's purview.

Ban Nominated For U.N. Secretary-general (AP)

The U.N. Security Council on Monday formally nominated South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki-moon to succeed Kofi Annan as United Nations secretary-general, all but assuring that the quiet diplomat will become the eighth chief in the world body's 61-year history.

What would have been an event of major significance — Ban will become one of the world's best-known and most influential diplomats over his five-year term — was overshadowed by North Korea's claim that it had conducted a nuclear test.

"This should be a moment of joy. But instead, I stand here with a very heavy heart," Ban said at a news conference in Seoul. "Despite the concerted warning from the international community, North Korea has gone ahead with a nuclear test."

Ban, who participated in six-party talks with the North in 2005, vowed to help resolve the North Korean nuclear crisis after he becomes secretary-general. He must be approved by the 192-nation General Assembly, which has never rejected a Security Council nomination.

Japan's U.N. Ambassador Kenzo Oshima asked the General Assembly to act promptly to give final approval to Ban so he can have a sufficient transition before taking over as U.N. chief on Jan. 1, after Annan's second five-year term ends.

"I think the fact that the candidate is currently foreign minister of the Republic of Korea is an asset in dealing with the situation in the Korean peninsula that we are now facing," he said.

Some diplomats speculated that North Korea may have conducted the test when it did partly to signal its disapproval for Ban. The North has not publicly commented on his bid but has accused him of blindly following the U.S. line by urging the North to resume negotiations and give up the atomic weapons program.

Normally the 15-member council would vote on a nomination, but Britain's Ambassador Emyr Jones-Parry suggested in Monday's meeting that Ban be approved by acclamation, done when there are no dissenting votes. The idea was greeted with applause from the other ambassadors, diplomats who attended the meeting said.

Unlike in previous years, Ban's selection was marked by an absence of rancor or political infighting. He was the front-runner in all four informal polls the Security Council conducted, never getting fewer than 13 votes in favor of his candidacy.

The final straw poll last week revealed that he had the support of all five veto-wielding members of the council, and the remaining five candidates quickly left the race.

U.S. State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said in a statement that Ban "is the right choice to lead the United Nations at this pivotal time in its history." U.S. Ambassador John Bolton called Ban's selection "a very significant event."

"It's really quite an appropriate juxtaposition that today 61 years after the temporary division of the Korean peninsula at the end of World War II, we're electing the foreign minister of South Korea as secretary-general of this organization and meeting as well to consider the testing by the North Koreans of a nuclear device," Bolton said.

Ban's selection now will give him more than two months to prepare to lead an organization that has deployed 92,000 peacekeepers around the world and has annual operating budget of $5 billion. Fighting hunger, assisting refugees and slowing the spread of HIV/AIDS are all programs that fall under the secretary-general's purview.

Annan "warmly welcomes" the decision nominate Ban, whom he has the "highest respect for," U.N. spokesman Stephane Dujarric said. Annan, who won the Nobel Peace Prize as secretary-general in 2001, urged the General Assembly to make a decision on Ban as soon as possible.

Ban has been South Korea's foreign minister for more than 2 1/2 years and served as national security adviser to two presidents — jobs that focused on relations with the North. He has served as a diplomat for nearly 40 years, including previous stints at the U.N. and in Washington.

He had courted Security Council nations aggressively during his campaign and gave numerous speeches to make himself better known and counter the impression that he was too quiet or humble to inherit the job.

Yet the actual selection process was mostly conducted behind closed doors, adhering to a tradition that has drawn criticism from some members of the General Assembly and non-governmental organizations that believe the job is too important to be awarded in such secrecy.

Nonetheless, diplomats said they believed Ban was the right man to lead the organization that many believe is in desperate need of reform. Its procurement department has been saddled by allegations of corruption and mismanagement, while many world leaders believe its most powerful organ, the Security Council, must be revamped to reflect the realities of 2006 and not 1945, when it was created.

"We think that he has all those qualities that are necessary for a secretary-general that are probably hard to differentiate and count on your hands," Russia's U.N. Ambassador Vitaly Churkin said. "This is the person who, with our support, can tackle this difficult work."

Associated Press reporters Edith M. Lederer at the United Nations and Bo-Mi Lim in Seoul, South Korea, contributed to this story.

Ban Chosen To Succeed Annan As U.N. Chief (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, October 10, 2006

NEW YORK -- The U.N. Security Council unanimously selected South Korean diplomat Ban Ki-moon to be the organization's eighth secretary-general yesterday, acting just hours after North Korea declared it had tested a nuclear weapon.

The 192 member-nations of the U.N. General Assembly are expected to affirm the choice later this week or early next week, giving the low-key South Korean foreign minister more than two months to prepare before beginning his five-year term.

"The Security Council has just recommended to the General Assembly that Ban Ki-moon [serve as secretary-general] from Jan. 1, 2007 to Dec. 31, 2011," said Japanese U.N. Ambassador Kenzo Oshima, president of the 15-nation council during the month of October.

The selection of a new secretary-general, normally a momentous occasion, was overshadowed by Pyongyang's nuclear test claim, which prompted an emergency session of the council immediately after the vote.

In Seoul, Mr. Ban called the nuclear test an "act of provocation" and acknowledged mixed emotions on the day of his selection.

"This should be a moment of joy. But instead, I stand here with a very heavy heart" because of the North's nuclear test, he told reporters in Seoul yesterday.

Last week, he told the Chosun Ilbo, a leading Seoul daily, he wants to visit North Korea sometime during his term, something outgoing U.N. chief Kofi Annan had never been able to do in his ten-year tenure.

Several diplomats seemed pleased that a Korea policy veteran will lead the organization during an era of unprecedented threats to international peace and security.

"The fact that the candidate is the current foreign minister of [South Korea] is an asset in dealing with the situation on the Korean peninsula," Mr. Oshima said.

U.N. Ambassador John R. Bolton, who has been pushing North Korea onto the council's agenda for months, described the selection of Mr. Ban as "quite an appropriate juxtaposition."

"Sixty-one years after the temporary division of the Korean peninsula at the end of World War II, we're electing the foreign minister of South Korea [as] secretary-general of this organization, and meeting as well to consider testing by North Korea of a nuclear device," Mr. Bolton said.

"I can't think of a better way to show great progress in the south, great tragedy in the north."

Mr. Ban's selection by the council had been assured after he emerged as the consensus choice in a series of four straw polls since this summer.

Council members stayed in session after the 15-0 vote, moving directly to the thornier issue of how to respond to North Korea's defiance of the council's demand late last week that it abandon its nuclear pursuits.

Emyr Jones Parry, Britain's U.N. ambassador, praised Mr. Ban's "very impressive credentials" and his "vast and long diplomatic experience" in South Korea's foreign service.

Jean-Marc de la Sabliere, France's U.N. ambassador, praised Mr. Ban's experience in dealing with North Korea, as well as his work on development and trade relations with Africa.

"He has all the qualifications for this job," Mr. de la Sabliere said, stressing the possibility of renewed efforts to reform the world body's bureaucracy.

Mr. Ban, 62, was educated in Seoul and at the John F. Kennedy School of Government at Harvard University, where he studied public administration. He is married with three grown children.

The career diplomat twice served in his country's embassy in Washington, and ran the South Korean foreign ministry's American affairs division in the early 1990s. He has represented South Korea at the United Nations in New York and in Vienna, where he handled the nuclear portfolio.

Mr. Ban served as the chief of staff to the president of the U.N. General Assembly in 2001 and 2002, a session that was dominated by the September 11 attacks.

Mr. Annan offered his congratulations to Mr. Ban and promised his full cooperation.

"For his part, the secretary-general will do everything possible to assure a smooth transition," said Stephane Dujarric, spokesman for Mr. Annan.

Islamic Leader Urges Holy War In Somalia (WT/AP)

By Mohamed Sheikh Nor

DOJ_NMG_0076932

The Washington Times, October 10, 2006

MOGADISHU, Somalia -- An Islamic militia that has seized much of southern Somalia declared a holy war yesterday against Ethiopia, accusing the Horn of Africa neighbor of deploying thousands of troops to prop up the country's weak, U.N.-backed government.

"I urge all the Somali people to wage holy war against the Ethiopians," said top Islamic leader Sheik Sharif Sheik Ahmed, wearing combat fatigues and holding aloft an AK-47 assault rifle.

"Ethiopian troops have intentionally invaded our land," he said. "We will counter them soon."

His comments came hours after residents said hundreds of Ethiopian and government troops forced Islamic fighters to abandon Bur Haqaba, a strategic hilltop town.

Sheik Yusuf Indahaadde, the national security chairman for the Islamic group, said 35,000 Ethiopian troops were on Somali soil, but did not give any further details. Foreign observers, however, have put the number in the hundreds.

"This is a declaration of war," he said. "We will not wait anymore. We will defend the integrity of our land."

The Islamic courts have declared holy war against Ethiopia on a number of occasions in recent months but have so far avoided any direct military confrontation.

Somalia has not had an effective national government since 1991, when warlords overthrew dictator Mohammed Siad Barre and then turned on one another, throwing the country into anarchy.

A transitional government was formed in 2004 with U.N. help with the hope of restoring order after years of lawlessness. But it has struggled to assert authority, while the Islamic movement seized the capital, Mogadishu, in June and now controls much of the south.

Tensions between the Islamic movement, which is expanding control over large parts of the war-ravaged country, and the weakened government are high. Each side has accused the other of violating a tentative peace agreement signed last month in Khartoum, Sudan.

The Islamic group opposes any outside intervention and becomes particularly incensed about any role played by Ethiopia, Somalia's historic rival.

Somalia's weak but internationally recognized government publicly denies it is being supported by Ethiopian troops. However, government officials, speaking on the condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to speak to the press, said about 6,000 Ethiopian troops are in Somalia.

The reports from Bur Haqaba prompted another denial from Ethiopia.

Islamic officials said three Ethiopian battalions totaling 750 men alongside government militia rode into Bur Haqaba yesterday morning without firing a shot. The town was taken over by Islamic forces in late June.

Bur Haqaba is perched along six hilltops, allowing forces there to control the only road between Mogadishu, controlled by the Islamists, and Baidoa, the seat of the transitional government.

After Tsunami, Intentions To Build But No Road Yet (NYT)

By Jane Perlez

The New York Times, October 9, 2006

KEUTAPANG, Indonesia, Oct. 5 — A $245 million stretch of blacktop intended to be the signature good-will gesture from the American people to the Indonesian survivors of the 2004 tsunami has instead become a parable of the problems of Aceh Province's recovery.

Construction of the 150-mile road along the devastated coast has yet to start, stalled by a host of obstacles like acquiring right of way through residential and farm land, and, particularly, through several hundred graves of mystical and religious significance.

Though villagers welcome the idea, some have reservations about an American-style thoroughfare with a wide shoulder on either side that will replace the existing ribbon of mostly churned dirt and mud.

Villagers say they fear speeding traffic — they have thrown rocks at fast-traveling cars of foreign aid workers — and want to be able to sell snacks and tea from stalls snug by the roadside, as they have always done.

The difficulties of getting started on the road, one of the largest infrastructure projects in Indonesia, reflects the weariness among tsunami survivors with the long return to normality.

A demonstration outside the main Indonesian reconstruction agency turned violent last month when protesters complained that they still lacked basic services and demanded more financing for education.

The patience of American officials is wearing thin, too. They complain that the government has been too slow in buying up the land and resolving the fraught issue of the graves.

Lately, the Americans have become so disconcerted about delays that they have tried to pry more action from the Indonesians by suggesting that the money for the road would be diverted to the reconstruction efforts in Lebanon.

"It was threatened they would take the money away," said Kuntoro Mangkusubroto, the director of the Indonesian rehabilitation and reconstruction agency in Aceh. "That's standard," he added with a shrug.

The Indonesians say the Americans are imposing first-world standards of efficiency on a poor region that was pounded by civil war and then swamped by the tsunami, which killed more than 100,000 Indonesians. Records of land titles were washed away, and questions of inheritance among devastated families take a while to decide, they say.

The idea for the road evolved soon after the tsunami when the Bush administration wanted to show that the United States cared about Indonesia, the world's most populous Muslim country, in its moment of need.

It was decided early on to finance one substantial American project that would make a splash, rather than a number of smaller ones. At first, rebuilding a significant portion of the provincial capital, Banda Aceh, into a kind of "signature city" was discussed.

Instead, a well-engineered road from the capital to Meulaboh, the southernmost coastal town, which was nearly completely wiped out, was considered a more fruitful project that played to the American strength of fast and modern construction.

But the Americans did not anticipate the long negotiations over compensation for land or the strong local feelings about the graves.

Tucked under a grove of coconut trees, a pale-hued boulder and an ancient tree trunk represent this village's most mystical grave, the place where a white tiger is believed to stand guard. Nearby, red and yellow flags left by surveyors indicated the American road was set to plow right through the sacred spot.

A local elder, Mohammad Noor, 60, who forded a river and clambered over fences to show off the grave, says he cannot imagine that it could ever be moved.

The problems with the road also involve more than Indonesian sensibilities. An audit by the Inspector General of the United States Agency for International Development last March said that the design of the road was delayed because the development agency requested the contractor to modify the design plan at least four times. It also noted that when the contract for the engineering work was awarded to the American firm Parsons, it was awarded in November, four months late.

By May, when the process was bogged down, a veteran of building big American projects abroad, Roy R. Ventura Jr., was brought in to expedite things.

On June 29, Mr. Ventura said he presented the Indonesians with the final plan for where the road would run. He was told by Indonesian government officials, he said, that right of way would be ready so construction could begin for the first portion of the road to the village of Lhong by July 25, and by Oct. 3 in the area farther south to the town of Calang.

According to that schedule, American officials said they expected the first five miles of the road to be completed by Aug. 23, and that new sections of the road would continue to unfold after that.

But instead, the American aid agency is paying the Indonesian road contractor, Wijaya Karya, about $100,000 a month to maintain the old road, money that should be going toward the new construction, American officials say.

"The Americans are arguing that there should have been land acquisition a year ago," Mr. Kuntoro said. "But how could that happen when we did not know from the Americans where the road was running until June 29?"

Mr. Kuntoro, a graduate in engineering from Stanford University, has become the point man for many of the problems.

He has been visited in his office in Banda Aceh by the American ambassador to Indonesia, B. Lynn Pascoe; by Mr. Ventura; and this week by investigators from the Government Accountability Office in Washington. They all ask the same thing: When will enough continuous land be ready so that bulldozers can begin clearing the way?

In fact, Mr. Kuntoro said in an interview on Tuesday that he had just written a letter to Mr. Pascoe saying that his agency had gained title to about 3.5 miles worth of continuous land and that major construction could start.

But on Thursday, Mr. Ventura said that he was not satisfied that the titles were transferred and that work could begin only on a bridge involving a sliver of land.

"The road itself is no different to anyplace in the world," said Mr. Ventura, who was with the Montana Highway Department for 10 years and has managed construction sites in Saudi Arabia, Jordan and the Philippines. "The process of getting right to the land to get the road built is very different."

In an exchange with the governor of Banda Aceh, Mustafa Abu Bakar, the frustrated Americans suggested that the governor should consider using eminent domain procedures for speedy possession of the land. In reply, the governor said in a letter that in order to keep community support for the road he would use eminent domain only as a last resort.

"The government sees the people here as victims of the tsunami and very vulnerable," said Eddy Siregar, a construction manager for Wijaya Karya, the contractor, as he sat on the side of the old road in the village of Pasi. "It would be a big trauma if their land was taken. So they want to try the soft way."

Late Wednesday afternoon, Mr. Noor, the local elder, received word that his village leaders had agreed with the provincial authorities to move the grave the white tiger is believed to guard.

"I can't imagine how they will do it," a crestfallen Mr. Noor said. "Will they do it nicely, or will they do it roughly?"

Atoning For Lame Ducks (WSJ)

By Fania Oz-salzberger

The Wall Street Journal, October 9, 2006

HAIFA, Israel -- Israeli cities during Yom Kippur are the quietest in the world. No cars, no national television, not an open business in sight. The Jewish Day of Atonement offers calm reflection -- "accounting of the soul" -- for synagogue-goers and street-strolling seculars alike. This year almost everyone could agree at least on one thing: This country has seen better leadership. The shoes of Ben Gurion, Begin and Rabin have never looked larger, or emptier. As Palestinian government in Gaza totters on the verge of civil war, and Arab leaders across the Middle East softly offer peace talks, Israel's leaders hardly seem capable of dealing with either situation. If Israelis felt a little like sitting ducks last August, it is the set of lame ducks in Jerusalem that make us worry in October.

In the aftermath of the second Lebanon war, which underachieved its declared aims, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert is trying to cut his losses with a barrage of media interviews of the holiday supplement variety. In so many words, he said that Israel today has no vision. Disengagement in the West Bank? Definitely out. Bashar Assad's new talk of negotiation? Not worthy of an answer. Arab moderates promoting the Saudi peace plan? Merely a noise in the background. To be sure, all these may prove to be dead ends; but Mr. Olmert offers no initial exploration and no alternative horizon. What emerges is a self-defending lawyer-politician rather than an imaginative national leader. An opinion poll in Haaretz on Sept. 21 gave Mr. Olmert a mere 22% approval rating, with 68% voicing dissatisfaction from his conduct as prime minister.

Amir Peretz, the fiery social democrat miscast as minister of defense, has plunged even lower. Claiming the innocence of a novice, he says army chiefs misled him into believing that the eradication of Hezbollah missile launchers would be a far faster feat. In the meantime, Jews and Arabs in northern Israel suffer social and economic hardships that should have been the natural concern of a labor leader like Mr. Peretz. Instead of being led down the garden path by generals, he should have tended to his own backyard, Israel's growing economic gap. His recent poll score is, accordingly, 14% -- the lowest on record for a defense minister. Mr. Peretz insists he will not leave his job before mending what is broken. So do others. In a political culture unaccustomed to accountability resignations, rolling up one's sleeves is a reasonable alternative; but they will have to do it under the severe gaze of the public and the media.

Meantime, elsewhere in Jerusalem, the plot thickens: President Moshe Katzav is facing serious allegations of sexual misconduct. As many as eight female civil servants who worked with Mr. Katzav during his political and presidential career filed complaints against him, ranging from sexual harassment to rape. His protestations of innocence and "conspiracy" -- echoed by a battery of lawyers -- sound convincing to a few, pathetic to some, and infuriating to most Israeli citizens. Mr. Katzav refuses to resign or even to suspend himself temporarily. Regardless of the eventual juridical outcome, and unlike Messrs. Olmert and Peretz, there is little he can do to fix the damage to integrity. Israel's highest honorary post is being dragged through the mud.

So this must have been a hard Yom Kippur indeed for Israel's top echelon; there is a great deal, it seems, to atone for.

At this point it is tempting to remind readers -- and to break the news to some Europeans -- that the vast majority of the Israeli citizenry is honest, committed to democracy, and averse to both corruption and political flimsiness. And that most Israeli soldiers, regulars and reservists, are capable and moral. And that Palestinian politics and economy are in violent shambles, largely of their own making, while Israel's economy (and rule of law) is decent and successful. But it would be more to the point to suggest which parts of Israel's government are future-looking, and where they may be heading.

The Olmert government has been more open to international dialogue than many of its predecessors. Mr. Olmert and Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni reportedly began to work on an internationally moderated ceasefire from the early days of the war in Lebanon, and their care to comply with U.N. Resolution 1701 was capped by the retreat of the bulk of Israel's army from southern Lebanon on the eve of Yom Kippur. Unfortunately, Hezbollah does not respond in kind: The two captured Israeli soldiers, as well as the one held in Gaza, have not been freed. The full disarmament of militants throughout Lebanon so far exists mostly on U.N. stationery. Yet Israel's abiding by the international resolution is an important step in the right direction -- a moral high ground is often better than a mountaintop position in southern Lebanon (unless one's life depends on the latter, and only as long as it does).

To put it simply, Israelis are beginning to see the benefits of reversing Clausewitz's famous dictum: Diplomacy is now the continuation of war by other means, and the Lebanon clash may soon yield important benefits for Israel -- and for most Lebanese, and perhaps even for Palestinians -- on the diplomatic front.

One interesting sign of change is that the Israeli public has been relatively -- and surprisingly -- content with the management of its foreign affairs. Not only did Ms. Livni survive the governmental fall from grace rather impressively, scoring 51% support in the Haaretz poll and enjoying a consistently positive image in public opinion; she is also a widely preferred candidate for the prime minister's office, presenting the rare persona of a moderate, incorruptible, level-headed ex-Likudnik. If Ms. Livni does become our next leader, overcoming the predicted rise to power of more militant right-of-center parties, she may offer the right blend of pragmatic sobriety and creative vision typical of the more optimistic part of Israel's political center today. Young, pragmatic and -- by current local standards -- charismatic, Ms. Livni would be no Golda Meir, and so much the better. (It so happens that the brand new president of the Supreme Court, Dorit Beinish, is a woman, too. So is the Knesset's speaker, Dalia Itzik. Perhaps -- although this writer is biased on the issue -- a female touch would do Israel's three branches of government no harm. At the very least, Arab regimes may witness an example for tapping the resources of their nations' hidden halves.)

While Israel is wrestling with its own demons and hopes, both the EU and the U.S. face new Middle Eastern tests. Europe is the new active player in the Lebanese scene. It should flex its muscles, brains and, if possible, heart, to reverse decades of well-earned mistrust on part of the Israelis. Can we, as well as the Arabs, finally be persuaded that the European peace brokers have determination, imagination, compassion and staying power? Tough homework for Brussels here, and a crucial test for its international performance.

The U.S., too, has more steps to make up a long steep slope. Condoleezza Rice may have an easier job persuading Israel to give serious answers to moderate Arab peace initiatives than to prop up the wobbly Abu Mazen in his almost hopeless campaign to instill reason into Hamas; but both are worth trying. Syria's Bashar Assad may be acting cynically when saying that peace with Israel can be a done deal within six months, but the U.S. is the only power that can seriously challenge him to live up to his claims, first and foremost by kicking out of Syria the bloodiest of terror leaders, such as Khaled Mashal of Hamas. Mr. Olmert's present silence is justifiable up and until the Americans either clear the Road to Damascus, or show the world that it is obviously blocked.

Mr. Olmert's government is not doomed to fall just yet. Even as an inquiry committee into governmental and military conduct during the Lebanon campaign began its probe, postwar street protest has almost petered out. Damaged homes in the Galilee were speedily rebuilt, bombed schools quickly restored for the academic year, burnt trees replanted. One can only wish Lebanon and Gaza similar recovery, and some Israelis I know would be happy to lend a hand, in the spirit of Jewish atonement, especially after our three captured soldiers are safely home. As 7,000 peacekeeping European soldiers, alongside Lebanese troops, take over southern Lebanon, hope is surfacing that whatever took place in the summer of 2006 was not an Israeli defeat.

The mood in Tel Aviv and Haifa today -- as the clever Hassan Nasrallah surely knows in his heart -- is somber but not depressed. Ehud Olmert's government is not the stuff of anyone's political dreams, left or right; but with a little intelligent help from the U.S., and perhaps even from the EU, even a lame duck can yet lay some good eggs. After all, that is what Israeli agriculture is all about.

Ms. Oz-Salzberger is director of the Posen Research Forum for Political Thought and senior lecturer at the Faculty of Law and School of History at the University of Haifa.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Documents: CIA Warned Of Plane Bomb Plot (MH)

By Andrew O. Selsky

The Miami Herald, October 10, 2006

SAN JUAN, Puerto Rico - An anti-Castro militant now in a Texas jail warned the CIA months before the 1976 bombing of a Cuban airliner that fellow exiles were planning such an attack, according to a newly released U.S. government document.

The document shows that Luis Posada Carriles - who had worked for the CIA but was cut off by the agency earlier that year - was secretly telling the CIA that his fellow far-right Cuban exiles opposed to Fidel Castro's communist government were plotting to bring down a commercial jet.

The document does not say what the CIA did with Posada's tip. A CIA spokesman said he had no comment on Monday, a federal holiday.

The CIA had extensive contacts with anti-Castro militants and trained some of them, but has denied involvement in the bombing.

The documents were posted online Thursday by the National Security Archive, an independent research institute at George Washington University that seeks to declassify government files through the Freedom of Information Act.

The Cubana Airlines plane, on a flight from Venezuela to Cuba, blew up shortly after taking off from a stopover in Barbados on Oct. 6, 1976, killing all 73 aboard, including Cuba's Olympic fencing team.

The bombing remains an open wound in Cuba. Weeping relatives of the victims met in a Havana cemetery on Friday, the 30th anniversary of the bombing. They demanded that Posada - who is now 78 and in a Texas detention center on an immigration violation - be put on trial.

Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez is seeking the extradition of Posada, a naturalized Venezuelan who served as the country's counterintelligence chief. He accuses the U.S. government of protecting a terrorist.

The National Security Archive's Peter Kornbluh urged the U.S. government to tell everything it knows about Posada.

"Now is the time for the government to come clean on Posada's covert past and his involvement in international terrorism," Kornbluh said. "His victims, the public, and the courts have a right to know."

Separating deception from truth in the intelligence world is notoriously difficult, and the newly released documents contain mixed messages about Posada. Much remains murky.

In a report dated a month after the bombing, then FBI Director Clarence Kelly told Secretary of State Henry Kissinger that a confidential FBI source ascertained the bombing had been planned in Caracas by Posada, Venezuelan intelligence agency official Ricardo Morales Navarrete and Cuban exile Frank Castro, who is not related to the Cuban leader.

Two Venezuelan employees of Posada's private security agency were arrested in Trinidad the day after the bombing, and one of them - who said he had worked for the CIA - admitted the two had planted the bomb, documents posted by the National Security Archive show.

Posada trained with the CIA for the 1961 Bay of Pigs invasion and served in the U.S. Army in the early 1960s. In 1965, he allegedly plotted to overthrow the Guatemalan government and blow up a Soviet or Cuban freighter in Mexico, according to the FBI. In 1967, he moved to Venezuela, eventually leading its counterintelligence agency, and was running his own security firm in the mid-1970s.

In 1973, Posada was investigated by the CIA for allegedly smuggling cocaine, but was cleared after he convinced interrogators he was "guilty of only having the wrong kind of friends," a declassified document says. The same document says the CIA "formally terminated" its relationship with him on Feb. 13, 1976.

Yet Posada still contacted the agency.

"After 2/76 contacts with (deleted by censors) were at Posada's own initiative to volunteer information in exchange for assistance U.S. visa for self and family," said the document, an annotated list of still-secret records on Posada's CIA career that was marked "sanitized."

It tells how Posada contacted the CIA in February 1976 to describe an assassination plot by Orlando Bosch and Frank Castro, two fellow right-wing Cuban exiles, against leftist Andres Pascal Allende, the nephew of slain Chilean President Salvador Allende. Posada worried that his allies would discover he was giving up their secrets.

"Posada concerned that Bosch will blame Posada for leak of plans," the report says. Andres Allende was not assassinated, and it is unclear whether the Cuban exiles ever made an attempt on his life.

Then, four months later, Posada came back to tell of a sinister plot to blow up an airliner.

On June 22, 1976, "Posada again contacts (deleted by censor) reptd info concerning possible exile plans to blow up Cubana Airliner leaving Panama and requested visa assistacne," read the document, filled with typographical errors.

Shortly after, a bomb aboard a Cubana Airlines plane leaving Panama failed to detonate, and the following month, a bomb in a suitcase exploded before being loaded onto a Cubana plane leaving Jamaica, according to a confidential State Department memo previously posted by the National Security Archive.

The day after the Cubana Airlines flight was bombed near Barbados, the CIA tried unsuccessfully to contact Posada, according to the annotated list. Five days later, Posada was arrested in Venezuela. He denied involvement in the bombing and escaped from prison in 1985 before a civilian trial was completed.

Allegations that he masterminded mass murder did not keep U.S. covert operatives from hiring Posada again. Within months, he was delivering weapons to Nicaraguan Contra rebels in an illegal Reagan administration operation. Posada also acknowledged, and then denied, a role in Havana hotel bombings in 1997 that killed a tourist.

And in 2000, Posada was arrested for allegedly plotting to assassinate Castro during a summit in Panama. He was pardoned in 2004 by then Panamanian President Mireya Moscoso.

Posada was detained in Florida in May 2005 for entering the United States illegally. A U.S. immigration judge has ruled that he cannot be sent to Cuba or Venezuela, citing fears that he would be tortured.

Castro Foe Puts U.S. In An Awkward Spot (NYT)

By Marc Lacey

The New York Times, October 10, 2006

EL PASO, Oct. 6 — Thirty years ago, long before liquids and gels were restricted on airliners, a tube of Colgate toothpaste may have brought a plane down from the sky.

Cubana Airlines Flight 455 crashed off the coast of Barbados on Oct. 6, 1976, killing all 73 people aboard. Plastic explosives stuffed into a toothpaste tube ignited the plane, according to recently declassified police records.

Implicated in the attack, but never convicted, was Luis Posada Carriles, a Cuban exile who has long sought to topple the government of Fidel Castro.

Today, Mr. Posada, 78, is in a detention center in El Paso, held on an immigration violation while the government tries to figure out what to do with him. His case presents a quandary for the Bush administration, at least in part because Mr. Posada is a former C.I.A. operative and United States Army officer who directed his wrath at a government that Washington has long opposed.

Despite insistent calls from Cuba and Venezuela for his extradition, the administration has refused to send him to either country for trial.

Intensifying the problem is that Mr. Posada, who was arrested last year in Miami after sneaking into the country, may soon go free because the United States has been reluctant to press the terrorism charges that could keep him in jail.

That prospect has brought a hail of criticism of the Bush administration for holding a double standard when it comes to those who commit terrorist acts.

“The fight against terrorism cannot be fought à la carte,” said José Pertierra, a Washington lawyer who is representing the government of Venezuela in its effort to extradite Mr. Posada. “A terrorist is a terrorist.”

The Bush administration has stopped short of prosecuting him as a terrorist, however, even though the Justice Department called him as much this week. In papers filed in federal court in El Paso on Thursday, it described him as “an unrepentant criminal and admitted mastermind of terrorist plots and attacks on tourist sites.”

Instead, Mr. Posada faces immigration charges, as the Bush administration tries its best to deport him somewhere else, where he would walk free.

Few countries seem willing to take him. So far, Canada, Costa Rica, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, Mexico and Panama have all turned down American requests to take Mr. Posada, who denies that he bombed the plane but who is linked to the case in declassified C.I.A. and F.B.I. files.

"Who would want him?" asked one lawyer close to the case, who spoke on the condition that he not be identified because of the delicacy of the litigation. "Wherever he goes there will be intelligence agents from a variety of nations following him, not to mention hit squads."

Two countries do want Mr. Posada: Venezuela, where he is wanted for blowing up the plane, and Cuba, where he is viewed as an enemy of the state who has repeatedly tried to assassinate Mr. Castro.

An immigration judge has ruled that Mr. Posada may be subject to torture in those two countries. But because no other country has stepped forward, and because he has not been officially deemed a terrorist by the American government, a federal judge recommended last month — coincidentally on Sept. 11 — that Mr. Posada be released.

The Bush administration is now invoking a law that bars the release of an illegal immigrant who poses adverse foreign policy consequences for the United States. That tack has placed it in the awkward position of, in effect, having to call Mr. Posada a terrorist even as it refuses to charge him as one.

Mr. Posada has longstanding links to American intelligence agencies, and his colorful past helps to explain why this is not a garden variety terrorism case. One immigration judge involved in the proceedings described them as being "not unlike one of Robert Ludlum's espionage thrillers."

A former sugar chemist and exterminator in Cuba, Mr. Posada has been working in the shadows to carry out a policy not unlike the one Washington has advocated over the decades — the removal of Mr. Castro.

"How can you call someone a terrorist who allegedly committed acts on your behalf?" asked Felipe D. J. Millan, Mr. Posada's El Paso-based lawyer. "This would be the equivalent of calling Patrick Henry or Paul Revere or Benjamin Franklin a terrorist."

Mr. Posada received military training in the United States and worked for the C.I.A. as far back as the failed Bay of Pigs invasion. He played a role in supplying the contras in Nicaragua. He has admitted, but subsequently denied, involvement in a string of bombings of Cuban tourist facilities.

By the time the Cubana Airlines plane exploded, Mr. Posada was no longer in the employ of the C.I.A. But records show that he may have notified his former bosses that a bomb was going to be set off on a plane shortly before it happened.

Venezuela and Cuba staged events on Friday, the 30th anniversary of the airplane bombing, where Mr. Bush was condemned for his government's failure to turn over Mr. Posada. A billboard posted outside the United States Interest Section in Havana features the image of Mr. Bush, Mr. Posada and Hitler.

Some of the anger directed at the Bush administration's handling of the case originates closer to home. Roseanne Nenninger Persaud, whose 19-year-old brother, Raymond, was one of the passengers who perished, recently wrote a letter to Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales urging him to brand Mr. Posada a terrorist.

"It feels like a double standard," Ms. Nenninger, who was born in Guyana but has since become an American citizen, said in a telephone interview from New York. "He should be treated like bin Laden. If this were a plane full of Americans, it would have been a different story."

A majority of the victims were Cubans, including the entire Olympic fencing team, which was returning from a competition in Venezuela. Guyanese and North Koreans made up most of the other passengers.

"Luis Posada Carriles is a terrorist, but he's our terrorist," said Peter Kornbluh of the National Security Archive at George Washington University, which has been unearthing documents on Mr. Posada's case. "The historical baggage that he brought with him when he sneaked into the U.S. has created this dilemma for the Bush administration."

Getting out of jail has not been a problem for Mr. Posada in the past. In Venezuela, where he was held in the prison bombing, he had associates bribe a guard and he walked out dressed as a priest in 1985. In Panama, where he was implicated in a plot to kill Mr. Castro during a visit there, the departing president pardoned him in 2004.

He appears headed for release again, this time from a nondescript holding center ringed by barbed wire near El Paso's airport.

Mr. Posada's cloak-and-dagger past — his aliases, his fake passports, his life on the run through Latin America — is over, insists his Miami-based lawyer, Eduardo R. Soto.

In fact, even before Mr. Castro fell ill and ceded power to his brother, Mr. Posada declared his campaign to topple the Cuban leader by force to be over.

"The Cuban government is in a very deteriorated condition, inexorably reaching its end, and I sincerely believe that nothing would help to go back to the past with sabotage campaigns," Mr. Posada said.

Mr. Posada's case has eerie parallels with the case of Orlando Bosch, an associate who has also been accused of playing a role in the bombing. The administration of Mr. Bush's father released Mr. Bosch from prison in 1990, a step praised by many in Florida's Cuban community. Now 80, he lives outside Miami.

Mr. Posada is two years younger and in failing health, partly the result of a 1990 assassination attempt against him. His application to become a United States citizen has been rejected by the government, but Mr. Posada, who is a naturalized Venezuelan citizen, is pursuing the matter on appeal.

Mr. Soto says Mr. Posada wants to devote whatever time he has left in life to members of his family who live in South Florida, and to a hobby he picked up years ago in prison — painting.

Way Radical, Dude (WP)

Now Playing: Video Games With an Islamist Twist

A new video game lets players kill President Bush. It's called "Quest for Bush." It looks a lot like a game that hit the market three years ago, called "Quest for Saddam."

In the venerable shoot-'em-up genre, who's the hero and who's the enemy depends on who's programming the game.

"Quest for Bush," a.k.a. "Night of Bush Capturing," is a free online game released by the Global Islamic Media Front, a radical organization that has ties with al-Qaeda. Armed with a rifle, a shotgun or a grenade launcher, players navigate various missions that include "Jihad Growing Up," "Americans' Hell" and "Bush Hunted Like a Rat." In the final stage, you fight Bush.

It's the latest -- and most extreme -- addition to a small but growing list of Islamic video games, monitored by the Defense Department and much blogged about in gaming circles. Some are free, others are not. Either way, they champion issues from an Islamic perspective, in stark contrast to many Western-made games that generally cast Muslims and Arabs as the bad guys. Furthermore, they underscore a brewing game-design war between East and West, a simmering tension of who's writing (and rewriting) history.

"There's a very interesting tit-for-tat going on here, a weird kind of dialogue," says Ed Halter, author of the book "From Sun Tzu to Xbox: War and Video Games," published in May, and a contributing writer for the Village Voice. "And what's disconcerting about it is that the conversation is often reduced to the lowest common denominator of violent action in games, which is in a way very reflective of the overall way things are going right now in real life."

Radwan Kasmiya, a 31-year-old gamer, can't stand titles such as "Counter-Strike," "Close Combat: First to Fight" and "America's Army," the free online game -- with more than 7.5 million users -- released in 2002 by the U.S. Army to help bolster recruitment.

"We're the terrorist, the enemy, in these games," says Kasmiya. He runs the Syria-based Afkar Media, one of a handful of struggling commercial game publishers in the Islamic world. Speaking on the phone from his Damascus office, he's quick to distinguish his games from "Quest for Bush," which has been downloaded a few thousand times on the Internet. Two clips on the video-sharing site YouTube.com have been viewed nearly 11,000 times. "Nothing but propaganda," he says of that game. He's played it, he says, and calls it "hateful."

"UnderAsh," released by Afkar Media in 2002, views the first intifada from the eyes of Ahmad, a Palestinian teenager resisting the Israeli occupation. Last year a sequel was released. A teaser to "UnderSiege," which tells the stories of five Palestinian families during the second intifada, shows a Palestinian teenager being shot on the street; an Israeli soldier appears to pound him with a concrete block seconds later. "Our games are not propaganda," Kasmiya says. "Our games are a reflection of our history -- past or present. The fact is, most movies, most TV shows, most video games put Muslims in a bad light, so we have to try to tell our side of the story."

Retired Maj. Chris Chambers, deputy director of the Army Game Project, insists "America's Army" doesn't "pick on a single enemy." The country is at war, he says, and the terrorists depicted in "America's Army" come from "all over the world," including the Middle East. "There's no focus on one particular region or one particular people," says Chambers, who helped design the game.

But as with anything, people are free to interpret the game any way they want, he adds.

One of the first Islamic games to gain attention in the Middle East is a free online game called "The Stone Throwers," says Halter. It was created by a Syrian medical student and released in 2000, weeks after the start of the second intifada. According to its Web site, the game is "dedicated to those who lost their lives for the homeland and all those who are fighting for freedom." Other game publishers such as Techniat 3D and Imaginations -- the former based in Syria, the latter in the United Arab Emirates -- developed fantasy-based adventure games such as "Zoya" and "Legend of Zord." But both companies folded in the past five years, unable to find a sizable audience in the Middle East, where piracy is commonplace and U.S.-made games are popular, Kasmiya says. None of these games -- free or not -- have been purchased or downloaded "more than a few thousand times," he adds.

The Washington-based Middle East Media Research Institute, a nonpartisan group that translates Arabic language television and Web sites, says that in June, Sheik Nabil Al-Awadhi, who has a weekly show on the Kuwaiti channel Al-Rai TV called "Sa'at Saraha" ("An Hour of Sincerity"), spoke of the need for Islamic games that compete with Western games. He also suggested developing a game in which the Muslim player "slaughters the Jews and liberates the Al-Aqsa Mosque." In the West, they turn their wars against Muslims into games, he said, and Muslims should do the same.

Dennis McCauley, who runs the blog Gamepolitics.com, says: "There is a game design war taking place, at least in the sense that today's games are a mass communications vehicle for reaching young people. The Defense Department distributes 'America's Army' for free as both a recruiting tool and a way to market the image of our armed forces. The game is hugely popular. It's no surprise that Islamic extremists are trying to achieve the same goal and imitate that success."

This past summer, the Union of Islamic Student Societies, an Iranian political group, announced that it was developing a game -- as a retort to a U.S.-made game. Last year, the New York-based Kuma Games released a free online game called "Assault on Iran," in which players take on the role of a U.S. Special Forces soldier trying to destroy Iran's nukes. In the Iranian group's game, set for release this March, a fictional "Commander Bahman" fights U.S. Special Forces and rescues Iranian atomic scientists. In response to that response, Keith Halper, head of Kuma Games, said his company will create a sequel to the Iranian-made game from the United States' point of view.

"It's propaganda, but it's also a form of debate," Halper says. "We have made a point, they have responded."

The gunplay in "Quest for Bush" is crude, akin to "Doom," the godfather of shoot-'em-up games. The goal is to kill. It's in English and Arabic and takes about 30 minutes to play. In the beginning, the player goes around what looks like a U.S. military camp, with walls plastered with photos of President Bush, Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld and British Prime Minister Tony Blair, among others.

"Quest for Bush" is a "mod"-- or modification -- of "Quest for Saddam," released by the California-based Petrilla Entertainment in 2003 for $14.95. The company sold about 3,000 copies of the game.

"They say imitation is the highest form of flattery. But I'm not flattered," says Jesse Petrilla, who created "Quest for Saddam." Last year he founded the United American Committee, a political action group that has used techniques such as hanging Osama bin Laden in effigy in front of a mosque in Culver City, Calif. He says his group seeks to remind Americans of "the threat that radical Islam poses to all of us."

His latest response in this gaming war, says the 23-year-old, is to make "Quest for Saddam" free for players.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Treasury Weighs Broader Scrutiny Of Wire Transfers (WSJ)

By Damian Paletta

The Wall Street Journal, October 10, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Treasury Department, amid a backdrop of industry protests, is considering whether to require banks and other financial companies that allow international wire transfers to give the government data on about 500 million transactions each year.

Financial institutions are required to retain some of this information, but the government requests it only in specific circumstances. The financial institutions complain it isn't clear whether regulators are effectively analyzing this information and other records they already provide.

A senior Treasury Department official said he has asked Secretary Henry Paulson to approve the massive new data-collection regime. More than a year ago, the Treasury Department's Financial Crimes Enforcement Network began reviewing whether such a data-collection exercise would be feasible in preventing and tracking money laundering and terrorist financing.

Robert Werner, director of the Financial Crimes Enforcement Network, said his agency has sent the review on to Treasury Department officials and is waiting for a determination from Mr. Paulson. "Based on the work we've done, it's clear there is value" in this information, Mr. Werner said after a speech to the American Bankers Association. "The money trail is just going to be that much more robust."

The banking industry has objected to the planned data-collection regime. Now, banks and wire-transfer companies have to retain wire-transfer information only in case the government asks for it later. The new program would require companies to directly send information about each wire transfer to the government.

Mr. Werner said any program would take into account complaints registered by the banking industry. Specifically, banks have said that a massive government program could make it difficult to protect the privacy of each wire-transfer customer. It also could become costly for banks to comply with such a program, the banking industry has said.

"Our feasibility study will outline these issues and propose an approach for addressing them," Mr. Werner said.

An announcement from the Treasury Department regarding the program could come in the next few weeks.

Mr. Werner said the proposed program would be different from an existing program that allows the government to monitor thousands of wire transfers for links to terrorism through a database in Belgium, known as Swift.

Homeland Security Bill Helps 9/11 Lawsuits (WT)

By Shaun Waterman, United Press International

The Washington Times, October 9, 2006

A little-noticed provision of the Homeland Security Appropriations Act signed by the president last week will help move forward a multibillion-dollar September 11 lawsuit against two U.S. airlines by making it easier for plaintiffs to get restricted information about the nation's pre-attack aviation security system.

Section 525 of the conference report that is part of the law, instructs Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff to draft within 30 days new regulations for the system of sensitive security information, or SSI, administered by the Transportation Security Administration (TSA).

The regulations, says the report, should provide for the release of most SSI more than three years old, unless the information is still current or the secretary makes a written determination that it must stay protected. To do so, he must provide "a rational reason," which will "identify and describe the specific risk to the national transportation system."

The regulations should also include a mechanism for SSI to be made available in civil court cases if the judge determines it is needed and if the party needing it cannot get it elsewhere without "undue hardship." The lawmakers say they "expect that a party will be able to demonstrate undue hardship to the judge if equivalent information is not available in one month's time."

To get access to the information, plaintiff's lawyers will have to pass a background check of criminal and terrorism-suspect watchlists like that any aviation worker with access to the information would require, according to the report. The language still allows officials to block the court's access to SSI, if they can "demonstrate" that it "presents a risk of harm to the nation."

The new law instructs Mr. Chertoff to report back to the Appropriations committees within 120 days on his compliance.

The provision was welcomed by relatives of victims of the September 11 attacks. Family members who support the lawsuits have long contended that the TSA is using restrictions on information to hide the culpability of the airlines and the federal authorities.

"We call on TSA to comply fully with both the letter and the spirit of this new law," said Alice Hoagland, mother of Mark Bingham.

Her son was one of the United Airlines Flight 93 passengers who stormed the cockpit, preventing the hijackers from striking their intended target -- thought to have been either the White House or the Capitol.

"This is information about a defunct aviation system," said former Federal Aviation Administration Special Agent Brian Sullivan of the documents that TSA is trying to protect. He accused officials of "protecting the FAA from embarrassment and the airlines from liability."

About 60 cases in which relatives of the victims of the September 11 attacks are suing United and American Airlines have been consolidated in the U.S. District Court of New York. The plaintiffs say the airlines' negligence allowed the attackers to board with the short knives and box cutters used in the attacks.

WAR NEWS:

G.O.P.'s Baker Hints Iraq Plan Needs Change (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, October 9, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 8 — James A. Baker III, the Republican co-chairman of a bipartisan panel reassessing Iraq strategy for President Bush, said Sunday that he expected the panel would depart from Mr. Bush's repeated calls to "stay the course," and he strongly suggested that the White House enter direct talks with countries it had so far kept at arm's length, including Iran and Syria.

"I believe in talking to your enemies," he said in an interview on the ABC News program "This Week," noting that he made 15 trips to Damascus, the Syrian capital, while serving Mr. Bush's father as secretary of state.

"It's got to be hard-nosed, it's got to be determined," Mr. Baker said. "You don't give away anything, but in my view, it's not appeasement to talk to your enemies."

Mr. Bush refused to deal with Iran until this spring, when he said the United States would join negotiations with Tehran if it suspended enriching nuclear fuel. Iran has so far refused. Contacts with both Syria and North Korea have also been sharply limited.

But the "Iraq Study Group," created by Mr. Baker last March with the encouragement of some members of Congress to come up with new ideas on Iraq strategy, has already talked to some representatives of Iran and Syria about Iraq's future, he said.

His comments Sunday offered the first glimmer of what other members of his study group, in interviews over the past two weeks, have described as an effort to find a politically face-saving way for Mr. Bush slowly to extract the United States from the war. "I think it's fair to say our commission believes that there are alternatives between the stated alternatives, the ones that are out there in the political debate, of 'stay the course' and 'cut and run,' " Mr. Baker said.

He explicitly rejected a rapid withdrawal from Iraq, saying that would invite Iran, Syria and "even our friends in the gulf" to fill the power vacuum. He also dismissed, as largely unworkable, a proposal by Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr., the ranking Democrat on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, to decentralize Iraq and give the country's three major sectarian groups, the Kurds, Shiites and Sunnis, their own regions, distributing oil revenue to all. Mr. Baker said he had concluded "there's no way to draw lines" in Iraq's major cities, where ethnic groups are intermingled.

According to White House officials and commission members, Mr. Baker has been talking to President Bush and his national security adviser, Stephen J. Hadley, on a regular basis. Those colleagues say he is unlikely to issue suggestions that the president has not tacitly approved in advance.

"He's a very loyal Republican, and you won't see him go against Bush," said a colleague of Mr. Baker, who asked not to be identified because the study group is keeping a low profile before it formally issues recommendations. "But he feels that the yearning for some responsible way out which would not damage American interests is palpable, and the frustration level is exceedingly high."

At 76, Mr. Baker still enjoys a reputation as one of Washington's craftiest bureaucratic operators and as a trusted adviser of the Bush family, which has enlisted his help for some of its deepest crises, including the second President Bush's effort to win the vote recount in Florida after the 2000 presidential election. Mr. Baker served as White House chief of staff, as well as secretary of state under the first President Bush.

Andrew H. Card Jr., President Bush's former chief of staff, acknowledged recently that he had twice suggested that Mr. Baker would be a good replacement for Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld. Mr. Bush rejected that advice, and some associates of Mr. Baker say they do not believe he is interested, at his age, in taking the job, which could put him in the position of having to carry out his group's advice.

Those proposals — which he has said must be both bipartisan and unanimous — could very well give Mr. Bush some political latitude, should he decide to adopt strategies that he had once rejected, like setting deadlines for a phased withdrawal of American forces.

Given his extraordinary loyalty to the Bush family — Mr. Baker was present on Saturday at the formal christening of a new aircraft carrier named for the first President Bush — it was notable on Sunday that Mr. Baker also joined the growing number of Republicans who are trying to create some space between themselves and the White House.

On Sunday, on "This Week," Mr. Baker was shown a video of the Republican chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, Senator John W. Warner of Virginia, who said last week that Iraq was "drifting sideways" and urged consideration of a "change of course" if the Iraqi government could not restore order in two or three months. The American ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, has offered a similar warning to the Iraqi government.

Asked if he agreed with that timetable, Mr. Baker said, "Yes, absolutely. And we're taking a look at other alternatives."

The Iraq Study Group, created with the reluctant blessing of the White House, includes notable Republicans and Democrats, among them William J. Perry, a former defense secretary under President Clinton; former Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani of New York; the former Supreme Court justice Sandra Day O'Connor; and Vernon E. Jordan Jr., a longtime civil rights leader. Mr. Baker's Democratic co-chairman is Lee H. Hamilton, the former Congressman who once served as the chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee and was co-chairman of the 9/11 commission.

In interviews, members of the study group have privately expressed concern that within months, whatever course the group recommended could be overtaken by the chaos in Iraq. "I think the big question is whether we can come up with something before it's too late," one member said late last month, after the group had met in Washington to assess its conclusions after a trip to Baghdad. "There's a real sense that the clock is ticking, that Bush is desperate for a change, but no one in the White House can bring themselves to say so with this election coming."

Like other members, he declined to speak on the record, saying public comments should come only from Mr. Baker or Mr. Hamilton.

Several members said they were struck during their visit to Baghdad by how many Americans based there — political and intelligence officers as well as members of the military — said they feared that the United States was stuck between two bad alternatives: pulling back and watching sectarian violence soar, or remaining a crucial part of the new effort to secure Baghdad, at the cost of much higher American casualties.

It was a measure of how much the situation had deteriorated that only one member of the group, former Senator Charles S. Robb of Virginia, ventured beyond the protected walls of the Green Zone, the American and government center of Baghdad. The study group is just now finishing its interviews, and Mr. Baker has not yet begun to draft the report, members said.

Some who have already met with the group, like Mr. Biden, who may seek the Democratic nomination for president, have emerged saying they think their ideas are being heard. On Friday, Mr. Biden said he thought he saw "heads nodding up and down" about his ideas on creating autonomous regions of the country, but Mr. Baker made clear on Sunday that he was not among them.

"Experts on Iraq have suggested that, if we do that, that in itself will trigger a huge civil war because the major cities in Iraq are mixed," Mr. Baker said.

Mr. Baker has been critical of how the Bush administration conducted post-invasion operations, and he has not backed away from statements he made in his 1995 memoir, in which he described opposing the ouster of Saddam Hussein after the Persian Gulf war in 1991. In the book, he said he feared that such action might lead to a civil war, "even if Saddam were captured and his regime toppled, American forces would still be confronted with the specter of a military occupation of indefinite duration to pacify the country and sustain a new government."

On Sunday, the interviewer, George Stephanopoulos, said, "It's exactly what's happened now, isn't it?" Mr. Baker replied, "A lot of it."

Baker Predicts 'Civil War' If Iraq Divided (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 9, 2006

Iraq Study Group co-chairman James A. Baker III yesterday denied reports suggesting that his government-advisory group would recommend breaking up Iraq along ethnic lines, saying such a move could "trigger a huge civil war."

At the same time, Mr. Baker, who was secretary of state during the 1990-91 Persian Gulf War, agreed with assessments that Iraq has about "two or three months" to improve its security situation.

During an appearance yesterday on ABC's "This Week," Mr. Baker was asked whether a proposal by Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. for breaking up Iraq into semiautonomous regions is supported by members of the Iraq Study Group.

Mr. Biden, Delaware Democrat, recently told "This Week" moderator George Stephanopoulos that "he saw a lot of heads nodding in agreement" when he presented his plan to the group.

"A lot of the people we've talked to, particularly experts on Iraq, have suggested that, if we do that, that in itself will trigger a huge civil war because the major cities in Iraq are mixed," Mr. Baker said.

A weekend report in the Times of London said the Iraq Study Group was prepared to deliver a recommendation to President Bush and Congress that would call for dividing Iraq into three mostly autonomous regions. The paper quoted a source close to the group as saying, "The Kurds already effectively have their own area. The federalisation of Iraq is going to take place one way or another. The challenge for the Iraqis is how to work that through."

However, Mr. Baker appeared to reject such a proposal yesterday.

"There's no way to draw lines between Sunnis, Shia and Kurds in the major cities of Baghdad, Basra, Mosul, Kirkuk. And furthermore, there are no boundaries between the Sunni areas and the Shi'ite areas in Iraq," Mr. Baker said. "And the minute you say you're going to do that and make three autonomous regions, you're likely to kick off a big civil war."

However, Mr. Baker also said his group has not rejected Mr. Biden's proposal.

"We haven't rejected a lot of suggestions. We simply haven't concluded our report yet."

During an appearance on CNN's "Late Edition" yesterday, Mr. Biden said his plan was more reasonable than Mr. Bush's Iraq strategy.

"I'm not a person calling for cut and run. The president of the United States has not given the military commanders all they've needed," Mr. Biden said.

"The fact of the matter is, everyone from John Warner on," he said referring to the Republican chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, "knows there's a need for radical change in policy and a political settlement here. There needs to be a political solution."

After his recent trip to Baghdad, Mr. Warner, Virginia Republican, said, "In two to three months' time, if this thing hasn't come to fruition and this government [is not] able to function, I think it's a responsibility of our government internally to determine: Is there a change of course we should take?"

Although the Iraq Study Group is holding its findings until after the November elections, Mr. Baker has said he does not think an immediate withdrawal of U.S. forces from Iraq should be under consideration.

"I think that if we picked up and left right now that you would see the biggest civil war you've ever seen," Mr. Baker said. "Every neighboring country would be involved in there, doing its own thing, Turkey, Iran, Syria, you name it, and even our friends in the Gulf. So I do not think that that is an option."

A Capital Gumshoe Hits It Big (USNEWS)

By Liz Halloran

U.S. News and World Report, October 16, 2006

On its face, it looked like a Washington version of a "did not, did so" schoolyard standoff. But the stakes were a whole lot higher. At issue are the assertions in Bob Woodward's new book about what Bush administration officials knew about the terrorists' plans in the months leading up to 9/11.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice insisted she had no recollection of a July 10, 2001, meeting described in Woodward's State of Deial-a meeting at which she was allegedly dismissive of CIA warnings that an attack was imminent. Days later, however, Rice acknowledged through her chief spokesman that she had been briefed by the CIA "on or around" that date-and added that she had instructed her staff to pass on the CIA's information to then Attorney General John Ashcroft and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld.

Rice's embarrassing flip-flop illustrates once again the unique clout that Woodward still wields 3 1/2 decades after he and Carl Bernstein uncovered the Watergate scandal. "When Bob Woodward speaks," says John Walcott, chief of the McClatchy newspaper chain's Washington bureau, "the secretary of state has to respond."

Though it was overshadowed last week by the evolving congressional page scandal, the new book was instantly a No. 1 bestseller, like 10 of the 14 books he has either written or coauthored. Unlike his past two books on the Bush administration, State of Denial takes an unsparing look at the administration's bungled post-invasion policy in Iraq. "This is a do-over," said commentator Arianna Huffington, who is among those who say Woodward's reputation was damaged by his previous favorable "Bush at war" books. "He wants to make it appear that he hasn't changed, the facts on the ground have changed. That's simply not true." Woodward has responded to such criticism by saying his latest round of reporting simply turned up new information.

Hot topics. Debate about Woodward's reporting has raged since the 1970s, although his influence has never waned. There have been several illuminating books published in the past year about the Bush administration's prosecution of the war in Iraq-from Ron Suskind's One Percent Doctrine to Thomas Ricks's Fiasco: The American Military Adventure in Iraq. But only Woodward's drew a White House press-release rebuttal.

The most common criticisms of Woodward, 63, are that he is too easily manipulated by the accounts of Washington insiders who cooperate with his reporting efforts and that he recounts endless strings of facts without context. Woodward was given access to President Bush and other top officials for his first two books on the administration, but he was refused interviews with the president for State of Denial. (The administration has said it believed Woodward had an agenda.) Some dramatic scenes Woodward reported in previous books-a teary Richard Nixon praying with Secretary of State Henry Kissinger; CIA Director William Casey's deathbed admission of the Iran-contra scheme-have been questioned.

There are other criticisms, as well. Thomas Edsall, a retired Washington Post reporter now teaching at Columbia School of Journalism and writing for the New Republic, says his former colleague, along with some reporters for other A-list newspapers, has ready access to high-level government officials but often fails to check their accounts of events with secondary and tertiary sources.

Old-fashioned. Woodward calls such criticisms unfounded. "I understand that there can be a misperception about my method, but if you look in the book's index, you'll see just as many midlevel staffers and Rumsfeld aides as high-profile names," he said last week. "This book makes me feel good about old-fashioned, straight journalism." Woodward defended his past glowing characterizations of the Bush administration as describing their actions during a different time. But he says he feels he erred in his earlier reporting on Rumsfeld, who comes off very poorly in State of Denial. "I should have looked at him sooner," he said.

Even his sternest critics, however, give Woodward credit for his work ethic and determination, his keen interviewing skill, his exhaustive knowledge of the nation's capital and how it works, and for not harboring a political agenda.

So what's Woodward's next book likely to be? "For the country's sake," he said, "I hope it's Bush at Peace." Whatever it is, it almost certainly will be a bestseller that will kick off yet another spirited dissection of one of the nation's most famous journalists.

Secret Iraq Meeting Included Journalists (NYT)

By Julie Bosman

The New York Times, October 9, 2006

It was the kind of shadowy, secret Washington meeting that Bob Woodward is fond of describing in detail. In his new book, "State of Denial," he writes that on Nov. 29, 2001, a dozen policy makers, Middle East experts and members of influential policy research organizations gathered in Virginia at the request of Paul D. Wolfowitz, then the deputy secretary of defense. Their objective was to produce a report for President Bush and his cabinet outlining a strategy for dealing with Afghanistan and the Middle East in the aftermath of 9/11.

What was more unusual, Mr. Woodward reveals, was the presence of journalists at the meeting. Fareed Zakaria, the editor of Newsweek International and a Newsweek columnist, and Robert D. Kaplan, now a national correspondent for The Atlantic Monthly, attended the meeting and, according to Mr. Kaplan, signed confidentiality agreements not to discuss what happened.

While members of policy research groups often dispense advice to administration officials, journalists do not typically attend secret meetings or help compile government reports. Indeed, many Washington journalists complain that the current administration keeps them at an unhealthy distance.

Mr. Zakaria takes issue with Mr. Woodward's account, saying that while he attended the meeting for several hours, he does not recall being told that a report would be produced.

"I thought it was a brainstorming session," he said. "I was never told that there was going to be a document summarizing our views and I have never seen such a document." (Mr. Woodward wrote that the report, which supported the invasion of Iraq, caused Mr. Bush to focus on the "malignancy" of the Middle East situation.)

Mr. Kaplan said much of the meeting was spent drafting and reworking the document, which in the end carried the names of all 12 participants and was "a forceful summary of some of the best pro-war arguments at the time." Could any of the participants have been unaware there was a document in the making? "No, that's not possible," he said.

Mr. Kaplan, who was then a freelancer at The Atlantic Monthly, said he spoke to his editor before attending, and was given approval to attend because "everybody was in a patriotic fervor."

Mr. Zakaria said he felt participating was appropriate because his views, as a columnist for Newsweek, were public, although he has never divulged his involvement to his readers.

"My column is an analytical column," he said, adding that he gives advice to policy makers and elected officials: "If a senator calls me up and asks me what should we do in Iraq, I'm happy to talk to him." JULIE BOSMAN

Death Squads Online (NSWK)

By Christian Caryl And Michael Hastings, Newsweek

Newsweek, October 9, 2006

As if things weren't bad enough, now Iraq's sectarian butchers are posting their execution lists on the Internet.

Not long ago, Mohammed Kika found out that his name had appeared on a London-based Web site run by Sunni exiles from Iraq. The Baghdad man was accused of betraying other Sunnis to a Shiite militia in the mixed neighborhood of Mansour, receiving a $200 bounty for each one he identified. The posting even disclosed the name of the barbershop where Kika could be found. He ran for his life, friends and family told NEWSWEEK. At first he hid out in the Shiite neighborhood of Karrada, and then he fled the country.

Iraq's sectarian war is spreading onto the Web. Some Iraqis, like Kika, have been forced into hiding or exile after being targeted on the Internet. Others may have run too slowly. Sunni and Shiite Web sites offer warnings to Iraqis about neighborhoods and ministries that may have been infiltrated by militias, but the sites are also increasingly used as tools by those seeking names, addresses and occupations of citizens to kill. (NEWSWEEK has found at least eight of these sites, but we have decided not to publish their Web addresses.) The outings are openly endorsed by some Iraqi leaders. Jalal al-Din Saghir, an influential Shiite cleric and parliamentary deputy, sponsors several sites. "Some of the Web sites can be used to catch spies by tracking their movements," he told NEWSWEEK.

Rising sectarian violence has become the No. 1 threat to Iraq's stability, with more than 2,500 Iraqis killed violently in September. Much of the killing is linked to death squads in Iraq's heavily Shiite police force, an agency that would scarcely exist without U.S. training and funding. Last week the U.S. military removed an entire Iraqi national police brigade from duty after American soldiers received reports that the unit was involved in death-squad activities. Military investigators are tracing possible links to the notorious Mahdi Army militia, which is believed to be running Shiite death squads in Baghdad. Efforts to build a reliable Iraqi police force seem nearly hopeless anyway: this summer alone the Interior Ministry reportedly fired at least 1,700 bad cops.

And the violence in the streets keeps getting nastier. Until recently, death threats in Iraq arrived the old-fashioned way—a flier found on a family's doorstep, warning them to leave the neighborhood or suffer the consequences. Now Iraq's sectarian killers have discovered the anonymity and long reach of the Internet.

Sunni sites provide Arabic-speaking users with a place to swap information—true or not—about alleged collaborators with Shiite death squads in Baghdad. One site's Iraqi correspondents write in with news and views—as well as exposés of corrupt officials or snitches alleged to be aiding the death squads. One of the site's organizers, Ali Ahmad, denies that he promotes violence with his site, and says he just "publishes information to fill a vacuum that the authorities can't. People can't go to the police," says the 48-year-old, an Iraqi exile and British citizen. Last week the site published a warning "not to go to the Ministry of Higher Education to accept fellowships, because it is a trap by a death squad." Another site lists more than 300 names, birthdays and locations of suspected Shiite militia members. Shiites have sites of their own, where believers are urged to avenge suicide car-bomb attacks by slaughtering Sunnis. "Let's torture them and don't be silent," wrote one recent poster.

The U.S. military tries to monitor the e-traffic, hoping to head off the killers. But the stepped-up drive against the death squads is tough on both sides: last week at least 13 U.S. troops were killed in Baghdad, one of the city's worst weeks for Americans since the war began. More bad weeks may be ahead as the fight continues. One post last week offered advice to members of the Mahdi Army on how to avoid capture by U.S. forces. "Don't wear black," the writer advised, referring to the standard Mahdi Army uniform. Other tips: "Hide your weapons," don't stand in groups, and "never admit you're a member of the militia." Just what Iraq needs: online hints for sectarian butchers.

Arrest Made In Iraq Food Poisoning Case (AP)

By Qassim Abdul-Zahra, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 10, 2006

Authorities arrested the head of the mess hall where at least 350 Iraqi policemen suffered food poisoning, and a military spokesman said Monday that it was likely the poisoning was intentional.

Brig. Qassim al-Moussawi, a senior spokesman for the Iraqi military, denied that anyone had died after Sunday's evening meal breaking the daily Ramadan fast.

On Sunday night, an official in the Environment Ministry, Jassim al-Atwan, said 11 policemen had died. Wasit provincial Gov. Hamad al-Latif said "hundreds of soldiers were poisoned" at the police base in Numaniyah, but nobody had died.

Al-Moussawi put the number of poisoned policemen at 350 to 400, but said only four victims were hospitalized.

"A number of people have been arrested, including the man in charge of the mess hall," al-Moussawi said.

He said investigators were pursuing two theories — the first that spoiled food was used in the meal, perhaps as part of a corruption scheme by the contractors or officers at the base to skim off funds for the food. But al-Moussawi said that possibility was "less likely."

The stronger possibility, he said, is that it was "intentional sabotage."

Al-Latif said the base's food and water are supplied by an Australian contractor working through Iraqi subcontractors. He did not identify the Australian company. The food is prepared elsewhere and brought to the base.

Al-Moussawi said the contractors, workers at the location where the food is prepared and others were under investigation, but would not say how many had been detained.

Sunni insurgents fighting the police and military have not been known to use poison as a weapon. The afflicted policemen belong to the 4th Division of the National Police, whose officers are mainly Shiites.

The division normally operates around the town of Salman Pak on the southeastern outskirts of Baghdad — an area of intense Shiite-Sunni fighting.

The division was sent to the base in Numaniyah, 60 miles southeast of the capital, for further training.

Poisoning Suspected After Hundreds Fall Ill At Iraqi Post (WP)

Officers Had Just Broken Ramadan Fast

BAGHDAD, Oct. 9 -- Hundreds of Iraqi army and police officers became violently ill after breaking their Ramadan fast Sunday evening at a base in southern Iraq, in what authorities are investigating as a possible mass poisoning attack.

At least 10 people died and 1,200 were sickened at a base in Numaniyah after eating a chicken dinner that may have been laced with cyanide, according to recruits and an army colonel with knowledge of the investigation. He said the food was undergoing laboratory tests.

Brig. Gen. Qassim al-Moussawi, a spokesman for the Iraqi armed forces, said the head of the base's mess hall and several other employees there had been arrested. But he said that only 350 to 400 people fell ill, that four had to be treated at a hospital and that none died.

The U.S. military announced the deaths of four troops, a soldier who was killed Monday morning by small-arms fire in eastern Baghdad and three Marines assigned to Regimental Combat Team 7 who were killed Sunday in Anbar province, the volatile Sunni insurgent stronghold.

In the southern city Diwaniyah, clashes continued Monday between U.S. troops and militiamen loyal to Shiite cleric and political leader Moqtada al-Sadr. The two sides battled a day earlier in a skirmish that the American military said left 30 militiamen dead.

Abdul Razaq al-Nadawi, the head of Sadr's office in Diwaniyah, said three people were killed at sunset when an American convoy tried to arrest a cleric loyal to Sadr. Members of Sadr's Mahdi Army responded by detonating a roadside bomb and opening fire on the convoy.

Earlier in the day, armed men connected with the Mahdi Army attacked an Iraqi police checkpoint in the northern part of the city, killing 12 officers and wounding three others, according to Brig. Gen. Hazim Mohammed Ameen of the Interior Ministry. He said joint Iraqi-American patrols cordoned off the area and all roads leading into the city and arrested 20 suspected fighters.

In Baghdad, armed men assassinated the brother of Vice President Tariq al-Hashimi, one of the country's most prominent Sunni Arab politicians. The killing of Amir al-Hashimi makes him the third sibling of Hashimi to be assassinated this year.

Also in the capital, armed men in four pickup trucks without license plates kidnapped 11 Iraqi soldiers at a checkpoint in Sadr City, the sprawling Shiite Muslim slum, Ameen said.

The genocide trial of deposed president Saddam Hussein resumed Monday after a two-week break, with a 31-year-old Kurdish woman accusing Hussein's regime of burying her family alive. Prosecutors have accused Hussein of trying to annihilate the country's Kurdish population during the 1980s.

In Diyala province, northeast of Baghdad, statements were distributed threatening widespread violence and civil disobedience if the government does not remove the commander of the 5th Iraqi Army Division and bring him to court for unspecified crimes allegedly committed during a military operation last week.

The statements, signed by "the Mujaheddin of Diyala," said that if these demands were not met, they would fire rockets and mortars at government buildings, force the closure of all schools, bar government officials from going to work and shutter all gas stations.

"And we call on all citizens who were robbed of any valuables to submit a complaint to the criminal court in the province," the statement concluded, "and they will find honorable, honest judges there who will give them back their rights."

Special correspondent Saad Sarhan in Najaf and other Washington Post staff in Iraq contributed to this report.

Meal Sickens Hundreds Of Iraqi Police Recruits (LAT)

By Doug Smith And Zeena Kareem

The Los Angeles Times, October 10, 2006

BAGHDAD — Several hundred Iraqi police recruits were being treated today in an outbreak of severe food poisoning that triggered a mutinous episode in southern Iraq, and the capital was shaken by the assassination of the vice president's brother.

Officials in Numaniyah, about 75 miles southeast of Baghdad, said disorder broke out at a military base there today, the day after the recruits became ill. Angry recruits stoned the car of their commander. FOR THE RECORD:

'Iraq Food Poisoning': The chronology of events involving a food poisoning incident in Iraq have been corrected from an earlier online version of the story. —

Authorities said they had not yet established that the food poisoning, which broke out Sunday evening, was intentional. However, several people connected with the base dining facility were arrested, including the food supplier, military spokesman Brig. Gen. Khasim Mosawi said in a televised news conference.

Some local officials feared that the poisoning reflected a new and more frightening form of terrorism in an area that has been relatively free of violence. But a security official who requested anonymity said he thought the soldiers were poisoned by meat served after its expiration date.

About 350 of the soldiers remained in two local hospitals today, officials said.

The soldiers began to collapse in pain Sunday while doing field drills after eating the large evening meal that breaks the day's fasting during the holy month of Ramadan.

DOJ_NMG_0076953

"I thought someone hiding somewhere was sniping at them with a silencer," said a base security official who would only give the name Ali.

Soldiers who did not eat the evening meal were not sickened, officials said.

Several members of the Wasit provincial council and the mayor of Numaniyah, who all asked not to be named out of fear for their safety, said they had received complaints from soldiers about abuse by Col. Amer Flaih Hasoon Dulaimi, commander of the 1,800-member National Police brigade.

They said the colonel publicly reproached the recruits after they celebrated the birth date of one of the Muslim imams with a meal and the singing of religious anthems.

In Baghdad, meanwhile, armed men arriving in a convoy of about 10 vehicles stormed the house of Amer Hashimi, killed him and his guards and kidnapped his son. Hashimi was the eldest brother of Vice President Tariq Hashimi, a top-ranking Sunni Arab politician.

Some of the attackers wore uniforms and others were in civilian clothes, a spokesman for the Iraqi Interior Ministry said.

Amer Hashimi was the third sibling of the vice president to be assassinated. Their sister, Maysoon Hashimi, was killed along with her driver in April, two weeks after a brother, Mahmoud Hashimi, was killed while driving with friends.

Amer Hashimi was an officer in Saddam Hussein's army and became the army's chief of staff from April to September 2004. He and four subordinates were dismissed after the assassination of a high-ranking officer in the Defense Ministry.

Sunni political leaders said they held the government of Prime Minister Nouri Maliki responsible for the killing because it had failed to bring Shiite Muslim militias under control. The militias have been widely accused of carrying out killings of minority Sunnis.

"What makes us wonder, is that why they make promises about the militias that they can't fulfill?" said Saleem Abdullah of the Iraqi Accordance Front. "Every time we think there is a solution it disappears."

The trial of former dictator Saddam Hussein resumed today after a nearly two-week recess. During testimony, a Kurdish woman accused the deposed government of burying her family alive after destroying her village, rounding up men, women and children and herding them into camps where they were tortured and left hungry and exposed to the elements.

"I want you to ask Saddam Hussein a question," the Kurdish woman said while testifying from behind a curtain in a heavily protected Baghdad courtroom. "What was the guilt of the women and children?"

The woman, who was 13 at the time of a large-scale counterinsurgency operation carried out by Hussein's forces in 1988, added, "I know what happened to my family. They were buried alive."

Hussein's defense attorneys again boycotted the trial, objecting to the court's decision to remove the first judge in case, who was widely perceived by Shiites and Kurds as too lenient toward the former president and the defense.

In addition to four witnesses, the prosecution presented identification cards of Kurdish victims of the 1988 campaign discovered in mass grave sites in southern Iraq. Though Iraqi security forces tried to seize the identification cards during the roundup of suspects, some victims managed to hide them on their person and smuggle them to their graves, giving forensic scientists valuable clues in building up the case.

In other developments today:

The U.S. military reported the deaths of three Marines and two Army soldiers. The Marines were killed by enemy fire in Al Anbar province in western Iraq. The soldier was killed by small-arms fire in Baghdad. Their names were not released.

Parliament set a vote for Wednesday on implementation of a federal system to transfer power from Baghdad to the provinces. The parliament will be choosing between four competing plans.

Disturbances continued in the southern city of Diwaniya where the U.S. Army said it killed 30 militants in a firefight Saturday, said Shiekh Abdul-Razaq Nadawi, manager of Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr's office in the city. He said American forces raided a mosque attempting to arrest Sheik Khudair Ansari, a leader in Sadr moment in the city. The Americans withdrew after clashing with worshippers, several of whom were injured, he said.

Besides Hashimi, at least 35 violent deaths were reported in Baghdad and elsewhere in Iraq.

Eleven 11 Iraqi soldiers were reported kidnapped in a dawn raid on a checkpoint in a Sadr stronghold in the Baghdad neighborhood of Sadr City.

U.S. Gains In Parts Of Iraq In Jeopardy (WP/AP)

By Antonio Castaneda

The Washington Post/AP, October 10, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- For months, soldiers from the 172nd Stryker Brigade fought in riverside towns of western Iraq, trying to clamp off the flow of foreign fighters and suicide bombers that commanders said were terrorizing Baghdad. Now hundreds of these same U.S. soldiers have been sent to deal with what U.S. officials say is an even greater threat _ rising attacks between Sunnis and Shiites in the capital itself.

Left behind in the dusty towns along the Euphrates River in Anbar province are fewer U.S. troops _ and fears that hard-won gains could be in jeopardy from a Sunni Arab insurgency that is far from defeated.

"Seeing the fruits of your labor lost is frustrating," said Capt. David Ramirez of the 4th Squadron, 14th Cavalry Regiment, who was sent to Baghdad from western Iraq.

The shift from Anbar to Baghdad underscores the problems facing the overstretched, 140,000-strong U.S. military force in Iraq.

To secure Baghdad, the Army had to extend the tours of thousands of soldiers from two brigades, including hundreds from the 172nd who had already returned home only to be shipped back to Iraq.

"We do not have sufficient troop strength to secure the entire country simultaneously," Andrew Krepinevich, a military analyst, said in an e-mail to The Associated Press. "Trying to be strong everywhere will lead us to being strong nowhere."

Krepinevich said he had personally recommended drawing down forces in western Anbar to U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and Vice President Dick Cheney's staff.

Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, the No. 2 commander in Iraq, defended the new strategy, saying it was necessary to "winning the main effort" in Baghdad.

Chiarelli insisted the troops were moved from the less violent parts of Anbar province.

However, four Marines were killed July 29 by a suicide truck bombing in Rawah even as U.S. soldiers were pulling out of that area.

Commanders in western Anbar have long complained privately that they do not have enough troops to control their area, which is about the size of South Carolina and includes notoriously violent cities such as Haditha, Rawah and Haqlaniyah.

"Any time you reduce forces it's a concern," said Marine Lt. Col. Norm Cooling, commander of the 3rd Battalion, 3rd Regiment which is scattered across western Anbar.

Few dispute that the U.S. military had to do something about the deteriorating security in the Iraqi capital, which threatened to spiral into full-scale civil war.

The question is whether the U.S. has enough forces in the country to regain control in Baghdad while also preventing Sunni insurgents in the west from using the U.S. military drawdown there to gain strength.

About a third of the 102 U.S. troops who have died in Iraq since Sept. 1 have been killed in Anbar, according to Pentagon reports.

"Where we're not, the insurgency goes there. That's just how an insurgency works," said Capt. Chris L'Heureux, 30, of Woonsocket, R.I., who was among those relocated to Baghdad.

U.S. commanders have also said that the reshuffling of forces makes it difficult to build trust among civilians and convince them to cooperate with American forces.

For example, five different U.S. units were based in the western city of Hit last year.

"It's been like a transient area" in Hit, said Lt. Col. Ronald Gridley, the executive officer for Marine Regimental Combat Team 7.

"In a counterinsurgency," he said recently, "you can't throw someone in there for 45 days and expect them to understand the communities, the different tribes, the different personalities involved."

Iraq Fuel Shortages Buoy Separatists' Stance (WSJ)

By Philip Shishkin

The Wall Street Journal, October 10, 2006

Kurds in North Seek Solutions, Serve as Model for Southern Shiites; Sunnis Fear Being Shut Out

ERBIL, Iraq -- As governor of Erbil province in northern Iraq's Kurdish autonomous region, Nawzad Hadi Mawlood has spent months rationing fuel among public transport, government cars and -- supplies permitting -- regular motorists, whom he says he may have to advise to refrain from driving altogether.

The recurrent shortages are draining Kurdish officials' patience with the central government, which they accuse of fumbling fuel imports. Fuel interruptions also are aggravating the wider debate over how Iraq's abundant oil supplies are divided among its factionalized regions, and the resolution could determine whether the country splinters. In Baghdad last week, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said "oil needs to be a unifying factor."

But here in Iraqi Kurdistan, officials are moving in the opposite direction, embracing policies that are putting it on track to oil independence from Baghdad. The Kurds' frustrations -- and ambitions -- are summed up by Ashti Hawrami, their newly appointed energy minister: "We are supposed to be an oil country, and we have this? Baghdad is failing us. We could do a better job."

The Kurdish example is inspiring Iraq's Shiite Muslim Arabs, most of whom live in the oil-rich South, to seek similar autonomy. The country's Sunni Muslim Arab minority -- fearing the Kurds will gain control of northern oil reserves -- is increasingly alarmed by Kurdistan's oil moves, fearful of being cut out of oil income that is currently apportioned by the central government.

When the central government's oil minister questioned the validity of exploration contracts signed by the Kurdistan regional government, Nechirwan Barzani, the region's prime minister, offered a strong response: "I resent [the oil minister's] efforts to sabotage investment in Kurdistan's oil sector. He would better spend his time getting his ministry working rather than tearing down our achievements." Mr. Barzani then warned that if Baghdad continues to impinge on the Kurdish region's autonomy, the Kurds may consider seceding from Iraq.

The thirst for independent fuel supplies -- and the broader autonomy that implies -- could also exacerbate age-old tensions with neighboring Turkey, which views Iraqi Kurdistan's growing self-rule with concern.

While Iraq is among the world's largest oil producers, the country's refineries, often targeted by insurgents, can't keep up with the domestic demand for refined petroleum products, such as gasoline. So Iraq's State Oil Marketing Organization uses the crude-oil revenue to buy the shortfall from foreign suppliers, including Turkey, which has no oil reserves of its own but fields a vibrant refining industry.

Hobbled by the insurgency and poor management, Iraq's oil production stood at two million barrels a day in August, lower than the pre-invasion level of two and a half million barrels in February of 2003, according to the International Energy Agency. SOMO has been struggling to manage the oil trade, held back in part by obsolete technology.

Last year and early this year, SOMO ran up a debt of $980 million importing refined-petroleum products from Turkey, says Falah al-Amri, its director. Tanker trucks that used to stream across the border between Turkey and Northern Iraq stopped earlier this year, worsening the gasoline shortage.

Sirwan Osman, who drives a taxi in the Iraqi Kurdish city of Suleimania, often spends several days in a row living out of his battered cab as it inches its way through a giant gas line. As the shortage goes on, Iraqi Kurds are getting angry at their leaders.

The fuel crisis added urgency to Kurdish efforts to craft oil policies that would leave their region less reliant on the vagaries of Baghdad's oil management. "Unfortunately, the funding for fuel purchases is still in the hands of the federal authorities," Mr. Hawrami, Iraqi Kurdistan's oil minister, said in a recent email, warning that the fuel situation could become worse as the harsh winter approaches. He adds that the Kurds are planning to build two refineries to prevent similar crises in the future.

Those refineries would augment the region's nascent oil infrastructure that is gradually taking shape. Iraqi Kurdistan has no producing oil fields, but it has signed contracts with several foreign companies -- including Norway's DNO ASA, Genel Enerji of Turkey and Addax Petroleum Corp. of Canada -- to drill for oil. The first crude production could begin as early as next year. It is those contracts that provided fodder for a bitter dispute between Mr. Barzani and Iraq's oil ministry in Baghdad.

Iraq's constitution, approved in a referendum last year, is intentionally vague on how oil revenue should be allocated. Income distribution from existing fields is the purview of the federal government in Baghdad, but management of future discoveries isn't explicitly regulated by the constitution, allowing Iraqi Kurdistan to claim that authority for itself.

"We have the right to conduct new oil searches," says Mr. Mawlood, the Erbil governor.

The new petroleum law enacted by the regional Parliament says future oil revenue will be shared with Baghdad only on a voluntary basis. Iraqi Kurds also hope voters in the ethnically mixed, oil-rich province of Kirkuk will decide in a referendum next year to join Iraqi Kurdistan. Sunni Arabs worry that the loss of Kirkuk could deprive them of crucial oil revenue and further damage national unity.

Turkey, which has a problem with its own restive -- and sizable -- Kurdish minority, fears the annexation of Kirkuk could further stoke Kurdish separatism throughout the region. Northern Iraq has already become a safe heaven for bands of Kurdish guerrillas who stage attacks across the Turkish border.

Iraqi Kurdish officials, who depend on Turkey for refined petroleum products and other imports, suspect their neighbor is using its trade leverage to thwart the region's moves toward greater autonomy.

Mr. Mawlood says the fuel shipments from Turkey stopped not only for financial reasons, but because the Turkish government is trying to punish Iraqi Kurdistan for harboring anti-Turkey guerrillas and for making moves on Kirkuk, home not only to the Kurds, but also to Sunni Arabs and to Turkomans, who are ethnically linked to Turks.

A Turkish trade official says shipments were curtailed only because of the Iraqis' debts, and once the payments resume, so will the flow of gasoline to Iraq. Mr. Amri, head of SOMO, says he is working hard with Turkish counterparts to pay the arrears through an installment plan.

Witness In Saddam Trial Details Abuse (USAT/AP)

USA Today, October 10, 2006

BAGHDAD — The genocide trial of Saddam Hussein resumed Monday with testimony that his troops buried prisoners alive and abused female prisoners by shackling them for hours in the sun and firing over their heads as they bathed.

Saddam and his six co-defendants are on trial for offenses allegedly committed against Iraqi Kurds during a crackdown in the late 1980s. If convicted, the defendants could be sentenced to death by hanging.

One woman, who testified behind a curtain and whose name was withheld apparently for fear of reprisal, told the court she was 13 years old when she was detained during the crackdown.

The woman said Iraqi troops destroyed her village in northern Iraq in 1988 and that she and some family members were imprisoned in southern Iraq.

A prison warden she identified as Hajaj "used to drag women, their hands and feet shackled, and leave them in scorching sun for several hours," she told the court.

"Soldiers used to watch us bathe," she added, saying the guards would also fire weapons over the women's heads as they washed.

The woman said several relatives disappeared during the offensive. "I know the fate of my family. They were buried alive," she testified.

The prosecution presented the court with documents showing that remains of the women's relatives turned up in a mass grave.

"I'd like to ask Saddam: 'What crime did women and children commit?' " the witness told the court.

Saddam has insisted that the crackdown, known as Operation Anfal, was directed against Kurdish rebels who were allied with Iran in the 1980-88 Iran-Iraq War.

The prosecution maintains that about 180,000 people, most of them civilians, were killed in the crackdown, during which Iraq forces used poison gas against Kurdish villages.

In other Iraq news:

·The brother of Iraqi Vice President Tariq al-Hashimi was assassinated Monday when gunmen wearing military uniforms broke into his north Baghdad home, said Brig. Qassim al-Moussawi, a military spokesman.

Lt. Gen. Amir al-Hashimi, a Defense Ministry adviser, was the third of the politician's four siblings to be slain this year. The vice president's sister and another brother were killed within two weeks of each other in April.

·Iraqi authorities arrested the head of the mess hall at a base in the southern town of Numaniyah, where up to 400 policemen suffered food poisoning at a Ramadan meal.

Al-Moussawi said the poisoning was likely intentional, though he did not rule out that spoiled food was used in the meal. The policemen — mainly Shiites — fell ill after eating their iftar, the meal that ends the sunrise-to-sunset fast in the holy month of Ramadan. The Iraqi contractor hired to provide food for the base and other people also were detained, al-Moussawi said.

·A car bomb ripped through a market in a Shiite district of Baghdad, killing at least 10 people and wounding 23.

·Gunmen kidnapped 11 policemen in an assault on their checkpoint in Sadr City, a Baghdad neighborhood dominated by the Mahdi Army, the country's most powerful Shiite militia.

Rules Of Engagement: What Were They At Haditha? (CSM)

By Richard Whittle

The Christian Science Monitor, October 10, 2006

WASHINGTON

On the morning of Nov. 19, 2005, after a roadside bomb killed a young US marine driving a Humvee through Haditha, Iraq, marines in his unit killed as many as 24 civilians.

It's not clear why. The marines say they were fired upon. Iraqi witnesses say the marines went on a rampage. Now, as the marines await possible charges, a key question is: Were they following their rules of combat? These "rules of engagement" are under increasing scrutiny as American and civilian losses mount in Iraq.

The Haditha incident and other alleged atrocities by US troops in Iraq posed "some questions about leadership, about whether the military has done all that it can do to make it clear to troops on the ground what they're entitled to do," says John Sifton, a lawyer with Human Rights Watch, based in New York.

If charges are brought against the marines, the key to their defense will be that they were following the rules of engagement, defense lawyers say. "It's clear that that is the direction one must take," says attorney Gary Myers, if it's proved his client killed a civilian. He declined to identify which marine he represents in the Haditha controversy to protect the young man's reputation.

Whether such a defense can prevail depends both on the facts of what happened in Haditha and on whether those who did the killing acted "reasonably," even if they killed civilians, military law experts say.

"No soldier or marine is going to be tried for an honest mistake," says Gary Solis, a former Marine Corps lawyer who teaches the law of war at Georgetown University in Washington.

But if the marines knowingly gunned down innocent civilians, no rules of engagement would condone such behavior, experts say. Lt. Gen. James Mattis, commander of the 1st Marine Expeditionary Force at Camp Pendleton, Calif., is expected to decide in coming weeks whether to bring charges against any of the marines. Vary from war zone to war zone

Rules of engagement tell troops when they can apply force. They can vary from war zone to war zone, operation to operation, and even mission to mission. They're usually set by "combatant commanders" - those in charge of an entire region, such as Gen. John Abizaid, head of US forces in the Middle East. But some rules must be approved by the secretary of Defense or even the president.

In conflicts like the one in Iraq, applying the rules can be difficult, especially when troops must make split-second decisions. Sometimes, the rules even allow troops to shoot at civilians, if they can't be distinguished as such and appear to pose a threat.

The rules stem from the Joint Chiefs' Standing Rules of Engagement, which are based on laws of war that bar harming unarmed civilians who can be identified as such, says Lt. Col. John "Jay" Mannle, a Marine Corps lawyer. But firing on a car that contains civilians yet fails to slow or stop for a checkpoint - something US troops have done often in Iraq - is justified if those firing have a "reasonable" belief the car is a threat, he adds.

During the November 2004 battle of Fallujah, marines - including some from the unit under suspicion in Haditha - tossed hand grenades into houses or rooms where they believed insurgents to be. That's the tactic that was used in Haditha, too, according to Staff Sgt. Frank Wuterich, who led the squad accused of the killing.

In court papers filed last summer, Sergeant Wuterich said the squad - made up of about 10 marines - went into the houses after taking fire from them and accidentally killed the civilians while clearing rooms with grenades and rifles. (The papers were part of Wuterich's defamation lawsuit against Rep. John Murtha (D) of Pennsylvania, who said in May that the marines killed those civilians in cold blood.)

Residents of Fallujah, however, had been told to leave the city before US and allied forces went in, according to Mr. Solis of Georgetown. Anyone who didn't was regarded as hostile, and US forces were authorized to fire on them. No such warning had been issued in Haditha.

Iraqi witnesses in Haditha claim the marines went on a rampage after a roadside bomb killed Lance Cpl. Miguel Terrazas. The Iraqis say the marines killed four students when the young men happened upon the scene in a taxi, then massacred civilians in nearby houses, including women and children.

Human Rights Watch has asked the Pentagon for copies of the rules of engagement used in Iraq, and the American Civil Liberties Union has filed Freedom of Information Act requests seeking them, but rules of engagement are often classified. "We don't want to tell the bad guys what we might do," says Lt. Col. Scott Fazekas, a Marine Corps spokesman.

Such rules are usually general, Solis says, and, in any event, "are not tactical instructions on how to proceed in a combat situation." Practice and reminders

Troops are instructed on the rules and practice using them during predeployment training. How such training is conducted falls to unit commanders to decide. Before going into combat, troops also are issued unclassified "ROE cards" as a reminder of the key rules.

The cards are next to useless, says Lt. Col. David "Bo" Bolgiano, an Air Force Reserve lawyer and former Baltimore police officer who teaches a course in rules of engagement to members of the military. Troops in combat "are not going to have time to consult them," he says. In any event, problems arise not from the rules "but rather their application," he adds, which makes training in how to respond to potential threats the key.

Generally speaking, "the rules are pretty simple," he says. Troops may respond "with force - to include deadly force - to an imminent threat of death or serious bodily harm."

Although defense lawyers are likely to use rules of engagement as a justification if Haditha charges are brought, the outcome is more likely to turn on the facts surrounding the killings, says retired Army Lt. Col. Geoffrey Corn, who teaches at South Texas College of Law in Houston.

If the civilians were killed by mistake as the marines went after insurgents, he said, the legal question is whether the mistake "was a reasonable one."

"The discipline of a military force in battle is built around the core principle that killing on the battlefield is not just permitted, it's required," Colonel Corn said. "But not all killings are justified."

The Realities Of Trying To Rebuild Iraq (WP)

By Dan Senor

The Washington Post, October 10, 2006

A recent excerpt from a new book by Rajiv Chandrasekaran of The Post paints a highly distorted portrait of the postwar administration of Iraq. Given that the article has prompted some senators to call for a government investigation into the hiring practices of the Coalition Provisional Authority (CPA), it's important to correct the record.

Chandrasekaran's thesis is that young and inexperienced neoconservative political hacks and Bush loyalists ran and ruined the occupation of Iraq. In pinning the shortcomings of the reconstruction effort on the mishaps of a handful of low-level political appointees, he virtually ignores the fact that the senior tiers of the CPA were populated with a bipartisan and generally nonpolitical corps of experts.

His book makes no mention, for example, of Richard Jones, who was the CPA's chief of policy and Ambassador Paul Bremer's top deputy. A career diplomat, Jones had served as President Bill Clinton's ambassador to Lebanon and Kazakhstan, and he was ambassador to Kuwait when he relocated to Baghdad. He was at the center of practically every decision and every meeting about the Iraqi political process from the moment he arrived. Indeed, during the first major crisis in Fallujah, Jones was the CPA's lead negotiator with the city's Sunni leadership, as was reported widely.

Nor does Chandrasekaran discuss Ryan Crocker, a striking omission since Chandrasekaran once described Crocker as Bremer's "top political aide" [news story, July 13, 2003]. Crocker, the senior State Department official with responsibility for Iraq before the war, led the CPA's political reconstruction team. A fluent Arabic speaker widely regarded as among the State Department's most distinguished Arabists, Crocker had served as ambassador to Syria and Kuwait under Clinton. He is a consummate professional diplomat, neither inexperienced nor an ideologue. And he was extraordinarily influential in the early months of the occupation; along with Bremer and senior British envoy John Sawers (another Middle East expert, who had come to the CPA from his post as ambassador to Egypt), Crocker played the most influential role in selecting the Iraqi Governing Council in July 2003. But reading Chandrasekaran's book, you would be left with the impression that Crocker had nothing to with Iraq -- he does not even get a mention.

Chandrasekaran ignores countless other CPA leaders who also fail to substantiate his one-sided thesis, including Gen. Keith Kellogg, the CPA's chief of operations. Kellogg is a retired lieutenant general whose 32-year Army career included two tours in Vietnam and service as the 82nd Airborne Division's chief of staff during Operations Desert Shield and Desert Storm. He was succeeded by Vice Adm. Scott Redd, who served as director of strategic plans and policy for the Joint Chiefs of Staff under Clinton.

David Oliver, the CPA's budget director, does appear in the book. But Chandrasekaran curiously omits any description of Oliver's background. Oliver, a retired Navy rear admiral, had served as a principal deputy undersecretary of defense for Clinton, and by the time he was sent to Baghdad he had already taken a role as a public and financial supporter of one of the Democratic candidates challenging President Bush in 2004. Other prominent Democrats recruited to work in Iraq included former Clinton senior defense official Walt Slocombe and constitutional experts Noah Feldman and Larry Diamond -- both of whom had publicly opposed the decision to go to war in Iraq.

Most of the CPA's senior officials came from the career ranks of the State Department or the military and had served in Republican and Democratic administrations. And whatever the politics of the non-career staff, the majority -- at all levels of the organization -- were dedicated and hardworking and risked their lives to serve.

That said, there is no question that CPA staffers, both senior and junior aides, made mistakes. And there were certainly some positions that were filled by less than perfect matches, as one would expect when a willingness to relocate to a war zone was a key criterion. But a fairer book would have simply critiqued our policy decisions without getting into personal attacks and lopsided analysis.

Speaking of policy, Chandrasekaran argues that the CPA should have listened more to professional civil servants and State Department Arabists. Yet his book concludes that the formal occupation of Iraq was itself America's biggest mistake. Instead of creating the CPA, he argues, the Bush administration should have moved quickly after Saddam Hussein's fall to empower a fully sovereign Iraqi government.

But that is precisely the policy that was vociferously opposed by the State Department's Middle East experts in the months leading up to the war. As Chandrasekaran himself points out earlier in the book, the State Department had, before the invasion, favored an extended occupation, in which the United States would retain power for a long period while gradually organizing elections and facilitating an Iraqi constitutional convention. Indeed, the approach Chandrasekaran now claims to prefer has much more in common with the rapid political transition plan backed by the very Pentagon neoconservatives he disparages throughout his account.

The truth is that both approaches would have been problematic. So, too, was the compromise solution sought by Bremer. But in a country as complicated as Iraq, there were no simple answers at hand. It's unfortunate that instead of acknowledging the depths and ambiguities of the problem, Chandrasekaran chose to shoehorn carefully selected facts into a thesis that often seems all too pat.

Punctuated By Life And Death (WP)

By Richard Cohen

The Washington Post, October 10, 2006

On the day that The Post carried a story about how President Bush had characterized the present difficult period in Iraq as "just a comma," Matt Mendelsohn called me. He is a photographer who took the pictures for a new book by his brother Daniel, "The Lost." It is an attempt to find out what happened to six members of the Mendelsohn family who perished in the Holocaust -- the family of great-uncle Shmiel Jager, "killed by the Nazis," of which almost nothing else was known. There: You went right by it. Shmiel lived between the commas.

In between those commas, of course, is the life of a man. He was scared and he was brave, he was proud and he was shamed, he headed a family and ran a business and then hid from the Nazis until he, along with four daughters and his wife, was betrayed and shot right on the spot. Don't think of the bullet as a period. It was, worse, a comma.

So Daniel Mendelsohn set out to expand the commas, to push them open and let in a life. From what the reviewers say, he succeeded brilliantly, so when someone says that 6 million Jews died in the Holocaust or if someone mentions Auschwitz, you can understand that it is not a number that died but a person who was murdered. I say that also about Rwanda in 1994, or what happened to the Armenians in Turkey in 1915, or what is happening in Darfur today.

Commas imprison us all. You see them in the headlines of obituaries: Joseph Smith, accountant, 81; Mildred Jones, housewife, 87; Frank Miller, longtime resident, dies. The brevity of it all, the compression of a life into a clause, is appalling, yet an unalterable fact. This is the way not just of newspapers but of history, too. You come across the mention of a war -- the Crimean, the Civil, the Vietnam, the Boer, the Algerian -- and then, like a cemetery dangling from two commas, comes a mention of the number of dead. They get the same prominence -- sometimes less -- as the amount of ordnance used or ships sunk or airplanes built.

Wars are fought with commas. They are essential. Here and there is a world leader who does not care about human life, but most do. The only way they can function is to plant commas around the misery they cause, to subordinate the loss of life to a supposedly greater cause. This is what Bush is doing. If he did not think he is on his way to something grand, that he is doing immense good, then he could not face what is between those two commas -- almost 3,000 American lives and immense suffering. He is not a man given to introspection. Still, he could not live without the succor of cliches: breaking eggs to make an omelet and all of that. In between his commas are all those broken eggs. As yet, there is no omelet.

Not too long ago, I embraced the commas myself. I favored this idiotic war because I thought that the deaths of some would improve -- even save -- the lives of many. I likened the about-to-die soldiers to firemen or cops, the people we summon to risk or lose their lives for the common good. I had the common good in mind when I supported the war, and I did not expect much space between the commas. Now, the space expands and expands, one comma marching away from the other. It seems we will need room for all of Iraq.

When he was alive, I didn't much care for Menachem Begin, the hard-line Israeli prime minister. But when he retired after the 1982 war in Lebanon and showed his grief, my view of him changed. He was despondent over all the lives wasted, and he went into seclusion. For Begin, somehow, the commas evaporated and the immensity of his mistake pitched him into a depression relieved only by death. Other world leaders, in similar circumstances, join consulting firms. The bigger their mistakes, it appears, the higher their fees.

Most of us yearn to escape our commas, to become something more than a profession (longtime lawyer) or resident (Washington native), to make our mark on the world. A president who has ineptly waged a foolish war instead seeks the solace of commas. It is not so much where he has deposited the wounded and dead but where he hopes he can hide from history. It can't be done, though: George W. Bush comma -- and then his failure in Iraq. The comma is his epitaph.

Bomb Kills Top Leaders Of Local Afghan District (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, October 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0076960

KABUL, Afghanistan, Oct. 9 — Five people, including three officials who were the entire leadership of a district in eastern Afghanistan, were killed Monday morning in a roadside bomb explosion on their way to investigate a school burning, police officials said.

The blast, from a remote-controlled mine, killed the district administrator, the police chief and the intelligence chief of the Khogyani district of Nangarhar Province, as well as a driver and a bodyguard, a police spokesman, Col. Ghafoor Khan, said by telephone. Four policemen riding in the back of the pickup were wounded in the explosion.

The men were traveling to Kharawan, a village in the district, to investigate the burning of its school the previous night, Colonel Khan said. Khogyani, a mountainous district bordering Pakistan, is an area of insurgent activity. American and Afghan police officers and border troops had surrounded the village and were searching for suspects, but detained no one, Colonel Khan said.

NATO and Afghan forces were engaged in heavy clashes in Uruzgan, a southern province where Dutch and Australian troops are deployed, and estimated they had killed 52 insurgents in a firefight that lasted several hours, according to a NATO news statement released in Kabul. The Afghan Defense Ministry said there were also clashes on Sunday in Helmand, a neighboring province.

NATO officials had just reported that insurgent attacks had dropped by half at the end of September, compared with the beginning of the month, after the Taliban suffered a heavy defeat in Kandahar Province, in the south. They predicted the insurgents would switch to lower-level, guerrilla-style tactics like suicide bombs and roadside explosions.

The British commander of NATO troops in Afghanistan, Lt. Gen. David Richards, urged the government and Western donors to step in quickly to benefit from the relative lull in combat and deliver rapid assistance to the people of the south, warning that if residents did not see any benefits in the next six months they would turn to support the Taliban.

General Richards, who took overall command of foreign troops in Afghanistan last week, left for Pakistan on Monday to meet military officials and President Pervez Musharraf. According to the British newspaper The Sunday Times, he planned to present Pakistan with evidence that the Taliban leadership was working out of Quetta, in Pakistan.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Dunn Calls Allegations In HP Scandal A 'myth' (USAT)

By Del Jones And Michelle Kessler, Usa Today

USA Today, October 9, 2006

Former chairman declares innocence on '60 Minutes'

Former Hewlett-Packard chairman Patricia Dunn, facing charges of approving the practice of using private investigators to obtain the phone records of HP's board of directors, went on 60 Minutes Sunday to say she was innocent.

"The idea that I supervised, orchestrated, approved all the ways in which this investigation occurred is just a complete myth," she said. "It's a falsehood. It's a damaging lie."

Dunn, 53, has late-stage ovarian cancer and less than a 70% chance of living five years. She said her lawyers approved the 60 Minutes interview, which was unusual coming within days of being charged with felonies by California Attorney General Bill Lockyer.

The charges, filed in state court, allege that investigators working for HP impersonated board members and reporters to obtain their phone records without their consent, a practice known as pretexting. Dunn was aware the records were obtained under false pretenses, the attorney general alleged.

Dunn became HP's chairman in 2005 at a time when members of the board were leaking confidential information to the press regarding mergers and other sensitive topics. Those leaks destroyed trust on the board, Dunn said.

She said she approved investigating the board to find the leak but that she relied on HP lawyers to ensure everything was done legally. Dunn is one of five charged. HP declined to comment on 60 Minutes.

When asked if using pretexting was not at least unethical, Dunn said that people who sit on boards give up a lot of privacy. "Your life is much more an open book," she said. Dunn said it was wrong for HP to get reporters' records but that she did not learn that had happened until last month.

On the same 60 Minutes program, former HP CEO Carly Fiorina said that she was "shocked" by the depth and range of tactics used in the scandal, and shocked to learn that she may have been a target.

She implied that her firing was an act of sexism. Asked if a man would have been fired in the same manner, Fiorina said: "Somehow, men understand other men's need for respect differently than they understand it for a woman. I'm disappointed to have to say that, but I think it's undeniably true."

DOJ_NMG_0076961

Fiorina said there were no “normal business reasons” for her firing. “I can only conclude that it was personal in some way.”

Dunn said her cancer has made her philosophical and that being charged with crimes is not the worst thing that can happen.

“The Golden Gate Bridge is always out there,” she said with a laugh during the interview.

“I have a story to tell,” she said. “I need people to understand what happened, and I'm glad to have the chance to do it.”

Boardroom Duel Behind H-P Chairman's Fall, Clash With A Powerful Director (WSJ)

By George Anders And Alan Murray

The Wall Street Journal, October 9, 2006

PALO ALTO, Calif. -- Within weeks after her unexpected ascension to the chairmanship of Hewlett-Packard Co. last year, Patricia Dunn found herself in open warfare with another director: wealthy venture capitalist Tom Perkins.

They argued over how the board should be run. He has called her a "stickler for process and procedure." She says he was a "controller." For new board members, he pushed for Silicon Valley entrepreneurs with ties to his venture firm. She rejected his suggestions in favor of big-company leaders from other industries.

They even bickered over Mr. Perkins's steamy novel, "Sex and the Single Zillionaire," which he wrote with the encouragement of his ex-wife Danielle Steel. The 74-year-old Mr. Perkins says he jokingly called for all H-P employees to buy the book. Ms. Dunn, 53, says she didn't hear anything playful in his tone and vetoed that plan. When Ms. Dunn told Mr. Perkins at a party that the book "isn't my thing," he angrily accused her of embarrassing him in public.

At heated moments, two witnesses say, Mr. Perkins would declare in front of board members: "We need a new chairman." Ms. Dunn says at other times he would poke her in the clavicle and say: "I made you chairman." Mr. Perkins's actions were, in the words of another director, former Medtronic Inc. executive Robert Ryan, "chairman abuse."

The clash between Ms. Dunn and Mr. Perkins lies at the root of the spying scandal at H-P, a saga that ended catastrophically for Ms. Dunn. Last week the California attorney general charged her on four felony counts of fraud and conspiracy, saying she led the H-P board into criminal violations of privacy when the company pried into personal phone records to investigate boardroom leaks.

TRACKING THE SCANDAL

A cache of internal H-P documents and emails shed light on the company's media-leak probe. In one email exchange1, former H-P ethics lawyer Kevin Hunsaker asks how detectives obtained personal phone records. When he is told that they used pretexting, he replies: "I shouldn't have asked…" · See other key documents2 and a graphical timeline of the H-P scandal.

WSJ's Alan Murray discusses7 the risks former H-P CEO Patricia Dunn may face by testifying before Congress.

Mr. Perkins set the charges in motion by storming off the board and alerting authorities to the phone snooping. He contacted the Securities and Exchange Commission and California's attorney general, pressing them to take action. But their fight was much broader than that, reflecting a fundamental conflict over how to run big companies in the post-Enron world.

Ms. Dunn brought a careful, rules-based approach to life. She rose from a modest childhood and endured a three-bus commute to attend the University of California, Berkeley, on a scholarship. She become head of Barclays Global Investors, where she succeeded in the orderly world of index funds, which control risk and take the guesswork out of investing.

When asked to be H-P's chairman, she brought a similar diligence to her new job. She studied a British book on governance, attended directors' workshops at Stanford University and hired consultants to update board handbooks. Her first thought, she says, was: "How do I avoid screwing up? Failure-avoidance has been a large motivator my whole life." For Ms. Dunn, plugging the leaks became a crucial test of her ability to oversee the board.

Mr. Perkins, by contrast, is a boisterous Silicon Valley legend, in love with fast cars, large sailboats and getting his own way. He worked for H-P in the 1950s and 1960s and helped the company start its computer business. In 1972, he co-founded Kleiner Perkins Caufield & Byers, a leading venture-capital firm that made billions for partners and investors by bankrolling start-ups such as Genentech Inc. and Netscape Inc.

Mr. Perkins returned to H-P in 2002 as an outside director, serving until March 2004 before stepping down at retirement age. He was brought back 11 months later at the urging of fellow director George "Jay" Keyworth, who said the company needed Mr. Perkins's expertise. "I have been chairman of a hell of a lot of boards," Mr. Perkins said in an interview late last year. "I have always been very, very active in the strategy and tactics of these companies." When the leak issue came to a head, Mr. Perkins tried to play down the matter and protect his friend, Mr. Keyworth, who was fingered as the leaker.

Center of the Probe

While it may take a court to assign legal culpability, internal H-P documents depict Ms. Dunn at the center of the leak probe at the computer and printer company. Imbued with zeal about directors' responsibilities, she focused on rooting out a boardroom traitor and failed to question or rein in investigators. They impersonated reporters and directors to pry personal records from phone companies. They used operatives to tail H-P directors and journalists. And they sprang a sting operation on an unsuspecting reporter in an effort to get her to reveal her source.

The charges are the culmination of a fierce boardroom battle that, in the end, Ms. Dunn lost. At the board's request, she quit as a director in late September. Ms. Dunn says she relied upon the advice of H-P lawyers and thought obtaining phone records was customary practice. She portrays herself as a victim and says she bears no responsibility for any misdeeds that were done.

"I think I've been at the nexus of a conflict between the old and new ways of governance," she said during a three-hour interview last week. "And I made a very rich and powerful enemy without meaning to. He was in a position to finance an extremely effective and elaborate campaign to get me off the board. It went beyond what he ever expected."

Mr. Perkins also saw their battle as a fight over how best to run the company. In a July 18 email to H-P CEO Mark Hurd, he worried that Ms. Dunn would " 'pack' the board with the kind of directors she so admires -- ciphers from high cap companies, with no fast-cycle technology background, and certainly no Valley entrepreneurial genes. I worry that you will wind up with a 'blue ribbon' board that will be of zero, or even negative, value to you when the going gets tough."

In an interview with Newsweek last month, Mr. Perkins said: "My No. 1 thing was to get Pattie out as chairman, and I got that. So I'm happy."

As she fights her legal war, Ms. Dunn has been waging an increasingly serious medical battle. After brushes with breast cancer and melanoma, she was diagnosed with Stage IV ovarian cancer in January 2004. Intense chemotherapy, which lasted through August 2005, appeared to have beaten back the disease. But in August, Ms. Dunn had surgery to remove cancer that had spread to her liver. On Friday, she began a new six-month round of chemotherapy.

"I hope I live long enough to see my reputation cleared," she says.

The story of Ms. Dunn's undoing comes from interviews with her, her associates, other H-P directors and 700 pages of H-P documents, which include emails, presentations, lawyers' reports and written testimony submitted to a congressional committee investigating the matter.

Ms. Dunn spent her childhood in Las Vegas, where her father was an entertainment director at a casino and her mother was a retired showgirl. She says her formative experiences came as a teenager after her father died and her mother moved the family to Terra Linda, Calif.

Cash was tight. She won a National Merit Scholarship in 1970 to go to the University of Oregon but had to drop out when her mother lost Social Security death benefits. For a year, Ms. Dunn worked days as an apartment rental agent and evenings cooking and housecleaning for a family in return for room and board. Her mother was homeless and slept in her car for a while.

In 1973, Ms. Dunn got enough scholarship and grant money to return to college at the University of California, Berkeley, as a journalism major. Immediately after graduating, she won a temporary secretarial job at Wells Fargo & Co., the big San Francisco bank.

She had no interest in finance. "I thought I would rather drink chloroform and die than work for a bank," she recalls. But it was the only job available and she grew to like it. She met a senior banker, Bill Jahnke, whom she later married. And she became fascinated with the way Wells Fargo used academic theories to whittle away the role of human judgment in investment decisions. The bank championed low-cost money management that matched indexes like the Standard & Poor's 500. "I found there were revolutionaries at the bank," she says.

Ms. Dunn eventually became CEO of the business, which went through a series of owners before being sold to the United Kingdom's Barclays Bank PLC, which renamed it Barclays Global Investors. BGI wasn't flashy, but its methodical, process-driven approach to investment proved ultra-reliable.

Former colleagues say Ms. Dunn was a superb listener who usually knew exactly what she wanted. "You underestimated her at your peril," recalls Jeffrey Skelton, a former investment specialist at the bank. "People who got booted out can attest to that."

In 1998, Ms. Dunn was invited onto the H-P board, which was looking for fresh faces. At that time it was dominated by people picked by the company's legendary founders, Dave Packard and Bill Hewlett. A year later, H-P recruited its first outsider as CEO, Carly Fiorina, a flashy telecommunications executive.

Betting Their Future

DOJ_NMG_0076963

H-P and Ms. Fiorina bet their future on the hotly contested 2002 takeover of Compaq Computer Corp. During a shareholder suit over the deal, H-P considered using Ms. Dunn as a witness to affirm directors' confidence in the deal. The company instead opted to call another director, Phil Condit, then CEO of Boeing Co.

In her autobiography, which goes on sale today, Ms. Fiorina snipes at the low-key Ms. Dunn, writing that it was "frequently hard to discern" what point Ms. Dunn might be trying to make.

· Oct. 4: Indicted, with four others, on four felony counts

"I never viewed myself as a leader on the board until late 2004," says Ms. Dunn. That's when some H-P directors started voicing dissatisfaction with their CEO. A rift developed between Ms. Fiorina's supporters and critics. As the board struggled to find agreement, Ms. Dunn helped negotiate a 500-word statement testifying to its concerns. "I was the scribe" who wrote down the emerging consensus, Ms. Dunn recalls.

On Jan. 10, 2005, Ms. Dunn and two other directors -- Mr. Keyworth and Richard Hackborn -- delivered the statement to Ms. Fiorina. The meeting surprised the embattled CEO who conceded little in talks over the next few days about her role, but seemed to recognize the need to be more open with her board. "We were getting somewhere with Carly," Ms. Dunn maintains. "She was taking on board what directors were saying."

Two weeks later, a detailed account of directors' qualms about Ms. Fiorina's leadership appeared in The Wall Street Journal. Ms. Fiorina was furious and started focusing on leaks instead of directors' concerns about her management. Her relations with the board disintegrated. At a Feb. 7 board meeting in Chicago, with Mr. Perkins among those pushing hard for change, Ms. Fiorina was voted out of office.

The leak "set the tone for distrust," Ms. Dunn recalls. "It threw a spanner into the whole process" of running the board.

At the same Chicago session, the board asked Ms. Dunn to become nonexecutive chairman. She says her elevation was due largely to the fact that "I was one of the few directors who was still talking to everyone." She saw herself as a peacemaker.

Ms. Dunn was in the midst of a 20-month chemotherapy regimen to battle ovarian cancer. Her face was bloated. Hair loss forced her to wear wigs. She adopted a macrobiotic diet and consulted a Chinese herbalist. Each day, she took more than a dozen nutritional supplements that she kept in a heart-shaped box.

Doctors told her she showed an astonishing ability to withstand nausea and other side effects. Tom Christopherson, a long-time BGI colleague, says he asked her about her medical stoicism and recalls being told: "I keep all of this in a corner. The quality of life I want has nothing to do with being a cancer patient."

As H-P chairman, Ms. Dunn helped lead a CEO search that recruited Mr. Hurd from NCR Corp. She paid house calls to other H-P directors, asking them how the H-P board could become more effective. What she heard disheartened her. Directors were wary of one another, Ms. Dunn recalls, because of the leaks and the Fiorina ouster, and pessimistic they could ever work well together. Seven of the nine directors with whom she talked said stopping the leaks should be a top priority, after finding a new CEO, she recalls.

Months before, Ms. Fiorina had tried unsuccessfully to find boardroom leakers. Ms. Dunn felt it was time to try afresh. It didn't matter whether indiscretions were big or small. They all were bad. As she testified to a House panel last month: "Even trivial information that finds its way from the boardroom to the press corrodes trust among directors."

Sympathetic directors urged Ms. Dunn onward. H-P board documents show that Mr. Ryan offered to hand over his phone records so she could see if he had called reporters. She demurred. Someone suggested that directors take lie-detector tests. Mr. Perkins declared: "I'll be the first in line." Ms. Dunn took that as a serious suggestion. Mr. Perkins through a spokesman says he was kidding. Such tests were never used.

To dig into boardroom conduct, Ms. Dunn turned to a former prosecutor, Ronald DeLia, whom H-P management recommended to her. He ran Security Outsourcing Solutions, a small firm in Needham, Mass. Ms. Dunn says she wondered if a bigger firm would be better, but opted to keep the job in-house.

Project Kona

Mr. DeLia, in a phone call, asked her to pick a code name for the project. Ms. Dunn was staying in Kona, Hawaii, at the time, where she has vacationed since her honeymoon. She decided to call the project "Kona" and said recently the word will never sound the same to her.

Mr. DeLia decided to get directors' phone records without their permission. This technique, called "pretexting," involves fooling phone companies into handing over call logs by impersonating a customer, which is illegal in California; it may be permissible in other jurisdictions.

Ms. Dunn said in her House testimony last month she didn't recall hearing the term pretexting during the 2005 probe. But according to meeting notes from H-P's then-general counsel, Ann Baskins, someone with the initials "PCD" asked direct questions about the matter. Ms. Dunn's full name is Patricia Cecile Dunn. A spokesman for Ms. Dunn declines to comment on Ms. Baskins's notes.

Later, low-level H-P managers squirmed about such deceit. "It's very unethical at the least and probably illegal," wrote Vincent Nye, an H-P security official, in a February 2006 email. His warnings seemed to fall on deaf ears, and there's no indication they ever reached Ms. Dunn. It's unclear how people reacted to pretexting in 2005.

By summer 2005, the Kona I team conceded failure; it hadn't pinpointed any board blabber. The leak issue receded in prominence until Jan. 23, 2006, when Dawn Kawamoto, a technology reporter for CNet.com, posted an online article headlined: "HP Outlines Long-Term Strategy."

It didn't matter that the actual contents were upbeat and bland, merely echoing what H-P had been telling Wall Street analysts for months. The story was cast as a summary of a closed-doors retreat for directors and top executives two weeks earlier -- and it was accurate.

"I thought: 'Here we go again,' " Ms. Dunn recalls. "You can't appreciate how raw the sensitivities were on the board. That a director would have disclosed this is staggering." Even H-P's CEO, Mr. Hurd, was outraged, Ms. Dunn later said, telling her that he couldn't run the company this way.

As the leak problems worsened, Ms. Dunn's relations with the powerful Mr. Perkins were also deteriorating. In the summer of 2005, she brought in consultants from Mercer Delta Inc. to suggest how H-P could tidy up its director guidelines. Mr. Perkins hated their meddling. As H-P General Counsel Ms. Baskins put it in a later interview with H-P's outside lawyers: "Perkins generally felt he could write a book on governance and didn't need any outside help."

Ms. Dunn chafed, too, when Mr. Perkins repeatedly brought up her $100,000 annual pay as chairman, insinuating -- to her ear, at least -- that she ought to be grateful to him. She wanted him to realize that while not a tycoon, she had a net worth that was in fine shape with or without the H-P stipend. At one point, she took Mr. Perkins aside for a five-minute chat about her financial position, hoping this would close what she called in a later interview "a respect gap."

Also on Ms. Dunn's gripe list was how Mr. Perkins, as a member of the board's powerful technology committee, was running high-level strategy discussions that belonged in front of all directors. "It was becoming a board within a board," she says. She didn't have a seat on the committee and while she was free to attend some of its events, lacked a vote there. A spokesman for Mr. Perkins says: "I wouldn't even know how to comment on that. Let's just let it go."

Did Mr. Perkins want an aggressive leaks probe? In an August 2006 interview with H-P's outside lawyers, Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosatti, Ms. Dunn said she felt "under tremendous pressure from Perkins to find the leaker." Ms. Dunn reiterated in her interview last week that she thought Mr. Perkins was "the most hawkish of the directors" in pressing for action. Mr. Perkins's spokesman disputes that, saying the venture capitalist regarded the CNet article as harmless.

In any case, investigators had a likely suspect: Mr. Keyworth. He had given interviews to Ms. Kawamoto before and some of the quotes from the story's single anonymous source matched his cadence. He'd also been suspected of leaking to the press a year earlier. Ms. Dunn engaged H-P's chief ethics officer, Kevin Hunsaker, who agreed to supervise what became known as Kona II.

Within two weeks, Messrs. Hunsaker and DeLia had a whirlwind of spying initiatives in place. They paid surveillance teams to sit outside Mr. Keyworth's home. They hired other snoops to follow an H-P publicist at a conference, logging what time he visited the dessert stand. And they commandeered phone records of about a dozen people.

As one episode got under way, even the originally squeamish Mr. Nye emailed colleagues in all capital letters: "STRAP ON YOUR HELMETS, FELLAS, WE'RE GOIN IN!!!" Another investigator in an email likened one of his ploys to "waiting for the Apollo 13 spacecraft to emerge from the dark side of the moon."

Ms. Dunn generally kept her emotions on tighter rein. In emails to the investigative team, she underscored the importance of keeping CEO Mr. Hurd in the loop. She wrote to Mr. Hunsaker on Feb. 3: "This effort is on the right track. I will count on you and the team." On Feb. 22, she wrote Mr. Hunsaker to tell him that an email sting involving Ms. Kawamoto, the CNet reporter, was "very clever."

During her testimony to the investigations subcommittee of the House Committee on Energy and Commerce, Ms. Dunn said she was sorry she used that phrase.

All told, H-P investigators spent more than $350,000 to establish that Mr. Keyworth and Ms. Kawamoto had spoken before her CNet story appeared. Nobody officially interviewed Mr. Keyworth until the entire draft report was complete. Instead, the company operated for about two months in a clandestine world that Rep. John Dingell later said "would make Richard Nixon blush."

On May 18, it was time to present the fruits of Kona II to the full H-P board. Mr. Ryan, head of the audit committee, revealed the results of the investigation to Mr. Keyworth that morning, and Mr. Keyworth confessed.

At the board meeting, Ms. Dunn informed fellow directors that a leaker had been found and Mr. Ryan filled in the details. Directors asked Mr. Keyworth to leave the room while directors deliberated his fate. Ultimately they decided to ask for his resignation.

Ms. Dunn, who thought this would smooth her rocky relations with Mr. Perkins, had a nasty surprise coming. Mr. Perkins said Mr. Keyworth's contributions to the board were so sizable that his longtime friend should be let off with a private apology and a promise not to hold unauthorized chats with reporters again. Ms. Dunn refused, she says. Mr. Perkins shouted at her and announced he was quitting the board.

Within weeks, Mr. Perkins was marshalling for a battle. He retained a high-powered lawyer, former White House attorney Viet Dinh. He asked the phone company to see if his records had been peeked into by "pretexters." When he discovered that they had, he brought the evidence to authorities in July, including California's attorney general.

Over the past three months, H-P has been coming to terms with the magnitude of the scandal. It began disclosing the leak investigation in early September. Two weeks later, it said Ms. Dunn would step down as chairman in January. As more details about the leak probe tumbled forth, H-P at the end of last month said Ms. Dunn would resign immediately.

From Ms. Dunn's testimony, emails and indirect comments, it's possible to piece together an explanation for how a well-regarded chairman could go so catastrophically off course. Adamant in her desire to "fix" the leak problem, she succumbed to tunnel vision.

She had begun to see stopping leaks as one of the most crucial tasks in her chairmanship. In doing so, she neglected issues such as prudence, fairness and the potential impact on H-P's reputation. Even the extent to which the company had analyzed the legal issues or just glossed over them wasn't considered.

In interviews and in congressional testimony, Ms. Dunn says that while sorry for the embarrassment to H-P, she doesn't accept responsibility for the scandal. She says it wasn't her job to supervise the tactics involved in the investigation, and that she was assured its methods were lawful. She hasn't been precise as to who gave her that advice.

"If I had a crystal ball," Ms. Dunn says, "I would have used an outside firm" to run the investigations. Large security firms might have been more attuned to the possible hazards. With H-P management urging her to use in-house resources, she says she deferred to others.

Recently, Ms. Dunn has been busy with other things, including chemotherapy appointments, being arraigned and spending time with her step-grandchildren. After felony charges were filed, she offered to resign from board seats with various organizations and most of them -- including BGI -- immediately accepted. She says she was delighted that Larkin House, a social service for runaway teens, asked her to stay.

At one point in the House hearings, Ms. Dunn came close to acknowledging how much had been lost. When Rep. Edward Markey, a Massachusetts Democrat, asked about her boardroom credentials, she replied: "I was considered a financial expert and, ironic though it may seem to you now, also an expert in corporate governance."

Fiorina Says Her Next Role May Involve Politics (WSJ)

By Alan Murray And George Anders

The Wall Street Journal, October 10, 2006

Carly Fiorina, former chief executive of Hewlett-Packard Co., says she might want her next job to involve politics or some other form of "public service."

In an interview yesterday, Ms. Fiorina said that it is also possible she will look for a chance to run another public company. But she opened the door further than she has in the past to the notion of renewing her career outside the corporate world. While speculation about her political ambitions has swirled since she took office at H-P in 1999, she has consistently brushed aside such talk.

Ms. Fiorina, 52 years old, is currently promoting her autobiography, "Tough Choices," which was released yesterday.

Ms. Fiorina also said that she had breakfast with her successor, current H-P CEO Mark Hurd, in April, and that he complained about some of his directors. "He said he was frustrated with this board," Ms. Fiorina said.

DOJ_NMG_0076966

Ms. Fiorina blames what she calls a "dysfunctional board" for her firing as CEO in February of last year. In particular, she blames venture capitalist Tom Perkins and director George "Jay" Keyworth, a former science adviser to President Ronald Reagan, for pushing personal agendas on the board. "I think Jay clearly was a driving force, that Tom was his ally, and that Tom's entry in the board changed the dynamics," she said. "They were the most egregious in wanting to dominate the [board's] conversation with their pet projects."

Ms. Fiorina said Mr. Hurd's concerns about the board were similar to hers. An H-P spokesperson confirmed that the breakfast occurred, but said Mr. Hurd wouldn't comment on the discussion.

At the time of the breakfast, Mr. Hurd had received the results of a controversial investigation into boardroom leaks, completed in March, that identified Mr. Keyworth as a source for some of those leaks. Mr. Perkins subsequently contacted the California attorney general, who has brought charges against former H-P Chairman Patricia Dunn and others for their roles in the leak investigation. Mr. Hurd was not charged.

Concern over boardroom leaks at H-P began while Ms. Fiorina was still CEO. She launched an investigation into one leak, but she says that investigation only involved having attorney Larry Sonsini interview each director, and didn't involve obtaining private phone records or any of the other controversial tactics used in the later probe.

Asked about the controversy over the leak investigation, Ms. Fiorina, who was dismissed in February 2005, said: "My reaction to the whole thing when it first came out was to be shocked and appalled. It makes me sad. It's a breakdown in character and ethics and judgment."

Fiorina Blames Divisive HP Board (USAT)

By Michelle Kessler

USA Today, October 10, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — Deep “dysfunctions” in Hewlett-Packard's board have troubled the computer maker for years — and contributed to its current snooping scandal, former CEO Carly Fiorina said Monday.

Fiorina, who ran HP from 1999 to 2005, says she struggled with a board that refused to confront issues directly, but was happy to scheme behind her back.

The board ultimately ousted Fiorina, a decision that she says was unexpected and never explained. She describes their conflicts in a her memoir, Tough Choices, in stores this week.

Now, that same board is in trouble because it hired detectives that used trickery to obtain the private phone records of journalists, board members and employees — probably including Fiorina. That may be against the law. California Attorney General Bill Lockyer is seeking indictments against former HP chairman Patricia Dunn and four others involved in the scandal.

Fiorina, who left the company in the scandal's early days, says she has few inside details. She's still trying to figure out how many of her own personal records were accessed. But overall, “It appears that personal agendas overcame people's good judgment,” she says.

It's a problem that Fiorina says she knows well. In her book, she describes repeated battles with a board that she says was usually polite and accommodating in person — and secretly scheming behind the scenes.

“That isn't the way business should be done,” she says.

Some board members were particularly troublesome:

·George “Jay” Keyworth, a former science adviser to President Reagan, repeatedly proposed impractical mergers, then got angry when Fiorina didn't embrace his ideas, she writes. He has since confessed to leaking information to the press and has resigned.

·Venture capitalist Tom Perkins “clearly became a disruptive force in the boardroom during my tenure, and he apparently remains a disruptive force,” Fiorina says.

Perkins, a close friend of Keyworth, played a key role in Fiorina's ouster. He resigned from the board this year after clashing with Dunn. He later forced HP to publicly reveal its phone-record swipe.

·Dunn, who became chairman after Fiorina's ouster, remained mysterious about the reasons for her decision to seek a change in CEO. “I never participated in a conversation with the board about why or how they chose to fire me,” Fiorina says.

·Walter Hewlett, the son of an HP co-founder, initially supported a proposed $25 billion acquisition of Compaq Computer. Once the deal was announced, he stunned Fiorina by saying he would oppose it. He refused to even meet with her, she writes.

Fiorina says the problem with confrontation wasn't limited to the boardroom. The company's vaunted corporate culture, known as the HP Way, “had gotten a bit corrupted,” Fiorina said Monday. “People tended to favor politeness and avoiding confrontation (over) direct talk.”

DOJ_NMG_0076967

That made HP slow and staid, putting it at a disadvantage to competitors such as Dell and Sun Microsystems. Fiorina worked hard to change it, and says she had some success. But the culture persisted in the board, in part because it met infrequently, she says.

HP has had a remarkable turnaround in spite of this, Fiorina says. Her successor, Mark Hurd, has gotten most of the praise.

"This isn't me vs. Mark," Fiorina says. But, she says, "The Hewlett-Packard company was transformed on my watch. … I don't deserve all of the credit, but I do deserve some."

Fiorina says the timing of her book is coincidental. She wanted to write it now, because she has time before her next venture, she says. Fiorina says she wrote the book herself, without the help of a professional writer, in about four months.

She hopes that the memoir, which describes her rise from temporary typist to AT&T executive to HP CEO, helps people see her as a real person. Through her difficult times at HP, "I became a caricature — too tough, too flashy," she says.

Fiorina says she doesn't yet know what her next move is. Politics are one option, though she wouldn't comment on reports that HP outside counsel and Silicon Valley icon Larry Sonsini urged her to run for governor.

Another is heading a new company. She says she stays in close touch with the tech industry and still lives in Silicon Valley. As CEO, "I made choices I'm proud of. I would make those choices again," she says.

"It was a great experience," she says. "I'm proud of what I and tens of thousands (of HP employees) accomplished. I take great pleasure in seeing Hewlett-Packard (succeed)."

Civil Lawsuits Bigger Woe In Options Scandal (CNNM-YBIZ)

By Shaheen Pasha, Cnnmoney.com Staff Writer

CNN Money, October 10, 2006

Forget the SEC and Department of Justice. For companies ensnared in the widening options-backdating scandal, mounting civil lawsuits may turn out to be the real headache, costing companies millions of dollars and countless hours to defend and settle.

At last count, about 120 companies either are under scrutiny by the government or have launched internal investigations into their options practices. At issue is whether companies adjusted dates on options grants to ensure great profits for executives. But to date, only Brocade Communications and Comverse Technologies have actually received criminal indictments against their top executives.

Legal experts say that the small number of indictments highlights the difficulties in proving that executives knowingly attempted to enrich themselves at the expense of the company and shareholders.

But that hasn't stopped a host of eager litigation attorneys from filing civil suits, and dealing with them won't be easy.

"It takes an incredible amount of time, money and human capital to defend those type of cases regardless of the outcome," said Michael Koenig, a white-collar-criminal defense attorney at law firm Dewey Ballantine.

And when it comes to a civil lawsuit, the burden of proof on a plaintiff attorney is far less than in criminal proceedings, making it easier for civil complaints to mushroom.

Class action lawsuits, which usually lead the pack when it comes to most civil litigation, have a five-year statute of limitations - and many of the companies involved in the options scandal are looking at practices stemming from the late 1990s or 2000.

As a result, the complaint of choice has become derivative suits, in which shareholders sue the directors and officers of the company.

In a class-action suit, money in a settlement goes to the shareholders. In a derivative suit, a settlement goes to the company - which ultimately should benefit shareholders, though only indirectly.

Currently, attorneys have filed over 80 derivative lawsuits related to options backdating, while there have been only about 20 class-action suits against companies that include United Health Group and Apple.

Lawrence Kolker, partner at Wolf Haldenstein, has filed more than 20 complaints - mostly derivative lawsuits - in recent months against the directors and officers of companies like Comverse, Cablevision and Xilinx.

According to the civil complaints, shareholders are suing the officers and directors of the companies, claiming financial damage from falling stock prices following the announcement that the corporations were under investigation.

"The companies involved and shareholders have already lost billions of dollars in value as well as suffered reputational damage from being involved in this basic corporate malfeasance," Kolker said. "We're seeking recovery for the companies against the officers and directors."

Kolker said that shareholders sought monetary damages, disgorgement of profits executives made from backdating options as well as reform of corporate practices to make sure there will be better oversight in the future.

Critics of the mounting civil lawsuits say the barrage of derivative claims are just a way for ingenious plaintiff lawyers to profit from the scandal. Attorneys that file the derivative lawsuits can count on a solid fee -- sometimes as much as 25 percent of the ultimate settlement.

"Some people would say that these are lawyer-driven lawsuits and the point of filing these is to create fees for the lawyers," said William Sullivan, chair of the national securities litigation and enforcement at law firm Paul Hastings.

"It's a three-pronged attack against corporations with the SEC, DOJ and the derivative suits," said Paul Hodgson, senior research association at The Corporate Library, a government research firm. "We don't think we've gotten to the end of the number of companies that are going to be investigated and it's likely that there are going to be even more derivative lawsuits ahead."

With so many cases already under investigation, Hodges said the SEC is already overwhelmed and the burden may fall more on the Department of Justice to bring criminal indictments.

But Hodgson said government prosecutors need to find tangible documentary evidence to prove that options were backdated knowingly in order to prosecute a company. And that's no easy task.

Plaintiff attorneys, however, just have to prove that stockholders lost money because the officers and directors failed to perform their fiduciary duty - making it more likely that civil lawsuits will be more successful in obtaining damages from any perceived wrongdoing, legal experts said.

"The derivative lawsuits in the long run could become a bigger headache for companies," said Paul Hastings' Sullivan.

Buffett Orders Crackdown On Unethical Practices (FT)

By Richard Beales And Francesco Guerrera In New York

Financial Times, October 10, 2006

Warren Buffett has ordered top managers at his Berkshire Hathaway group to redouble efforts to crack down on unethical behaviour, warning that practices such as stock options backdating cannot be justified because “everybody else is doing it”.

In a strongly-worded memo dated September 27 and sent to an elite group of Berkshire managers dubbed “The All-Stars”, the veteran investor says “bad behaviour” among the insurance and energy conglomerate’s 200,000-plus employees is “inevitable”.

“But we can have a huge effect in minimising such activities by jumping on anything immediately when there is the slightest odour of impropriety… Berkshire’s reputation is in your hands,” the memo – obtained by the Financial Times – says.

The “Sage of Omaha” warns that poor corporate governance cannot be forgiven just because the practice is widespread. “The five most dangerous words in business may be ‘everybody else is doing it’,” wrote Mr Buffett, who has long been sceptical of stock options as a means of remunerating executives.

“A lot of banks and insurance companies have suffered earnings disasters after relying on that rationale. Even worse have been the consequences from using that phrase to justify the morality of proposed actions,” the memo continues.

Some lawyers and corporate experts have called for leniency towards executives and directors in the more than 100 companies being probed in the ongoing options backdating scandal, arguing that the practice was widespread and not necessarily illegal.

But Mr Buffett’s intervention, his first since the onset of the scandal, will bolster the case of regulators and corporate governance campaigners who say options backdating unfairly enriched executives at the expense of shareholders.

Mr Buffett’s memo argues that many of the perpetrators of recent corporate scandals such as the “accounting gimmicks” seen in recent years acted because they felt others were doing it as well.

“It’s a seductive argument. But it couldn’t be more wrong. In fact, every time you hear the phrase ‘Everybody else is doing it’ it should raise a huge red flag.”

Mr Buffett says Berkshire should “start with what is legal, but always go on to what we would feel comfortable about being printed on the front page of our local paper”.

Buffett Says To Avoid Scandals, Managers Must Not Follow Herd (WSJ)

By Karen Richardson

The Wall Street Journal, October 10, 2006

Warren Buffett, known as the "Oracle of Omaha," has spoken on the recent scandals involving stock-options backdating and Hewlett-Packard Co.'s leak probe.

In a one-page memo dated Sept. 27, prompted by the recent scandals, Mr. Buffett exhorted the 45-plus top managers of his Berkshire Hathaway Inc. holding company -- whom he calls "The All-Stars" -- to resist temptation despite peer pressure or even industry practice. "The five most dangerous words in business may be 'Everybody else is doing it,'" wrote the 76-year-old chairman of Berkshire.

More than 100 companies have drawn scrutiny in federal probes of backdating -- that is, the practice of altering the date on which options were granted to executives and other employees to increase the potential value of the options. Backdating can run afoul of tax and securities laws.

Separately, former H-P Chairman Patricia Dunn was charged last week by the California attorney general in H-P's leak probe. She and several others are accused of committing criminal privacy violations by hiring investigators who impersonated others in a tactic called "pretexting" to access personal phone records. Ms. Dunn has said she will fight the charges.

With regard to backdating, Mr. Buffett wrote, "My guess is that a great many of the people involved would not have behaved in the manner they did except for the fact that they felt others were doing so as well." In his folksy style, he went on, "So, at Berkshire, let's start with what is legal, but always go on to what we would feel comfortable about being printed on the front page of our local paper, and never proceed forward simply on the basis of the fact that other people are doing it."

Mr. Buffett sends out such "reminders" to his managers about once every two years, according to Debbie Bosanek, Mr. Buffett's assistant. As Berkshire continues acquiring new companies with new managers, Mr. Buffett decides "it's time for an update" once in a while," she added. Mr. Buffett wasn't available to comment. Sometimes Mr. Buffett's reminders take the form of passages in his annual letters to shareholders. In recent years, he has opined on hot-button corporate-governance issues including options expensing, executive compensation and hedge-fund fees.

Berkshire isn't a stranger to scandal. Four former executives of Berkshire's General Re reinsurance unit were indicted this year for conspiracy to commit fraud, and two others have pleaded guilty, in relation to a controversial transaction in 2000 with American International Group Inc. that federal prosecutors allege was a sham deal. The four former General Re executives and one former AIG executive are scheduled to stand trial in March in Connecticut.

In his latest memo, Mr. Buffett makes clear he is concerned about any blight on Berkshire's reputation. Acknowledging that the chance of the company's 200,000 staff will always behave properly "is nil," he adds, "We can have a huge effect in minimizing such activities by jumping on anything immediately when there is the slightest odor of impropriety."

Businesses With A Higher Purpose? (USAT)

By Alan M. Webber

USA Today, October 10, 2006

It must be a coincidence, right?

Here's Andrew Fastow, Enron's former chief financial officer, being sentenced to six years in prison — and on the same day, he names 10 prestigious Wall Street firms as his “co-conspirators”, including Merrill Lynch, RBS and Barclays.

Here's former Hewlett-Packard board chairwoman Patricia Dunn testifying before a congressional committee probing the company's use of “pretexting” to investigate its own board. “I do not accept personal responsibility for what happened,” she says. And then Ann Baskins, HP's former general counsel and nine other witnesses all take the Fifth Amendment.

Here's former WorldCom CEO Bernie Ebbers reporting to jail for his role in an $11 billion accounting fraud. These and other headlines are part of perhaps the biggest perp walk in business history.

Oh, and here's one more item — an interesting recent study by Donald McCabe, professor of management and global business at Rutgers University: Among all graduate students, MBA candidates are the biggest cheaters. That's right, it must be a coincidence. So let's dig a little deeper.

According to survey data from 623 students at 32 graduate business schools in the USA and Canada, 56% admitted cheating. But, as McCabe notes, it's not cheating for cheating's sake: These students are doing it to win. Cheating can help them get great internships and high-paying jobs at big name companies. So maybe it isn't a coincidence. Even so, that doesn't answer the deeper question: What's wrong with the business world — and, in particular, what is wrong with business schools?

Part of the answer could lie in the history of business graduate schools. The MBA is a fairly recent invention, unlike the other “professions” with graduate degrees. The oldest graduate school for business in the USA is a little more than 100 years old; Europe's oldest is only a bit more than 40 years old. Compare that with law and medicine. Law schools date to the Roman Republic. And though lawyers might not have the best reputation, at least the American Bar Association has issued its Model Rules of Professional Conduct. Medicine goes back farther, even if you consider only Western medicine. Hippocrates of Cos, who lived in the age of Pericles, is widely considered “the father of Medicine.” Science might have advanced, but Hippocrates lives on today in the Hippocratic Oath, which proscribes a moral basis for doctors (unlike the hypocritical oath that evidently offers business school students a free pass).

So perhaps part of the difference between these schools is what it means to be a profession. But there is also a wider gap that separates business from medicine and law. Business school professors and leaders have yet to answer a question of the first order: What's the point of the exercise?

In the case of medicine and law, there are higher purposes. Doctors work to heal the sick and provide comfort to their patients. Lawyers are charged with representing their clients and also with upholding the nation's laws. What about business men and women? What's their higher purpose?

The ads in The Economist offer a good idea of the missions that leading business schools assign themselves. The ad for the University of Chicago's Graduate School of Business says, "You'll experience the people and ideas responsible for revolutionizing the business world." How perfectly it complements Harvard Business School's mission: "We educate leaders who make a difference in the world." Jeffrey Skilling, an HBS graduate, was after all, a leader who made a "difference." As President Bush, another HBS alum, would say, "Mission accomplished."

At least these ads are consistent with what today's businessmen have taken as their key responsibility: Increasing a company's share price. Or, as Jack Welch so succinctly put it in the title of his recent book, Winning. But winning, as we've seen with CEOs and now with business school students, can become a rationale for cheating.

What if, instead of seeking to create shareholder value as their definition of success, business men and women sought to establish well-articulated social values — and then applied them to their own careers and organizations? What if, instead of writing books called "Winning," they called their books "Contributing"? And what if, instead of measuring success only by their ability to amass financial capital, they also sought to grow social capital?

Because the real problem with business today isn't the few scoundrels who bring disgrace to so many honest managers. The real problem is that it needs to serve a higher purpose than making a lot of money. The challenge today is to answer a fundamental question: Is capitalism going to be the salvation of the world? Or the cause of its demise?

This is hardly an academic question, what with issues of global warming, the growing gap between the haves and have-nots, and the seeds of war and terrorism sown by divergent economic systems. Business leaders need to espouse a bigger game than just winning that connects to a view of the world as an interconnected community, where the future of the wealthiest depends in equal measure on the future of the poorest.

MBA students need to think about this bigger game that asks fundamental questions about the purpose and sustainability of business. And it's a game that will eliminate most cheating — unless, to paraphrase Woody Allen, students who want to serve a higher purpose cheat by looking at the soul of the student next to them.

European Justice (WSJ)

By Hans-martin Tillack

The Wall Street Journal, October 9, 2006

For 18 years now I have worked as a journalist, and I still think I have a great job. Of course someone in my profession has to follow a number of rules. Most important of all: Stick with the facts.

Now I have learned that these rules might be less strict for some officials at the EU anti-fraud office, which most people in Brussels know by its French acronym, OLAF. The European Court of First Instance ruled Wednesday that OLAF should get away with presenting wrong and misleading facts about me in order to spark a police action against me and to get to my sources inside OLAF.

The ruling surprised me. In my job, I could not -- just for example -- write that the director of OLAF, Franz-Hermann Brüner, "might be beating his dog." I could not write such a story, even if I really disliked Mr. Brüner, because I don't have the slightest evidence to back it up. A colleague might tell me that he had heard rumors that Mr. Brüner was beating his dog. But that would not allow me to write the story, either. Even if I had a witness who claimed to have seen Mr. Brüner beating his dog, I would prefer to wait until I had a second witness. And before publishing anything, I would try to confront Mr. Brüner and ask him whether he has really beaten his dog.

In fact, I wrote quite a few other stories about Mr. Brüner while I was correspondent for the German magazine Stern in Brussels from 1999 to 2004. These were stories for which I had proof -- stories about him and about the then EU anti-fraud commissioner, Michaele Schreyer. I was the first journalist to reveal, basing my stories on internal EU documents, that there were serious problems with fraud and possible corruption in the EU Commission's statistical agency, Eurostat. I was also able to prove in several cases that Commissioner Schreyer and Mr. Brüner seemed not to treat internal EU fraud cases seriously. Mr. Brüner, for example, flatly refused to forward evidence about a possible case of fraud to the Belgian public prosecutor in October 2003. I wrote that Mr. Brüner might act like this because he did not want to anger mighty politicians and EU officials who had to decide on his future career at the helm of OLAF.

In all these cases I had evidence. And I duly confronted the persons concerned before publishing my stories. Never did Mr. Brüner claim that any facts I mentioned were wrong. Still, Mr. Brüner and Ms. Schreyer were pretty unhappy about my reporting. Then something happened. After I benefited from a major leak in March 2002, Mr. Brüner and the EU Commission put out a press release saying the leaked document -- which I undeniably had quoted first -- might have been obtained by "a journalist" who bribed an official to get hold of this document. An OLAF spokesman even told a newspaper that OLAF had "prima facie evidence that a payment might have been made."

Only two years later did I learn what kind of "prima facie evidence" the spokesman was referring to. He relied on statements by the then-spokesman of Ms. Schreyer, Joachim Gross. Mr. Gross told OLAF that a third person told him that I had paid an official in order to obtain internal EU documents. Mr. Gross later made several conflicting statements about who his initial source was; the definite identity of this person is still unknown. What he told OLAF comprised nothing more than simple "rumors," as an OLAF spokesman noted in an internal memo that was leaked to me in April 2002. In any case, this former Commission spokesman did not want to be quoted. He had explicitly asked OLAF not to mention his name to anyone. It was only revealed by a German newspaper in June 2004.

I did not bribe or pay anyone to get these documents. But I had good sources and continued to receive internal OLAF documents. So in early 2004 Mr. Brüner went back on the warpath. His investigators put their allegations against me -- yes, still only the rumors spread by Mr. Gross -- in a report and sent complaints to the public prosecutors in Brussels and in Hamburg, Germany, where Stern has its headquarters. Two OLAF officials even traveled to Hamburg to ask the local prosecutor to act -- and to do this as a matter of "urgency" as I was about to move to Washington, D.C.

In fact I was about to move to Hamburg, and Mr. Brüner knew this. He did not ask me for my response to Mr. Gross's allegations before he filed his complaints. Nevertheless, while the German authorities refused to conduct a raid on the Stern headquarters in Hamburg, the Belgian police took the OLAF allegations seriously and, without examining them further, raided my home and office in March 2004. To this day they hold nearly 1,000 pages of my documents. During this entire time they have not brought any charges against me or any other person in this case.

So my magazine and I went to court: against Belgium, against Mr. Gross and against the EU Commission, of which OLAF is a part. The Belgian courts said they did not need to check the evidence that was delivered by the EU anti-fraud office and dismissed our complaints. Mr. Gross said he was protected by the statute of immunity of an EU official, and the German court to which we brought him said it had no jurisdiction over him.

On Wednesday, the EU Court of First Instance ruled on our main case against the Commission. The only people responsible for my problems were the Belgians, the three judges in Luxembourg found. OLAF's actions had no "binding" legal effect on me, they argued. Why? Because the Belgian authorities were -- according to the judges -- "free to decide" what to do after OLAF had pressed them for urgent action. So the court refused even to consider whether OLAF had breached the law and its own procedural rules. The judges also declined to discuss our argument that journalistic sources in EU institutions would be in danger of drying out if OLAF could send police to a journalist's home and office with the snap of a finger.

The anti-fraud office was not even to blame for its press releases and claims of alleged "prima facie" evidence that I had corrupted EU officials, the court said. OLAF had "formulated" all this "in a hypothetical way" without indicating my name or the name of my magazine and -- according to the court -- it did so with the necessary "cautiousness of the words used." So in the eyes of the court it was no problem if OLAF spread unjustified rumors or even openly misleading information.

Anyone who believes what OLAF says, the court seemed to say, does so at his own peril. If I were the director of the EU anti-fraud office I would be ashamed of this judgment. Strangely, Mr. Brüner welcomed the ruling, saying it gave "important guidance for the future work of OLAF."

What if I had written -- based on rumors -- that "a leading official" of the EU anti-fraud office might have beaten his dog, and consequently some neighbors broke down the door to the garden of the only "leading OLAF official" who owned a dog, and abducted the animal? Would I, too, have been cleared by the courts by arguing that my articles had no "binding legal effect" on the official concerned, and that I had mentioned the allegations only in a "hypothetical way" with the necessary "cautiousness of the words used"?

Of course not. If I were to act like this as a journalist, making unfounded accusations, my editors would fire me. And they would be right to do so. But it is also true that journalists must have the freedom to publish their stories when they have evidence for wrongdoing. Some people in the EU institutions still seem to have difficulty understanding this.

Mr. Tillack is a reporter in the Berlin office of Stern magazine.

CRIMINAL LAW:

U.S. Hoping To Quell School Violence (AP)

By Ben Feller

AP, October 10, 2006

WASHINGTON - Compelled to respond to a spike in school violence, the Bush administration is hoping that a high-profile summit will get the word out about safety.

President Bush called for Tuesday's conference after three shooting rampages in two weeks unnerved the nation. Communities in Colorado, Wisconsin and Pennsylvania are still grieving.

Bush is expected to offer sympathy at the event and to encourage people to ask questions at home about whether their schools are prepared for emergencies.

Four weeks before the midterm elections, the event allows Bush to return to the politically safe issue of education and child safety. But the federal role in making schools safer is limited because education remains mainly a local matter. The White House chose to host a national sharing of ideas, hoping to seize a moment when people are focused on preventing violence.

Two Cabinet members, Education Secretary Margaret Spellings and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, will lead panel discussions. First lady Laura Bush is also scheduled to speak.

No new policies are expected; strategies for keeping schools safe are widely known. But experts say schools often don't get serious about safety until shootings make headlines.

On Monday, a 13-year-old student in Joplin, Mo., carried an AK-47 into his middle school and fired a shot into a ceiling. He left the building and was apprehended by police.

Preventing violence, and coping with tragedy, are the topics of the panel discussions.

Among the speakers will be Craig Scott, who survived the massacre at Columbine High School in Colorado in 1999. Student gunmen killed his sister and 12 others.

Another panelist is Park County Sheriff Fred Wegener. He responded in Bailey, Colo., on Sept. 27, when a man held several girls hostage in a school before killing one and himself.

Other speakers include educators, school administrators and crime prevention experts.

About 300 people are expected at the National 4-H Conference Center in Chevy Chase, Md.

"Bringing people together to talk about what's working - that can't hurt," said William Lassiter, manager of the Center for the Prevention of School Violence in Raleigh, N.C.

"I think schools have gotten back into a comfort zone again," Lassiter said. "I'm not saying we should put barbed wire up around schools or take other drastic measures. What we really need to look at is basic safety steps you would take at your own house."

Lassiter also questioned the Bush's administration attempt to cut $347 million in school-safety grants for states this year. Bush's budget says the program is ineffective.

The White House says that beyond those state grants, the government spends larger amounts on successful school safety programs through its education, justice and health agencies.

Meanwhile, there is no pattern to deadly shootings at schools.

In the 2005-06 school year, 15 people were killed in school-related shootings, said Kenneth Trump, a national school safety expert who tracks violence data. That number of school-shooting deaths has ranged from three to 24 in recent years, Trump's records show.

In the period from 1992 to 2002, 462 students and adults died at school by homicide or suicide, according to the latest government figures. Most of those killed were children.

In the last two weeks, a gunman killed himself and five girls at a one-room Amish schoolhouse in Pennsylvania, and a 15-year-old Wisconsin student shot and killed his principal.

Colorado Residents To Play Role In National School Safety Summit (AP)

AP, October 10, 2006

DENVER - A number of Colorado residents are expected to join President Bush and Cabinet members to discuss school safety this week, a summit called in the wake of deadly attacks here and elsewhere around the nation.

Park County Sheriff Fred Wegener, who handled the response to the school shooting in Bailey, and Craig Scott, brother of Columbine victim Rachel Scott, will be among Tuesday's panelists. Other participants are expected to include Del Elliott, director of the Center for the Study and Prevention of Violence at the University of Colorado, and Lt. Gov. Jane Norton.

The conference is being hosted outside Washington by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Education Secretary Margaret Spellings. Bush and his wife, Laura, are expected to attend part of it.

"Our goal is clear: Children and teachers should never fear for their safety when they enter a classroom," the president said in his weekly radio address on Saturday.

In the past two weeks, schools in three states have been hit by deadly attacks and others have faced threats.

A gunman killed himself and five girls at a one-room Amish schoolhouse in Pennsylvania. A 15-year-old Wisconsin student was arrested in the shooting death of his principal. And on Sept. 27, 53-year-old Duane Morrison took six girls hostage at Platte Canyon High School in Bailey, sexually assaulting them before fatally shooting one girl and killing himself.

Schools in Colorado, Virginia, Nebraska, Nevada, Oklahoma, Oregon and Wisconsin have been closed or locked down in the past week because of threats of violence or guns on campus.

"Laura and I are praying for the victims and their families, and we extend our sympathies to them and to the communities that have been devastated by these attacks," the president said.

Michael Acree, deputy director of the Colorado Department of Public Safety, and Susan Payne, executive director of the Colorado student crime-stoppers program, also are expected to attend Tuesday's conference.

White House spokeswoman Dana Perino, a Colorado native, told reporters Friday that recent school violence "has broken America's collective heart."

"The president, in the wake of these events, asked Attorney General Gonzales and Secretary Spellings to bring together teachers and parents, administrators and law enforcement officials and other experts to discuss best practices and learn lessons about school safety," Perino said.

In 2002, the Secret Service and the Education Department studied school shootings and found clear patterns: School attacks are rarely done on impulse. They are planned, and other students often hear about them in advance.

Overall, schools remain safe places.

Violent crime at school fell from 1992 to 2002, according to the most recent federal data. During that time, students were over 70 times more likely to be murdered away from school than at school.

School Security Plan Would Need Cash (QPL)

By Cory Hopkins, The Patriot Ledger

Quincy (MA) Patriot-Ledger, October 10, 2006

Local officials agree federal funds the key

If the federal government decides to create a security policy in response to the recent spate of school violence, South Shore officials say federal money must be included to help implement the program.

"They offer money for everything else - homeland security and defense and everything - but you can't keep our children safe?" asked John Reilly, Hull selectmen chairman and school building committee member. "I think that should be a priority along with everything else."

President Bush will hold a conference on school safety tomorrow with federal education officials, parents, teachers and law enforcement officials in Chevy Chase, Md. The president has pledged to do whatever possible to keep schools safe.

Most South Shore schools at the very least require all visitors to present identification upon entry and to sign a visitors' log. Some schools have installed sophisticated, and expensive, video surveillance and electronic locking equipment as security measures.

Braintree School Superintendent Peter Kurzberg said school security is important, but it is also expensive and competes for resources with traditional educational programs. He would like to see security money from the federal government.

"I think schools are struggling with limited resources to provide sound educational programs," Kurzberg said. "Additional resources for security measures would certainly be helpful."

Kurzberg also noted that in addition to security measures like cameras and electronic locks, other nonphysical security precautions, such as state-mandated Criminal Offender Record Information (CORI) background checks for all employees and volunteers, also cost schools money.

Schools also need money to create effective partnerships with local police departments, said John Creed, vice chairman of the Silver Lake school committee.

"If you're talking about security at schools, I hope (President Bush) gives the funds so local school departments can work with police departments to form partnerships," Creed said, "but it cannot be done without money, and that has to come from the federal government."

Scituate school committee member Michael Hayes said the federal government needs to back up any minimum requirements with money to help schools meet those requirements if it is serious about tightening school security.

"It's the function of the federal government to decide what would be minimally acceptable (in terms of security)," Hayes said. "The federal government has told schools a lot of things they've had to do, but the bottom line is they have to supply the money."

Tomorrow's meeting, hosted by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Education Secretary Margaret Spellings, comes after three separate school shootings in Pennsylvania, Colorado and Wisconsin occurred in less than a week.

The threat of school violence was also felt on the South Shore last week after a former student clad in army fatigues walked into several classrooms at South Elementary School in Holbrook before being asked to leave, and the freshman football team at Silver Lake Regional High School was threatened by a student's mother.

Creed said he hopes President Bush will take the threats seriously and come out of tomorrow's meeting with a plan to seriously fund school security.

"If he's talking security and he's talking money, then we're on the same page," he said. "If not, he's wasting his time."

On Summit Agenda: Making Schools Safer (USAT)

By Ledyard King, Gannett News Service

USA Today, October 9, 2006

Bush, Cabinet members to attend Tuesday

WASHINGTON — Tom Mauser doesn't recall much about the youth violence summit President Clinton held in May 1999, three weeks after his 15-year-old son, Daniel, was gunned down in the Columbine High School massacre in Littleton, Colo.

To him, the summit turned out to be heavy on talk, light on action. So the transportation planner from suburban Denver expects the same result from the school safety conference that President Bush is convening Tuesday.

The summit comes after a series of school shootings, the most recent of which fatally wounded five Amish girls in a Pennsylvania schoolhouse last week.

Directed jointly by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Education Secretary Margaret Spellings, the daylong event will include teachers, parents, school administrators, law enforcement officials and other experts to discuss ways of making schools safer. The president and first lady Laura Bush also will participate, according to White House spokeswoman Dana Perino.

The summit comes as national statistics show a steady decline in school crime, including murder, over the past decade. Safety consultant Ken Trump warns that schools often under-report incidents and that the recent shootings in rural Wisconsin, Colorado and Pennsylvania show no classroom is absolutely safe.

"If it can happen in a one-room Amish schoolhouse, it can happen anywhere," said Trump, who is president of National School Safety and Security Services, a consulting firm in Cleveland.

Trump advocates that schools at least conduct "tabletop exercises" where they map out with local law enforcement responses to a potential crisis.

Mauser champions stricter gun-control laws but says ultimately school security is more about attitude than regulation.

"A lot of the things that need to be done are not things that can be done in Washington," he said. "People have to be vigilant about the people who commit these acts. No law is going to do that for us."

In Maine, about 40% of the 177 school districts have yet to draft a crisis response plan as required by state law, state Education Commissioner Susan Gendron said. Maine is contacting those districts.

"Random acts of violence can happen everywhere, and it's important to have thought through a crisis," she said.

Most schools get less than $10,000 in federal security aid, according to the U.S. Department of Education. Federal funding to combat crime and drugs in schools has steadily fallen since Bush entered the White House.

But Bill Modzeleski, who runs the U.S. Department of Education's Office of Safe and Drug-Free Schools, says there's plenty schools can do right now: limit access; keep areas well lit; monitor visitors; and train teachers, parents and students to report suspicious activity. Perhaps most of all, they should intervene with children early before emotional issues explode into violence.

"I don't think a lack of money should be used as an excuse not to do anything," he said.

Missouri Teen Fires Assault Rifle In School (WP/AP)

By Marcus Kabel

The Washington Post, October 10, 2006

JOPLIN, Mo., Oct. 9 -- A 13-year-old boy in a dark-green trench coat and mask carried an assault rifle into his school Monday, pointed it at students and fired a shot into a ceiling before the weapon jammed, authorities said. No one was hurt.

DOJ_NMG_0076975

"Please don't make me do this," the boy said, according to school administrators, before police arrested him and thwarted what they called a "well-thought-out plan" to terrorize his school.

Police said a note in the student's backpack indicated he had planted an explosive device in the school, but no bombs were found.

Lt. Geoff Jones said the boy's motives were unclear. School officials said the student had no major disciplinary problems.

The seventh-grader, whose name was not released, pointed the rifle at two students inside Joplin Memorial Middle School but was confronted by an administrator who tried to talk him into putting it down, Jones said.

Instead, the boy fired a shot into the ceiling of an entryway, police said. He tried to continue firing but left the building when the rifle jammed, Jones said.

"We don't believe he was trying to fire at administrators or students," Officer Curt Farmer said.

Officers arrested the teen behind a nearby building. Police described his weapon as a Mac-90, a replica of an AK-47 assault rifle.

Superintendent Jim Simpson said police told him the boy had a fascination with the Columbine High School shootings that left 15 people dead near Littleton, Colo., in 1999.

The student was wearing a trench coat -- like the student gunmen at Columbine -- and had a T-shirt over his head with eye holes cut out, Farmer said.

Farmer said the boy's backpack also held military manuals, instructions on assembling an improvised explosive device and detailed drawings of the school.

"This was quite well thought out," Farmer said. "He had been planning this for a long time."

Jones said the gun belonged to the boy's parents, who kept the weapon in a safe at home. Farmer said it is not uncommon for people in the area to own assault weapons.

Shot Fired In Mo. School; No Injuries, Explanations (USAT)

By Wendy Koch

USA Today, October 10, 2006

The 13-year-old boy had no previous run-ins with the law, police said. But 20 minutes before class Monday, he stood in the hall of Memorial Middle School in Joplin, Mo., wearing a green trench coat and a mask fashioned from a T-shirt, and aiming an assault rifle at the principal and other students, they said.

Assistant Superintendent Steve Doerr tried to calm the seventh-grader, who kept saying: “Get away. Don't make me do this,” according to Joplin police Lt. Geoff Jones. The boy fired into the ceiling, hitting a pipe and causing a burst of water. No one was hurt.

The rifle jammed, and the boy fled the school. Principal Steve Gibreth followed and called police on his walkie-talkie. Within a block, Jones said, police found the boy, crouched with the gun and a duffel bag. Jones said the bag contained wire cutters, unidentified chemicals, a pellet gun, hand-drawn diagrams of the school and notes about bombs and napalm. The teen, whose name has not been released, was in police custody in a juvenile facility.

“We have no motive,” Jones said.

Police searched the boy's home and bomb-sniffing dogs searched the school, which was evacuated, but they found nothing, Jones said.

When the shot was fired, he said, quite a few students were already at school, and others were arriving. Some told police the boy aimed the gun at them, but Jones said it is unclear whether any were targets.

The incident followed deadly shootings in schools in three other states since Sept. 27, including an attack in Pennsylvania on Oct. 2 that left five Amish girls dead.

President Bush convenes a conference on school safety today.

The shootings, as well as a spate of threats that have forced schools in at least eight states to lock down or evacuate in the past two weeks, have contributed to parental jitters over school safety.

In a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll conducted over the weekend, 35% of parents with school-age children said they fear for their kids' safety when they're at school. That percentage was the highest since March 11, 2001, when 45% of parents voiced such concern after a shooting at a suburban San Diego high school killed two students and injured 13 others.

Although one-third of parents said they're anxious, most said their children are not: 88% said their kids expressed no worry about safety at school.

The telephone poll of 1,007 adults nationwide, conducted Friday through Sunday, has a margin of error of +/-3 percentage points.

DOJ_NMG_0076976

Monday's incident in Joplin, a city of 49,000 in southwestern Missouri, occurred only 10 miles from Riverton, Kan., where five students were arrested April 20 — the seventh anniversary of the Columbine High School massacre in Colorado — on suspicion of plotting an armed attack on their high school. Two of the teens pleaded guilty to a reduced charge of conspiracy to riot, and the other three have pleaded innocent.

Time To Talk Guns (WP)

The Washington Post, October 9, 2006

A summit on school violence must look at the role of weapons.

THE SLAUGHTER of five girls in a Pennsylvania classroom, closely following school shootings in Colorado and Wisconsin, has prompted President Bush to call a national summit on school violence. It is right that the nation not just mourn the heartbreak of last week's shootings but that its leaders and other citizens talk about how to prevent such tragedies. How useful tomorrow's conversation will be, however, depends on the administration's willingness to have all voices heard. And that must include those calling for a more rational approach to gun control.

The day after a gunman carried out the deadly assault in an Amish school, Mr. Bush said that he had asked Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and Education Secretary Margaret Spellings to convene a meeting to determine how the federal government can help states and local governments improve school safety. There was an unfortunate sense of deja vu to the president's announcement: After the mass shootings at Columbine High School, President Bill Clinton held a summit on youth violence in 1999. Useful strategies resulted from the attention paid to Columbine. Schools that thought they had no need for safety and evacuation plans moved quickly to put some in place. Bullying, once viewed as a rite of childhood passage, was finally treated as a problem not to be tolerated. There was a new awareness that threats should be treated seriously.

But while the Clinton administration showed a willingness to discuss the role of guns in these incidents, the current administration and the Republican Congress have put in place policies that make it too easy for too many people to get guns. Worse, the wrong people are getting more dangerous guns.

We appreciate the president's resolve to gather experts, including those in law enforcement. Yet when it comes to gun legislation, the experts are ignored as the gun lobby scores victory after victory. Consider that President Bush signed a law that permits the destruction of gun check records within 24 hours (despite criticism from a Government Accountability Office report); let the federal assault weapons ban expire (despite evidence that it lowered the rate at which assault weapons were used in crime); is backing bills that prevent law enforcement from putting corrupt gun dealers out of business (over the objection of police groups); and restricted the ability of police to use crime gun trace data (again despite police objections).

It may be true that no law could have stopped the Pennsylvania school killer. Maybe, though, stricter laws would have given him pause. And, even if his victims could not have been saved, certainly some of the 10,100 people murdered with guns or some of the 477,040 people who were victims of gun violence last year would have been spared.

Editorial: Schools And Violence (STNIA)

Staten Island Advance (NY), October 9, 2006

During his Saturday address, President Bush lamented recent "shocking acts of violence" in schools and promised his administration will do what it can to keep centers of learning safe for students.

The immediate question that comes to mind is this: How does the president plan to accomplish that goal?

Perhaps tomorrow the nation's jittery parents will begin to learn the answer.

It has been a particularly brutal bloody heart-breaking two weeks that saw three schools in three states victimized by deadly gun attacks, the latest being a week ago today, when a gunman killed five girls and then himself in a one-room Amish schoolhouse in Pennsylvania. Charles Carl Roberts had five guns and 600 rounds of ammunition.

On Sept. 29, a 15-year-old Wisconsin student was arrested in the shooting death of his high school principal. Several days before that deadly incident, on Sept. 27 a man took six girls hostage in Colorado, sexually assaulting them before fatally shooting one girl and killing himself.

Schools in Virginia, Nebraska, Nevada, Oklahoma, Oregon and Wisconsin have been closed or locked down in the past week because of threats of violence or guns on campus.

Tomorrow, the White House is convening a conference on school safety; on hand at the event being held in the Washington suburb of Chevy Chase, Md., will be federal officials, school workers, parents, law enforcement officials and other experts.

Hosted by U. S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Education Secretary Margaret Spellings, Mr. Bush and his wife, Laura, are expected to attend at least part of the meeting.

DOJ_NMG_0076977

"Our goal is clear: Children and teachers should never fear for their safety when they enter a classroom," the president said on Saturday.

No one would disagree with that statement nor the goal, regardless of partisan politics. But again, how is the task of making the nation's schools safe going to be accomplished?

One can be sure that none of the participants will even suggest that a connection between lax gun laws and the spate of violence that has taken the lives of children and at least one school official in the last two weeks.

That's wrong. We feel that the issue should be No. 1 on the list of concerns. The truth is that Mr. Bush and the Republicans gained their majority in Congress thanks in large measure to the country's most powerful gun lobby: The National Rifle Association.

Last year, the group reported as much in one of its publications: "The success rate of congressional candidates endorsed by the NRA's Political Victory Fund was 95 percent. That tops an 85 percent rate in the 2000 elections and 89 percent rate in the mid-term 2002 races."

Many of those who, the writer went on to explain, "earned the wrath of the NRA and the firearms industry for supporting the poison-pill amendments that prevented passage of Senate Bill 1805 that would have provided immunity to firearms manufacturers from 'junk' lawsuits, lost their seats, resulting in the Republicans capturing 55 seats in the Senate to the Democrats' 44 with one seat remaining independent."

The trend of politically targeting those who support stricter gun laws or longer waiting periods for gun purchases, has grown to include our own mayor, Mike Bloomberg, who has over the last eight months or so earned the wrath of the NRA due to his anti-gun-trafficking campaign, and his successful effort to bring other mayors on board.

Several months ago, it was reported by the mayor's office and the state Education department that New York City schools had seen a 500-percent jump in reported incidents of violence between 2004 and 2005, but that the majority were found to be cases of harassment without a weapon, assaults and minor altercations.

The city's incidences of violence were well below the average. Figures for Staten Island were uniformly low, especially for serious crimes. None of the schools on the Island had more than 10 cases of weapon possession, though McKee High School led the list with eight. However, those statistics have been challenged by the United Federation of Teachers President Randi Wingarten as being "too low," and a matter of "under-reporting."

Regardless, any incident of violence involving a weapon in this borough's schools is one too many.

The proliferation and easy access to guns, especially those purchased in other cities and then transported for sale in others; a culture that glorifies violence through movies, music videos and other teen-targeted media, and poor or non-existent parenting are all part of the school violence syndrome. However, no conference on school violence can ignore the role played by guns. After all, none of the victims in the last two weeks were stabbed or clubbed over the head.

If the Bush administration really is serious about finding solutions, it would be disingenuous for the matter of guns not to top the agenda. Far too many politicians, especially those in Congress, have played lip service due to the vast amounts of campaign money they have received and continue to receive from the gun lobby. The same can be said for the White House.

Our children deserve better and parents and school officials should be demanding it.

Former Pages Surveyed In Foley Probe (AP-Y)

By Larry Margasak

AP-Yahoo, October 10, 2006

Lawmakers, following a request from the House ethics committee, are surveying aides and former House pages to find out if any of them had knowledge of ex-Rep. Mark Foley's inappropriate conduct toward male pages.

Charlie Keller, spokesman for Rep. Ginny Brown-Waite, R-Fla., said she contacted two pages before receiving the committee request and asked if they were aware of inappropriate behavior from Foley, any other lawmaker or staff members. Both said they were not.

Aides for other House members reported similar results Monday.

The ethics committee leaders, in a letter to all House members, asked them to contact current and former pages they sponsored to learn whether any of them had "inappropriate communications or interactions" with Foley or any other House member.

The ethics panel, formally known as the Committee on Standards and Official Conduct, also directed lawmakers to cast a wide net and ask aides what they might have heard about improper approaches by Foley or others to pages before revelations about his sexually explicit Internet messages surfaced last month. Foley resigned Sept. 29.

Meanwhile, the lawyer for Kirk Fordham, Foley's former chief of staff, said Monday his client could testify before the committee as early as this week. Fordham has said he informed House Speaker Dennis Hastert's staff in 2003 about Foley's inappropriate messages to pages.

Timothy Heaphy, Fordham's lawyer, said he contacted the ethics committee Friday and was told Fordham could appear this week to provide sworn testimony.

The ethics committee's four-person investigative subcommittee said it approved nearly four-dozen subpoenas for testimony and documents, although many witnesses are expected to testify voluntarily without the need for a subpoena.

J. Randolph Evans, Hastert's lawyer, said, "We are working to cooperate fully," but did not know when Hastert may appear.

Ethics Committee Starts Interviews In Foley Inquiry (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, October 9, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Moving with unusual speed, the House Ethics Committee began interviews in its probe of the Mark Foley scandal, an investigation that will test both the Republican leadership and the panel itself.

The inquiry will involve questioning of top House Republicans, including Speaker Dennis Hastert, and senior aides with decades of experience on Capitol Hill and their own relations with party leaders as well as members of the ethics panel.

Among them, Ted Van Der Meid, an aide to Mr. Hastert and an important witness to the Foley matter, led the ethics panel staff in the 1990s. The 49-year-old attorney, who has declined to comment on the Foley matter, advised Mr. Hastert when the speaker replaced many Republican members of the committee at the beginning of this Congress.

Those changes set off a partisan uproar that paralyzed the committee because of Democrats' complaints that the changes were designed to protect then Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R., Texas). A new counsel, William O'Reilly, was announced late last year, and the arrival of California Rep. Howard Berman as the ranking Democrat changed the mood. In announcing the inquiry into the Foley matter last week, Mr. Berman joined with Chairman Doc Hastings (R., Wash.) in resisting calls for an outside counsel, and the situation gives the Democrat and Mr. O'Reilly extraordinary leverage in dealing with a tense situation for Republicans.

It has been 10 days since Mr. Foley, a six-term Republican congressman from Florida, resigned after the revelation of sexually explicit messages he sent to teenage former House pages. The scandal dominated television news shows yesterday even as Newsweek published a poll suggesting that more than half of Americans believe Mr. Hastert was aware of Mr. Foley's inappropriate messages and tried to cover up the matter.

The speaker has denied any coverup, while apologizing for the scandal on his watch. Republicans say they hope the ethics inquiry -- and a criminal probe by the Federal Bureau of Investigation -- will help them return the debate to "terror and taxes" in the weeks before elections.

In the ethics inquiry, four current and former House staff members may play large roles:

Kirk Fordham, a former chief of staff to Mr. Foley, has said he warned Mr. Hastert's office before leaving Mr. Foley's employ in late 2003. Mr. Fordham is uncertain about the precise timing of the warning, but recalls meeting with Mr. Hastert's chief of staff Scott Palmer in the Capitol and asking that he intervene with Mr. Foley to stop his overly friendly behavior to male pages and interns. Mr. Fordham also recalls that Mr. Palmer later advised him that he had spoken to Mr. Foley about the matter within days.

Scott Palmer, who came to Washington with Mr. Hastert in the late '80s, is one of the most powerful figures in the Capitol, not only because of his boss's position but because of their close relationship. For this reason, many say the 56-year-old aide would accept blame and resign if it would help the speaker. But instead Mr. Palmer is described by friends as distraught, unable to recall or find personal notes of any such meeting with Mr. Fordham. "What Kirk Fordham said, did not happen," Mr. Palmer said last week.

Jeff Trandahl, the House clerk until last fall, and someone with responsibility for the page program, also has declined to comment. But Mr. Fordham and others have said Mr. Trandahl, now in his early '40s, was aware that Mr. Foley at times was overly attentive to pages. Mr. Fordham said it was warnings from Mr. Trandahl that led him to go to Mr. Palmer. It isn't clear whether Mr. Trandahl took the same warnings to Mr. Van Der Meid, who oversaw administrative matters in the House for the speaker.

In 2005, a Louisiana couple complained about overly friendly email from Mr. Foley to their son, a former page. A Louisiana congressman forwarded the complaint to the Speaker's office and Mr. Trandahl went with Rep. John Shimkus (R., Ill.), the head of the House Page Board, to tell Mr. Foley to cease contact with the teenager.

That email was an important signal that Mr. Foley was using the Internet to contact former pages. However, Karen Haas, the new clerk, confirmed Mr. Trandahl left the House without telling her of the incident.

Mr. Van Der Meid came to the Capitol in the mid-'80s like Mr. Trandahl, and in the chain of command in the speaker's office, has the most direct oversight of the page program. While Mr. Fordham went to Mr. Palmer instead, it would have been logical for Mr. Palmer to tell Mr. Van Der Meid of any meeting he had about the pages.

Ex-Foley Aide To Testify At Ethics Panel (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, October 9, 2006

WASHINGTON — A former Capitol Hill aide who says he warned Republican leaders about Rep. Mark Foley's inappropriate conduct with teenage pages at least three years ago is scheduled to give sworn testimony to the House ethics committee this week.

Kirk Fordham, a longtime Foley aide and more recently chief of staff to Rep. Thomas Reynolds, R-N.Y., offered the panel his help on Friday, said his attorney, Tim Heaphy. The attorney said Sunday he didn't know what day Fordham will testify or whether the session will be public.

The Sunday news shows were dominated by talk of Foley's actions and the way House Speaker Dennis Hastert and other GOP leaders handled signs of trouble over the past few years. Conservatives debated Hastert's fate and politicians argued about the scandal's impact on the Nov. 7 elections.

Foley, R-Fla., quit Congress on Sept. 29 after ABC and other news outlets revealed lewd e-mails and instant messages he had sent to pages and former pages. None of the messages have been independently authenticated by USA TODAY.

Foley's lawyer announced soon after that Foley is an alcoholic and had been molested by clergy as a child.

Tom Kean Jr., the GOP Senate candidate in New Jersey, called for Hastert to step down. Republicans said Sunday such talk was premature until the bipartisan ethics panel sorts out who knew what when and what was done.

"Anybody that hindered this in any kind of way, that tried to step in the way, of hiding this or covering it up, is going to have to step down, whoever that is," Rep. Tom Davis, R-Va., said on CBS' Face The Nation.

Fordham has said that he notified Hastert's office in 2003 or earlier about Foley's behavior and that Hastert's chief of staff, Scott Palmer, met with Foley at the time. Palmer has said the meeting did not happen. Fordham "continues to stand by everything that he has said about this and will have more to say under oath," Heaphy said.

President Bush is set to appear with Hastert on Thursday at a Chicago fundraiser for two suburban House candidates, and White House press secretary Tony Snow is speaking at a Hastert fundraiser Saturday in Illinois, Hastert spokesman Ron Bonjean said.

Democrats need 15 seats for a House majority. Rep. Adam Putnam, R-Fla., said the scandal is not affecting most races. But he acknowledged on ABC's This Week that many members are facing "uncomfortable questions about tawdry deeds by a former colleague."

The GOP leaders in most immediate danger appear to be Reynolds, who says he notified Hastert's office last spring of a troubling e-mail exchange involving Foley, and Rep. Deborah Pryce, R-Ohio, who called Foley one of her five best friends in Congress in Columbus Monthly.

A Buffalo News poll showed Reynolds, head of the National Republican Congressional Committee, trailing Democrat Jack Davis 48%-33%. NRCC spokesman Carl Forti said the results are "not even in the same ballpark" as GOP polling, but would not divulge those numbers.

Reynolds canceled an appearance Sunday on ABC because he was sick, said his spokesman, L.D. Platt. A day earlier, Reynolds apologized in a TV ad for failing to pursue the Foley matter.

In an Ohio race that polls show is close, Democrat Mary Jo Kilroy is stressing Pryce's ties to Foley and Hastert in a radio ad. It says Pryce, the No. 4 GOP leader, "is protecting Hastert even though he protected a sex predator." Pryce said Kilroy "stooped to a new low by suggesting that I knew or should have known" that Foley was "a child predator."

'05 Meeting Could Clarify G.O.P. Role In Foley Case (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, October 9, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 8 — For all the questions and curiosities, for all the contradictions and inconsistencies in the tale of Mark Foley, the investigation into how Republicans handled concerns about his conduct may hinge on what transpired on a fall afternoon last year, when a private meeting was hastily convened in his office.

Jeff Trandahl, the clerk of the House, and Representative John Shimkus, an Illinois Republican who leads the board overseeing the Congressional page program, had come from the House floor to confront Mr. Foley, a Republican congressman from Florida, about reports that he had been exchanging e-mail messages with a Louisiana teenager who had worked as a page on Capitol Hill.

When they arrived in Room 104 of the Cannon House Building that day, Mr. Foley was already in his office, where oil paintings of the Everglades, done by his mother, were hanging alongside memorabilia from more than a decade of life in Washington. Elizabeth Nicolson, a longtime aide who had recently been named chief of staff, joined Mr. Foley for a meeting that lasted no more than 30 minutes.

What took place at this meeting — only four people were present, none of them Democrats — holds the answers to at least some of the pertinent questions in the case of Mr. Foley, who resigned abruptly from Congress late last month after learning that a series of sexually explicit messages had landed in the hands of ABC News.

"It was a brief meeting," said a senior Republican Congressional aide who was familiar with the session and spoke on condition of anonymity because the matter was under investigation. "Looking back, it was probably far too brief of a meeting."

Mr. Shimkus, who did not inform other members of the page board about the meeting, would later say that he had ordered Mr. Foley to "cease all contact" with the teenager. The scope of his questioning, however, is unclear. Last week, Mr. Shimkus said he had not asked Mr. Foley whether he had communicated with other pages by e-mail, but Speaker J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois has said Mr. Shimkus did.

This week, when a bipartisan, four-member panel deepens its inquiry, the meeting in Mr. Foley's office will be one critical point of entry. But investigators also intend to piece together a far broader timeline of events in the fall of Mr. Foley's political career, an examination that will take them back years, to when whispers began circulating about the gregarious congressman's behavior.

One of their main tasks will be to sort out conflicting versions of events on a range of fronts, including whether Mr. Hastert's chief of staff, Scott Palmer, was alerted to Mr. Foley's conduct in 2003 or earlier. Mr. Palmer has denied such a warning.

And the investigation is not limited to Mr. Foley, according to a letter that is to be distributed on Tuesday to each member of the House of Representatives.

"We request that you contact current and former House pages sponsored by your office for the purpose of learning whether any of those individuals had any inappropriate communications or interactions with former Representative Foley or any other member of the House," said the letter, which was signed by the Republican and Democratic leaders of the investigation.

The Congressional page scandal has overshadowed the final month of the midterm election campaign and threatened to upend Mr. Hastert's leadership. After spending last week trying to convince his own party that he had handled the situation appropriately, Mr. Hastert has yet to resolve questions about when he became aware of Mr. Foley's behavior.

Representative Thomas M. Davis III, Republican of Virginia, delivered an unusually critical assessment on Sunday of how Mr. Hastert had responded. The answers may not become clear, Mr. Davis said, until people are forced to testify under oath. In addition to the House inquiry, the Federal Bureau of Investigation is also examining Mr. Foley's conduct.

"They were slow out of the starting block, there's no question about it," Mr. Davis said on "Face the Nation" on CBS. He added, "It's taken a week of fumbling around to get to where we are."

Representative Ray LaHood, Republican of Illinois, once chief of staff to Robert H. Michel of Illinois, the former Republican leader, said he did not believe Mr. Hastert had been served well by members of his staff. Some members of the speaker's staff had been aware for at least a year — and others possibly longer — about Mr. Foley's attention toward the teenage pages.

"I'm sure he's very angry about the fact that they withheld this information," said Mr. LaHood, a close friend of Mr. Hastert's. "So I hope he's talked to his staff. He deserves better than that."

Indeed, employees in the speaker's office are emerging as leading characters in answering a question born a generation ago in the Watergate scandal: Who knew what, and when did they know it?

There are inconsistencies in the accounts of top Republicans in the House, particularly regarding whether members of the leadership team told Mr. Hastert about reports of Mr. Foley's conduct. Representative Thomas M. Reynolds, a New York Republican who leads the National Republican Congressional Committee, has said he informed the speaker in the spring. Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, the majority leader, has said he also told Mr. Hastert.

"If Reynolds told me, it was in a line of things when we were in the middle of another crisis this spring," said Mr. Hastert, who spent much of the year dealing with the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal. "So I just don't recall or remember that."

Differences have also emerged in describing Mr. Foley's departure. Republican Party talking points now suggest that Republican leaders took forceful steps to secure a quick resignation. Yet early on, Mr. Hastert said, "I think Foley resigned almost immediately upon the outbreak of this information, so we really didn't have a chance to ask him to resign."

But accounts of senior aides in the House, who have not spoken publicly, could help investigators determine whether there was a Republican cover-up, as some Democrats have asserted.

It is Mr. Palmer, the speaker's longtime chief of staff and closest adviser, and Mike Stokke, the deputy chief of staff, whose stories are of particular interest to investigators. A former aide to Mr. Foley, Kirk Fordham, said he was prepared to testify that he told Mr. Palmer of complaints about Mr. Foley's conduct in 2003 or earlier. Mr. Palmer rebuts the claim.

This week, Mr. Fordham is expected to appear before the House ethics panel, his lawyer said, where he intends to testify that he asked Mr. Palmer to deliver a stern caution to Mr. Foley, who reportedly refused to keep his distance from pages, despite frequent warnings. This time, people familiar with the situation said, word had started to spread that Mr. Foley had tried to enter the page dormitory after curfew.

Mr. Stokke, who oversees the political operation for Mr. Hastert, said he became aware that Mr. Foley had been "overfriendly" with pages a year ago. Even though Mr. Hastert and his two employees share a townhouse on Capitol Hill and fly back to Illinois most every weekend, the two aides said they did not tell each other or Mr. Hastert about Mr. Foley's troubles.

Finally, Ted Van Der Meid, the counsel to the speaker, also learned about a year ago that Mr. Foley had been exchanging e-mail messages with a former page from Louisiana. Mr. Van Der Meid and Mr. Stokke gave the information to the House clerk, Mr. Trandahl, who convened the meeting last fall in Mr. Foley's office that is now the focus of so much attention.

To investigators, Mr. Trandahl's story could be the most important piece in determining when Republican leaders learned of Mr. Foley's conduct.

As clerk, Mr. Trandahl was elected by the members of the House to oversee its operations, a powerful position that he attained after nearly two decades on the Hill. He also supervised the page program, handling issues as disparate as roommate disputes among the high school students and complaints about Mr. Foley's behavior.

Mr. Trandahl, who has declined to comment, had been telling friends for months that he intended to leave the House last summer for a position in the private sector. In late September, he accepted an offer to become executive director of the National Fish and Wildlife Foundation.

On one of his final days in the House, in the first week of November, just hours before Democrats and Republicans had a farewell party for him, Mr. Trandahl made his way toward Room 104 in the Cannon Building to confront Mr. Foley.

Now, Mr. Trandahl is expected to return to the Hill in the coming days or weeks, to tell his story to the House ethics committee.

Inquiry May Test House's Legal Shields (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt

The Los Angeles Times, October 9, 2006

WASHINGTON — Five months ago, the FBI touched off a legal and political firestorm when it raided the office of Rep. William J. Jefferson after wads of marked $100 bills were found in the Louisiana Democrat's freezer.

Now, with major questions about that search still unsettled, the right of investigators to gain access to lawmakers' documents and computers is shaping up as a key battleground in the sex scandal probe surrounding former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.).

State and federal investigators are trying to determine whether Foley's Internet exchanges with former House pages constituted a crime. Since opening a preliminary investigation a week ago, they have started interviewing former pages and congressional aides.

Authorities are now deciding whether to subpoena records from the office and home computers that Foley used, according to people who are familiar with the case and who requested anonymity because of the ongoing inquiry. Such evidence would be central in building a case against the former lawmaker.

Depending on what authorities find, they also may be interested in obtaining records from House leaders and their staffs to determine what they knew about Foley and his interaction with pages. Those requests could test a pledge by House leaders, including Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), to cooperate fully in the probe.

Lawyers for the House have taken an aggressive position in defending the right of members to limit investigators' access to official information in past cases. They have argued in the Jefferson case that even the contents of members' personal electronic devices deserve such protection.

House lawyers have already told prosecutors that they would want any requests for information to be channeled through their office. Officials did not return calls seeking comment.

"There is a potential tension between the ex-congressman's counsel who will want to restrict the ability of the FBI to look at his records, and the FBI's unwillingness to do a visibly inadequate job," said Charles Tiefer, a University of Baltimore law professor and a former deputy general counsel of the House.

Lawyers for Foley will try to keep the FBI's examination of e-mail to a minimum, Tiefer said. "But that is hardly the way to find out the full story."

Foley said through a lawyer in Florida last week that he had received no request for computers or e-mail files from investigators, but pledged to preserve the information.

The sensational two-day raid on Jefferson's office in May made headlines because it was the first time that the FBI had ever conducted a search of the office of a member of Congress. Jefferson is the target of a federal bribery probe.

The search triggered a constitutional brawl over the extent to which members of Congress must cooperate with criminal investigators. President Bush ordered the Justice Department and the House to work out rules over how to handle future requests from investigators. But no agreement was reached. The matter has been left to the courts, where it is pending.

The debate concerns the interpretation of a provision of the Constitution known as the "speech or debate" clause that gives members immunity for their legislative activities.

House lawyers contended in the Jefferson case that the law requires investigators to give members of Congress the opportunity to review their files to delete protected material before turning them over.

Prosecutors have said that would give members a right not afforded ordinary citizens, and that giving lawmakers a chance to review files could lead to them being cleansed.

The case has not been decided, although in July, a federal appeals court ruled that Jefferson had a right, at least temporarily, to review the material sought by investigators, including paper documents and computer files.

Hundreds of pages that had been seized by investigators have been identified for review by Jefferson. But the process of turning over the computer files has proved highly cumbersome.

Though the FBI had seized the computers, an earlier court had barred agents from mining them for relevant evidence. Now, an independent, court-appointed computer forensics company has been assigned the task of trolling through the hard drives, using key words and other instructions from the FBI. The process could take months.

No one has argued yet that sexually tinged e-mail exchanges that Foley had with pages should be protected under the Constitution. Though he has resigned from Congress, Foley still has the right to determine which of his files will be turned over. "The privilege belongs to the former member. That is the historical understanding," Tiefer said.

But the lack of clear ground rules on how investigators obtain access to the material has left other aspects of the Foley case in uncharted territory.

Besides hunting for e-mail on Foley's computers, investigators may also want to plumb the backup computer servers that are operated by the House. Whether Foley has the right to limit access to those materials — or whether the right to do that belongs to the House as a whole — is unclear.

Experts in computer forensic analysis said the e-mails should be readily available on Foley's computers or through his Internet service provider, or, in the case of official e-mail, through the House e-mail system.

"E-mail is fairly easy, forensically, to look at," said Beryl Howell, a partner with Stroz Friedberg, a forensic computer analysis firm in Washington.

But retrieving instant messages can be tricky. Many online messaging services — such as AOL Instant Messenger, which Foley used — have features that allow users to disable their messages from being automatically saved on their computers. There are techniques for still obtaining the information, but that can pose problems for investigators. Instant messages "are more fleeting," Howell said.

In any event, Howell said that investigators probably would be able to retrieve the AOL "buddy list" of people with whom Foley exchanged messages. That could prove a crucial source of leads for investigators, she said.

Lawmaker Saw Foley Messages In 2000 (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 9, 2006

A Republican congressman knew of disgraced former representative Mark Foley's inappropriate Internet exchanges as far back as 2000 and personally confronted Foley about his communications.

A spokeswoman for Rep. Jim Kolbe (R-Ariz.) confirmed yesterday that a former page showed the congressman Internet messages that had made the youth feel uncomfortable with the direction Foley (R-Fla.) was taking their e-mail relationship. Last week, when the Foley matter erupted, a Kolbe staff member suggested to the former page that he take the matter to the clerk of the House, Karen Haas, said Kolbe's press secretary, Korenna Cline.

The revelation pushes back by at least five years the date when a member of Congress has acknowledged learning of Foley's behavior with former pages. A timeline issued by House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) suggested that the first lawmakers to know, Rep. John M. Shimkus (R-Ill.), the chairman of the House Page Board, and Rep. Rodney Alexander (R-La.), became aware of "over-friendly" e-mails only last fall. It also expands the universe of players in the drama beyond members, either in leadership or on the page board.

A source with direct knowledge of Kolbe's involvement said the messages shared with Kolbe were sexually explicit, and he read the contents to The Washington Post under the condition that they not be reprinted. But Cline denied the source's characterization, saying only that the messages had made the former page feel uncomfortable. Nevertheless, she said, "corrective action" was taken. Cline said she has not yet determined whether that action went beyond Kolbe's confrontation with Foley.

In interviews with The Post last week, multiple pages identified Kolbe as a close friend and personal confidante who was one of the only members of Congress to take any interest in them. A former page himself, Kolbe offered to mentor pages and kept in touch with some of them after they left the program, according to the interviews.

Kolbe once invited four former pages to make use of his Washington home while he was out of town, according to an instant message between Foley and another former page, Jordan Edmund, in January 2002. The pages planned to attend a first-year reunion of their page class. But because of a snowstorm, they did not take Kolbe up on his offer, according to one of the four pages.

Cline said one of the youths invited was a former page of Kolbe's. Because the congressman frequently travels on weekends, either to his Arizona ranch or abroad, the house is often available to friends, constituents, staffers and former staff members, such as a former page, she said.

Kolbe, the only openly gay Republican in Congress, is retiring at the end of the year.

The latest revelation in the growing House page scandal comes just a month before crucial midterm elections. Foley resigned Sept. 29 after ABC News confronted him with the sexually explicit messages that he exchanged with a former page, triggering investigations by the Justice Department, the House ethics committee and Florida authorities.

Hastert and his top aides have been sharply criticized by Democrats and some conservative Republicans for failing to act promptly after receiving warnings that Foley had been sexually predatory in dealing with pages and former pages. Ron Bonjean, the speaker's spokesman, said yesterday: "Allegations of inappropriate conduct by members of Congress towards pages need to be fully reviewed by the ethics committee and law enforcement."

In addressing the revelation about Kolbe, Bonjean said, "This allegation reiterates why the speaker has also called for a full review of the House page program to ensure that it is as safe and secure as possible."

A new poll by Newsweek indicates the Foley scandal is doing significant damage to the Republicans' political fortunes and could sink their chances of holding onto control of Congress on Election Day, Nov. 7. The poll found that 52 percent of Americans, including 29 percent of Republicans, believe Hastert was aware of Foley's Internet communications with underage pages and tried to cover up Foley's actions. More of those polled, 42 percent, now say they trust Democrats to do a better job handling moral values than Republicans; 36 percent favored Republicans on the values question.

In a sharp exchange on "Fox News Sunday," Rep. Jack Kingston (R-Ga.), the vice chairman of the House Republican Conference, insinuated that Democrats were behind the revelations of Foley's actions and the release of electronic messages showing Foley having sexually graphic or highly suggestive conversations with former pages.

"What I don't understand is where have these e-mails been for three years? Are we saying that a 15-year-old child would have sat on e-mails that were triple-X-rated for three years and suddenly spring them out right on the eve of an election? That's just a little bit too suspicious, even for Washington, D.C.," Kingston said.

Rep. Martin T. Meehan (D-Mass.) shot back, "If there's any evidence that you need that the values in Washington have turned upside down, you could just hear what Jack had to say. Only in Washington, D.C., can you take a group of people in charge of the House and basically have evidence that they've been looking the other way while a predator has been . . . going after 15- and 16-year-old pages, [and] they somehow . . . have the audacity to turn that into a political attack against Democrats."

So far, only ABC News and The Washington Post are known to have obtained the sexually explicit instant messages between two former pages and Foley. The Post obtained its copies from a former page who served on Capitol Hill with the other two pages.

Evangelicals Blame Foley, Not Republican Party (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, October 9, 2006

VIRGINIA BEACH, Oct. 7 — As word of Representative Mark Foley's sexually explicit e-mail messages to former pages spread last week, Republican strategists worried — and Democrats hoped — that the sordid nature of the scandal would discourage conservative Christians from going to the polls.

But in dozens of interviews here in southeastern Virginia, a conservative Christian stronghold that is a battleground in races for the House and Senate, many said the episode only reinforced their reasons to vote for their two Republican incumbents in neck-and-neck re-election fights, Representative Thelma Drake and Senator George Allen.

"This is Foley's lifestyle," said Ron Gwaltney, a home builder, as he waited with his family outside a Christian rock concert last Thursday in Norfolk. "He tried to keep it quiet from his family and his voters. He is responsible for what he did. He is paying a price for what he did. I am not sure how much farther it needs to go."

The Democratic Party is "the party that is tolerant of, maybe more so than Republicans, that lifestyle," Mr. Gwaltney said, referring to homosexuality.

Most of the evangelical Christians interviewed said that so far they saw Mr. Foley's behavior as a matter of personal morality, not institutional dysfunction.

All said the question of broader responsibility had quickly devolved into a storm of partisan charges and countercharges. And all insisted the episode would have little impact on their intentions to vote.

It is too soon to tell if the scandal will affect the turnout of evangelical Christians, who make up about a quarter of the electorate and more than a third of Republican voters. Some of President Bush's political advisers have said that pre-election reports in 2000 that Mr. Bush was once arrested for drunken driving depressed turnout among conservative Christians, nearly costing him the White House.

Pollsters and conservative leaders have said for months that grass-roots evangelicals were demoralized by what they felt was the Republicans' failure to live up to their talk about social issues — to say nothing of the economy, the Iraq war and other issues that weigh more broadly across the electorate. A recent poll by the Pew Research Center showed a steep drop in conservative Christian support for Republicans, albeit without a corresponding gain for the Democrats.

Some in the crowd waiting outside the concert, by the evangelical group MercyMe, said the revelations about Mr. Foley, Republican of Florida, had redoubled their previous concerns about the Republican Party.

"The Republicans need to tighten up their ship," said Wade Crane, a sign maker from Virginia Beach who said he usually voted Republican but had soured on the party in the last several months. "They need to stop covering themselves, using their power to protect themselves."

Charles W. Dunn, dean of the school of government at Regent University, founded here by the religious broadcaster Pat Robertson, said that so many conservative Christians were already in a funk about the party that "the Foley issue just opens up the potential floodgate for losses." The tawdry accusations, Mr. Dunn said, "give life" to the charges of Republican corruption that had been merely "latent" in the minds of many voters.

But as far as culpability in the Foley case, Mr. Dunn said, House Republicans may benefit from the evangelical conception of sin. Where liberals tend to think of collective responsibility, conservative Christians focus on personal morality. "The conservative Christian audience or base has this acute moral lens through which they look at this, and it is very personal," Mr. Dunn said. "This is Foley's personal sin."

To a person, those interviewed said that Speaker J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois should resign if he knew of the most serious claims against Mr. Foley and failed to stop him. They said the degree of Mr. Hastert's responsibility remained to be seen. Many said the issue had not changed their view of Congress because, in their opinion, it could not sink any lower.

But all also noted that the swift Democratic efforts to broaden the scandal to Mr. Hastert and other Republicans had added more than a whiff of partisanship to the stink of the scandal.

As the details were emerging last Tuesday, for example, Phil Kellam, the Democrat challenging Ms. Drake, called on her to demand Mr. Hastert's immediate resignation. In a statement, Mr. Kellam said the House Republican leaders' "lack of attention" was "perhaps more shocking" than what Mr. Foley had done.

Drew Lankford, a spokesman for Mr. Kellam, said the attacks on Ms. Drake had "painted her into a corner" because she was unwilling to denounce Mr. Hastert. Ms. Drake has said she will wait for a thorough investigation into what Mr. Hastert knew. (The matter has come up less in the Senate race between Mr. Allen and Jim Webb, the Democrat.)

Brian Courtney, a Republican-leaning sales manager attending the concert, said the Foley affair had led to "the kind of mudslinging one would expect to see at an election time like this." He added that he was paying closer attention to the "values and character" of the candidates, and that he would probably vote Republican again.

Republicans have put up a vigorous defense, mainly through conservative allies and on talk radio. An e-mail message to talk-radio hosts from the Republican Party last week asked, "How would Democrats react if one of their own had a sexual relationship with an intern, was found out, then lied to a grand jury in an attempt to cover it up?"

Rush Limbaugh devoted much of his airtime to the Democrats' defense of President Bill Clinton in the Monica Lewinsky scandal. Sean Hannity focused on former Representative Gerry Studds, a Massachusetts Democrat who in 1983 admitted having sex with a teenage male page, won re-election and served several more terms with the support of his colleagues.

Still, many conservative churchgoers said that what stood out for them was not the politics but the individual sin. “It is not going to affect my vote because I don’t live in Florida,” said Scott O’Connell, a mechanical engineer who described himself as a fundamentalist. “But there is a bigger moral issue which I would say is the prism I view this through: I do not believe in homosexuality.”

David Thomas, a father taking his family to the concert, said that he, too, was leaning toward voting Republican and that the scandal only reinforced his conservative Christian convictions. “That is the problem we have in society,” Mr. Thomas said. “Nobody polices anybody. Everybody has a ‘right’ to do whatever.”

In an interview on Friday, Pastor Anne Gimenez of the 15,000-member Rock Church here said the scandal “doesn’t change the issues we are voting on,” like abortion, public expression of religion and same-sex marriage.

The church has been actively registering parishioners and reminding them to vote. “Every Sunday already,” Ms. Gimenez said.

Fugitive Doctor Charged In Wife's Cyanide Death Arrested Overseas (AP)

By Joe Milicia, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 10, 2006

CLEVELAND — A fugitive doctor charged in the cyanide poisoning death of his wife has been arrested in Cyprus and will be sent back to the United States to face trial, the FBI said Monday.

Yazeed Essa, 38, of Gates Mills, east of Cleveland, was arrested Saturday as he attempted to clear customs in Cyprus after arriving on a flight from Beirut, Lebanon, the FBI said in a news release.

Essa was arrested on a charge of unlawful flight to avoid prosecution stemming from a charge of aggravated murder filed against him in February. He will be held in Cyprus until U.S. authorities extradite him to Cleveland.

Essa disappeared three weeks after his wife, Rosemarie "Rosie" Essa, collapsed behind the wheel of her car and died Feb. 24, 2005.

She was driving to see a movie when she lost control of her sport utility vehicle and was involved in a minor crash about five miles from the couple's home in suburban Gates Mills.

Before she died, she used her cell phone to call a friend, and gasping for air, said that her husband made her take calcium pills and she didn't feel well. Prosecutors say it's their key piece of evidence in the case.

Prosecutors say Essa, known as "Yaz," was a philanderer. They characterized the murder as "divorce substitute," saying he was having an affair with a nurse and wanted to be free of his 38-year-old wife.

His lawyer, Larry Zukerman, said he could not comment yet because he did not have all the facts about Essa's confinement.

Scott Wilson, an FBI agent in Cleveland, said Cyprus authorities questioned Essa because they suspected his travel documents were fraudulent. Cyprus officials checked with the international police agency Interpol to make an identification, he said.

Rosie Essa's family issued a statement that said, "We are hopeful that this development will lead to the answers that we have been seeking since Rosie's death and will mark the beginning of the end of this heartbreaking ordeal for our family."

The family said that largely out of concern for the Essa children they will have no further comment while they await the outcome of the legal process.

Rosie Essa's brother and sister-in-law took custody of the Essas' two children, who were 4 and 2 when their father disappeared in March 2005.

If convicted of aggravated murder, Essa could be sentenced to 20 years to life in prison.

Essa called his wife's brothers the day of her accident and they recalled he sounded genuinely worried and upset.

When they arrived at the hospital, Essa told them with a cold, clinical finality that she was dead, his wife's relatives said. He appeared to grieve and allowed her family to make all the funeral arrangements.

Authorities believe Essa traveled to Syria, Greece and Lebanon and possibly visited Florida. His family owns property in the Palestinian territories.

Wilson said he did not know details about Essa's extradition. U.S. Department of Justice spokesman Bryan Sierra said he could not provide details about Essa's return to the states because Monday was a federal holiday and the department was closed.

FBI Looks At More Than Veco (ADN)

By Lisa Demer, Anchorage Daily News

Anchorage (AK) Daily News, October 10, 2006

INQUIRY: Officials show interest in a developer and the Department of Corrections.

When FBI agents searched the Wasilla office of Rep. Vic Kohring on Aug. 31, they weren't just looking for documents related to Veco Corp., its executives and ties to lawmakers. They also wanted information about developer Marc Marlow as well as the state Department of Corrections.

That element of the ongoing FBI investigation emerged last week when Kohring's attorney, Wayne Anthony Ross, provided a copy of the search warrant to the Daily News, along with the list of items taken. Those documents, though lacking detail or context, suggest that the probe is wide-ranging and not focused on any one company, issue or individual.

No one has been charged in the investigation, and federal authorities have declined to discuss it except to say that it continues. The lead prosecutors are from the Department of Justice's Public Integrity Section in Washington, D.C., which often handles government corruption cases.

In all, offices of six lawmakers have been searched, along with Veco offices and additional undisclosed locations. Other lawmakers whose offices weren't searched have said they were interviewed by the FBI.

Kohring, a Republican, is not the only Alaska lawmaker who hired an attorney within days of the search.

Senate President Ben Stevens, R-Anchorage, has hired a prominent Seattle criminal defense lawyer, John Wolfe.

Wolfe, who declined to comment last week, has been named as one of Seattle's top criminal defense lawyers by Seattle Magazine. He's represented the famous and the infamous, from Seattle Seahawks players and judges to strip club owners and a pawnshop associate. He has worked in Alaska, representing a former Doyon Drilling Inc. worker who pleaded guilty in 1998 to concealing the dumping of hazardous materials on the North Slope.

"I think it's probably fair to assume that everybody's lawyered up," said Kevin Fitzgerald, an Anchorage defense attorney representing another of the legislators, though he wouldn't say which one.

Fitzgerald was part of the team that earlier this year won not-guilty verdicts in the federal rocket launcher case in Anchorage involving Security Aviation. The other lead defense lawyers in that case -- Paul Stockler and former U.S. Attorney Bob Bundy -- also are representing separate parties in the new FBI investigation, though they wouldn't say whom, either.

Hiring an attorney is a common practice in criminal investigations even for people who don't believe they are targets. For instance, individuals may want a lawyer to talk to prosecutors about the status of an investigation, to recover evidence taken in searches or to advise them on whether to talk and what to say.

Efforts to reach Kohring on Friday were unsuccessful, but in the past he has said he's cooperating in the investigation, is not a target and has been careful to follow all ethics rules.

Ross said he doesn't see that Kohring has done anything wrong.

"He asked me to advise him what the procedures mean and just make sure he doesn't step on his nose. He was told that he's not a suspect and of course I told him that, to be real honest with you, you can't always believe what you are told," Ross said, adding that he didn't expect any criminal charges against Kohring.

According to an FBI receipt for the property, agents took a folder with information on Marlow, phone message books, a Gateway computer from Kohring's office, fundraising notes -- which Ross said were essentially required campaign reports to the state -- a box of canceled checks, a thank-you note from Veco, bank statements, bills and an unexplained "business application and dividend papers."

"It doesn't look like anything there, any smoking guns or anything," Ross said.

Kohring and Marlow have known each other for years. Marlow hired him in 2004, according to disclosure statements that Kohring was required to file as a legislator. He reported income of $5,400 from Marlow that year and $38,100 in 2005. Kohring continues to provide "business services" for Marlow, arranging and conducting meetings, performing research and developing plans and strategies, Kohring said in an e-mail to the Daily News last month. Marlow has said that Kohring was helping him with plans to build a power plant in the Mat-Su, and Kohring has said he worked on a total of about six projects.

Reached on the telephone Friday, Marlow said he had no idea why the FBI would be interested in his relationship with Kohring. The FBI hasn't interviewed him or searched his offices, he said.

Kohring agreed to the search of his office, but the agents came prepared with a warrant that sought, among other things, any documents concerning relationships, correspondence, giving or receiving "things of value of any nature," or acts or failures to act that involved Veco executives Bill Allen, Richard Smith, Peter Leathard, Roger Chan, Veco itself, The Petroleum Club, pollster David Dittman, pollster Marc Hellenthal and Marlow.

"Cool. I made the list," Marlow joked. "What a crowd to be associated with."

The warrant also sought all correspondence between Kohring and the Alaska Department of Corrections. Ross said Kohring was questioned by the FBI about efforts to build a private prison in Whittier.

"He indicated it was a facility that Cornell was hoping to build in the past and that's apparently all they asked about that," Ross said. Cornell Cos. had teamed with Veco in the private prison endeavor, which ultimately died last year after the city of Whittier dropped its support.

Along with those of Kohring and Stevens, FBI agents searched offices of Sen. John Cowdery, R-Anchorage; Sen. Donny Olson, D-Nome; Rep. Pete Kott, R-Eagle River; and Rep. Bruce Weyhrauch, R- Juneau. Messages left for them were not returned. Kohring is the only one of the six still facing an election battle in November. Kott lost in the primary, Stevens and Weyhrauch aren't running again and the others aren't up this year.

Much of the wording on the Kohring search warrant is identical to the language on one provided by Olson's office the day after the search. Both are five pages long. In the warrants, agents sought documents concerning "any thing of value" provided by Allen, the Veco chief executive officer; Smith, a Veco vice president; or Veco itself to any public official. Agents were also looking for documents concerning the creation of a natural gas pipeline or the new petroleum production tax. They wanted financial documents related to the legislator, including bank records, wire transfers and credit card statements. They wanted to search computers, too. But where agents sought information on Marlow and the Department of Corrections from Kohring, they wanted documents on Olson Air Service including any payments or storage fees related to aircraft from Olson, a doctor who owns a flying service.

None of the other legislators provided warrants in response to requests from the Daily News.

Stevens' legislative office is the only one searched twice, according to the FBI. In a letter to the Daily News last month, the Anchorage Republican said he agreed to both searches but had been advised not to answer questions. He didn't provide the warrant, but his letter listed what was taken by the FBI.

Many of the items hauled away were seemingly innocuous public records such as presentations on the new petroleum profits tax and a copy of the state legislative handbook. But the materials also included letters from Stevens regarding the Alaska Fisheries Marketing Board, which he had headed since its creation by his father, U. S. Sen. Ted Stevens, until he resigned earlier this year. The board provided federal grants totaling between $5 million to $10 million a year to companies to promote Alaska seafood. At least three of the grant beneficiaries paid consulting fees to Ben Stevens.

The FBI also took "unknown documents" of Ted Stevens with a June 5 cover page and a Jan. 23 faxed letter to "T. Stevens."

Ted Stevens has repeatedly declined to comment and last month explained why in an e-mail sent through his spokesman.

"I understand the public's interest in the investigation. It has always been my practice to not comment on such matters to avoid even the appearance that I might influence the investigation. That is especially important in this case where records have been obtained from a number of legislators, including my son Ben. Therefore, I am withholding comment about this matter and will not discuss it," Stevens said in the Sept. 27 e-mail.

The FBI investigation at a glance

What's known:

· Dozens of FBI agents executed about two dozen search warrants Aug. 31 and Sept. 1, though in some cases individuals agreed to the search.

· Six legislative offices were searched, and so was Veco Corp. Searches were conducted in Anchorage, Juneau, Eagle River, Wasilla, Willow and Girdwood. The office of Senate President Ben Stevens was then searched a second time, on Sept. 18.

· One search warrant, provided by Sen. Donny Olson, said the FBI was looking for "any and all documents" related to Veco, four of its executives and two political pollsters, as well as information on Olson Air Service, among other matters. When agents searched Stevens' office, they seized materials related to controversial fisheries organizations. In the search of Rep. Vic Kohring's office, agents also sought information on developer Marc Marlow and on the state Department of Corrections.

· The lead prosecutors on the case are from the Justice Department's Public Integrity Section in Washington, D.C., which handles public corruption cases.

· No one has been charged.

What's not known:

· Perhaps the biggest of the many unanswered questions is this: Who or what is being targeted?

· Authorities also won't say how many FBI agents or prosecutors are working on the investigation, when it began, when it might end or how they are proceeding.

Schools Chief Tried To Get Work For His Pal (FREEP)

By Chastity Pratt And Jennifer Dixon, Free Press Staff Writers

Detroit Free Press, October 10, 2006

Friend focus of FBI probe

Detroit Public Schools Superintendent William F. Coleman III urged a firm vying for district contracts to seek consulting help last fall from a friend who is under investigation for allegedly accepting illegal favors as a top school official in Dallas.

Coleman acknowledged to the Free Press that he knew the FBI was investigating his friend, Ruben Bohuchot, at the time Coleman suggested Bohuchot to the Detroit company. "This was a way to help an old friend, who's unemployed, to make a few dollars," Coleman said of connecting Bohuchot with Detroit-based Information Solutions Group Services.

"In hindsight, I guess that was a stupid decision."

Late Monday afternoon, as the Free Press was to publish a story about Coleman's actions, he issued a statement recommending the district cancel and rebid the contract linked to Information Solutions.

Making reference to Bohochot without naming him, Coleman's statement defended both his friend and the contract award. But, Coleman wrote, "unjustified clouds of suspicion" now hang over the contract, causing "a needless distraction."

It remains unclear to what extent, if any, Bohuchot helped Information Solutions or any other vendor win work with the district. But Coleman's decision to recommend a friend under criminal investigation had the superintendent questioning his own judgment, and school board members Monday joining in.

"Oh, my gosh," said board vice president Joyce Hayes-Giles when told of Coleman's actions.

"There are a number of issues we have under review and that was just one of them," she said. "We may have to rebid the whole thing."

Board president Jimmy Womack said he didn't believe Bohuchot's friendship with Coleman affected who received work. But, he added:

"We certainly have to take into consideration any influence those relationships may have had on the recommendation that came from the superintendent to the board," Womack said.

The district's actions Monday were but the latest controversy surrounding the recent award of $58 million in technology contracts. The district announced in July it was replacing Detroit-based Compuware, which had performed district technology work since 2001, with four smaller vendors. Compuware appealed and questioned the bidding process.

Compuware spokesman Doug Kuiper said the company "looks forward to a fair and open rebidding process."

Ruben Bohuchot has been under investigation by the FBI since the summer of 2005, when the Dallas Morning News reported that Bohuchot, then technology chief for Dallas schools, routinely accepted the free use of a luxury sports-fishing yacht owned by Micro System Enterprises, a major computer vendor to the Dallas district. That probe has since been joined by the Federal Communications Commission.

Long-time friends

Coleman said Saturday that he has been friends with Bohuchot for a decade. They first met in San Francisco, where Coleman was that district's finance chief and Bohuchot the technology chief. They then landed in Dallas, where they held the same roles. The pair even traveled to Alaska together in 2001 to go fishing.

After the newspaper report last year, Bohuchot was placed on paid suspension by Dallas and eventually left the district.

Bohuchot's troubles were well publicized last fall when Coleman said he ran into Julius Bender, owner of Information Solutions Group.

Coleman said he casually asked Bender if he planned to bid on soon-to-expire technology contracts. Bender said he didn't know where to start with writing a proposal, and asked Coleman if he knew anyone who could help him, Coleman said.

Coleman recommended Bohuchot.

"I didn't know that it went any further than that," Coleman said. He added: "I just don't believe there is a relationship" between Bohuchot and Bender. "But if I've been misled by Ruben before, perhaps I've been misled again."

Bohuchot, who is still listed as living in Dallas, could not be reached for comment.

Bender confirmed Coleman's account of their meeting. But he said that while he may have spoken with Bohuchot by phone, he never hired him. "We didn't pursue a relationship," Bender said. "He's not in this deal with us. I swear."

While Bender's company never bid directly on technology contracts, it partnered in the winning bid of another company, GVC Networks LLC, for the district's telecommunications and information technology services. It's that bid, which was to pay $726,000 annually, that Coleman sought to cancel Monday.

Stephanie Grimes, a spokeswoman for GVC, said GVC was supposed to sign the contract Tuesday.

"We believe we provided a solid proposal." she said.

Grimes confirmed that Bender's company was supposed to work with GVC when GVC bid on the technology work. But she said when GVC only secured the telecommunications portion of the contract, it no longer needed Bender's company "in no way, shape or form."

Detroit school records show Bohuchot attended a pre-bid meeting in Detroit in January for companies interested in the technologies contracts.

He signed in using the address and phone number for Bender's company - though Bohuchot incorrectly listed the company as “Integrated” Solutions.

Bender said last week he has no idea why Bohuchot used his company's address to sign in.

Coleman said he did not know Bohuchot had traveled to Detroit until a board member inquired about Bohuchot at the July meeting when the contracts were approved. Coleman acknowledged that he did not tell the board about his ties to Bohuchot at the time.

Coleman sat on a committee that recommended the four vendors, though the board made the final choice. Since the awards, Coleman had defended the bidding process and said the new vendors will save the district millions.

Two days after the four vendors were approved, Bohuchot set up a consulting company in Dallas, Portico Consulting LLC, records show. He lists himself as a manager. The following day, DPS issued a press release naming the companies that won the contracts.

Coleman also said he was recently interviewed by the FBI about his relationship with Bohuchot, but he said the questions related to his friend's activities in Dallas, not Detroit.

“The thing that's very, very troubling to me is that there's going to be some assumption that I'm corrupt,” Coleman said. “I am not corrupt, there's no aura of corruption about Bill Coleman.”

DPS Will Rebid Part Of IT Contract (DEN)

Detroit News, October 10, 2006

Superintendent said to be linked to businessman who is affiliated with firm that won part of bid.

Detroit Public Schools Superintendent William F. Coleman III said Monday he will ask the school board to rescind and rebid a portion of the district's information technology contract after allegations of unfairness and "influence peddling" surfaced in the bidding process.

Compuware Corp. and Strategic Staffing Solutions asked the board last month to reconsider the companies selected in July to update and provide telecommunications services, alleging that DPS used flawed methods. Allegations have also been made that link Coleman to a Dallas acquaintance Ruben Bohuchot, who is said to be affiliated with Detroit-based Information Solutions Group, which partnered with GVC Networks LLC to win a bid from the district.

In a statement issued by Coleman last month, Coleman defended the contract approval process, saying the new contract will save DPS "millions of dollars."

"It is unfortunate that some feel that they are entitled to the IT contract even though their proposals would have cost the district as much as $30 million more," he said.

Coleman said that at a school board meeting last month, "months after the contracts were awarded," he learned about Buhuchot's attendance at a bidders' conference for the IT proposal review.

"His involvement has led to allegations and concerns of undue influence," Coleman said, adding that the claims are "completely and unequivocally false."

"My staff and I believed when we recommended that GVC/Information Solutions Group be awarded the contract that we were acting in the best interests of the district and the taxpayers of the city of Detroit. I still believe that," Coleman said in a statement issued Monday. "But it is clear that the GVC/Information Solutions Group contract is becoming a major distraction that has the potential to hamper our mission as an education institution."

GVC Networks LLC, one of four companies awarded a portion of the $58 million, five-year contract, ranked lowest in the evaluation process of 17 bidders.

Criteria included staffing plans, cost, past performance expertise and employment of minorities and women.

Representatives from GVC Networks could not be reached for comment. Julius Bender Jr., president of Information Solutions Group Inc., had no comment.

"Ever since the contracts were awarded to these companies, we've been under considerable attack," said district spokesman Lekan Oguntoyinbo.

"If there's a cloud of suspicion in anyone's mind, we need to go after that."

School Board President Jimmy Womack said the board is studying the evaluation process used to select the companies. He did not expect the board to make a decision at Thursday's school board meeting.

"Primarily, our concern is to understand more clearly the process in general and how it was applied to the IT contract," he said.

Health Care Executive Faces New Indictment (WT)

By Jim Mcelhatton, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 9, 2006

The chief executive of a District-based mental health organization has been indicted on money-laundering charges months after federal prosecutors said he bilked the city's Medicaid program.

The new charges add to the legal problems faced by Ricardo F. Henry, founder of Insight Therapeutic Services Inc. He pleaded not guilty to health care fraud charges after his indictment in March.

Federal authorities said a government auditor has estimated that up to 80 percent of the Medicaid claims submitted by Mr. Henry from 1999 to 2002 were false. In addition, they said, Mr. Henry lied about having a doctorate degree.

Mr. Henry received about $500,000 from the city's Medicaid program in 2001 and 2002, prosecutors said. In the charges filed Friday, authorities said Mr. Henry committed bankruptcy fraud and money laundering.

The new charges stem in part from more than $100,000 spent by Mr. Henry for a 2001 Porsche 911 Carrera. The money, prosecutors said, was obtained through health care fraud. Authorities also say he registered the car in another person's name in New York to hide the purchase from creditors.

Mr. Henry filed for bankruptcy last year, but the case was reopened earlier this year after federal authorities raided his D.C. apartment and seized the car and other assets.

Among the other assets Mr. Henry tried to conceal from creditors were $120,000 from the sale of a home in Silver Spring and at least six firearms, including a Winchester rifle set, according to the indictment.

A status report in the criminal case issued last week states that Mr. Henry faces two trials, one for bankruptcy fraud and another for health care fraud. Mr. Henry's attorney likely will seek separate trials, while prosecutors are expected to oppose the move.

Mr. Henry's attorneys have disputed the charges, according to the status report.

"It is the defense's position that rather than cleanly charging provable offenses, the government has thrown everything but the kitchen sink into the 62-count original indictment hoping something will stick with the jury under the 'where there's smoke there's fire' theory," the report states.

But prosecutors counter in the seven-page report that they have "carefully selected the indicted counts from literally thousands of possible charges."

Predators Build Trust With Children Online (WT)

By Cheryl Wetzstein, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 9, 2006

Young children and teens can become sexually victimized -- especially via the Internet -- when they don't realize they are being "groomed" by canny adults, say experts on child exploitation.

To parents, "our basic message is get that [personal computer] out of the bedroom and put it in a public place and set some limits and know what your kids are doing," said Ernie Allen, president of the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children.

The Internet plays a huge role in child exploitation, and adults who work with youths should do so only in ways that are above reproach, Mr. Allen said.

This means "don't use instant messaging in the middle of the night," he added.

The use of e-mails and instant messages as exploitation tools has been garnering attention since recent news reports of former Rep. Mark Foley's sexually explicit electronic messages with former congressional pages, who were teenagers at the time.

The Florida Republican resigned his office, has entered an alcoholism rehabilitation program and is being investigated by law-enforcement agencies.

"Any suggestion that Mark Foley is a pedophile is false, categorically false," Mr. Foley's attorney, David Roth, told a televised press conference in Florida last week . "Mark Foley denies ever, ever having any sexual contact with a minor."

However, Mr. Foley's online conversations with several male pages, which focused on the teens' physical activities and genitals, sound like grooming practices employed by sexual predators, sex-abuse experts said.

DOJ_NMG_0076991

Typically, a relationship starts out "in a very innocent way," with the predator acting like a friend to the victim, said Lynn Parrish, spokeswoman for the Rape, Abuse and Incest National Network (RAINN).

The predator develops the friendship by giving the young person gifts, empathizing with his or her problems and building a relationship of trust, she said. But at some point, the relationship takes a sexual turn, "and because it happens gradually over time ... young people miss these cues."

"Teens don't recognize the grooming when they see it; the kid is totally oblivious to it until it's too late," said Patrick Trueman, the former head of the Justice Department's unit on child exploitation and obscenity.

Once sexual contact is made, the predator will "hold it over you," he said. He can pressure the child for more sexual contact, saying, "'Oh, if you don't do this again, I've got these pictures of you now. Your friends are going to know all about this. We're just alike. You're just like me.'"

Children and teens will feel shame and confusion and refuse to talk about what happened, even though they should, Mr. Trueman said. This, in turn, can lead to "a cycle of abuse," in which the youths become promiscuous or turn to substance abuse.

"The effects can last a lifetime unless you get help," said Ms. Parrish, who urged victims of sexual abuse to call RAINN's hot line, 800/656-HOPE.

More Calls For Death Penalty In Child Rapes (LAT)

By Lianne Hart

The Los Angeles Times, October 10, 2006

HOUSTON — With the election just a month away, politicians examining ways to stop violent sexual offenders from striking again are increasingly calling for laws that would allow states to execute repeat child molesters.

Texas Lt. Gov. David Dewhurst is the latest to join the effort, proposing a plan Oct. 3 that would require a minimum mandatory prison sentence of 25 years for first-time offenders and the possibility of death for a second conviction.

If enacted, the measure "will protect the children of Texas, and let people know to get out of our state if this is your sickness," Dewhurst campaign spokesman Enrique Marquez said. "If that's something you want to do, not in our state you won't."

In recent months, similar ideas have been pushed by lawmakers in Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi and even Minnesota, which doesn't have the death penalty. Most are modeled after Florida's Jessica's Law, a child-protection measure named for 9-year-old Jessica Lunsford, who was raped and killed by a registered sex offender in 2005.

This year, Oklahoma and South Carolina passed laws allowing the death penalty for the rape of a child. Execution is also an option for offenders who commit certain sex crimes against children in Montana and Louisiana.

Critics say that if child sex crimes are a capital offense, victims might be reluctant to report abuse because the offenders often are family members. "If you've got a father or brother or uncle molesting a young person, a lot of people aren't going to turn them in if it means they'll be sent to jail or put to death," said Michael Mears, director of the Georgia Public Defender Standards Council.

Another concern is that the measures might give assailants an incentive to kill the victim. "If the penalty for murder and molestation is the same, why not go ahead and kill the only witness to the event?" Mears said.

David Bruck, a law professor who directs the Virginia Capital Case Clearinghouse at Washington and Lee University in Lexington, Va., has the same concern. "To the extent that this is meant to be a way of protecting children, it may well have the opposite effect," he said.

But legislators such as Jay Paul Gumm — the state senator who sponsored Oklahoma's child sex crime bill — said that a person who would rape a child has no regard for life under any circumstance. "Anybody who would prey on the innocence of a child and destroy a soul is more than deserving of the death penalty in my way of thinking," Gumm said. "These are crimes that have lifelong effects on the victims. Some never have a normal life. It destroys life as surely as a gun to the head."

Louisiana houses the only death row inmate convicted of a child rape that did not result in murder. Patrick Kennedy, convicted in 2003 of raping an 8-year-old girl, was sentenced under a 1995 law that allows the death penalty for the rape of a child younger than 12. His case is on appeal.

In 1996, the Louisiana Supreme Court upheld the state's death penalty law for child rapists. But the Kennedy case could end in a showdown if it reaches the U.S. Supreme Court: In 1977, the high court held that a person convicted of the rape of a woman could not be sentenced to death because the punishment would be out of proportion with the crime.

"It's cruel and unusual punishment," Bruck said. "[Child rape] is a terrible crime, but it ain't murder."

Bruck said an attention-grabbing proposal to kill child sex offenders is like "political crack cocaine. It attracts publicity and people's attention at a very visceral level" but in the end, he said, does little good.

DOJ_NMG_0076992

But Gumm, the Oklahoma legislator, denied that such legislation was an election-year gimmick. "Public opinion in my district and this state is extraordinarily positive toward this law," he said.

"People have grown sick and tired of instances where child molesters have gotten out of prison only to molest again," Gumm said. "This sends a message that this behavior will not be tolerated, and we are going to find you, prosecute you and exact the most severe punishment possible."

Star Witness's Cheating Ways Heating Up Trial (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig

The Washington Post, October 10, 2006

Jaws dropped and even the judge cringed when the former D.C. government official told a jury about the brazen ways he fabricated invoices and inflated bills to steal city money for himself and his friends.

Michael Lorusso once got his bosses to hand over to him $1 million, and he used it to lease space that wasn't even usable. Besides giving contractors inflated profits, Lorusso said he gave them gifts at taxpayer expense -- including antique barbershop chairs from a city warehouse and laptop computers purchased with a city credit card.

He is the prosecution's star witness in the federal court trial of developer Douglas Jemal. Prosecutors are trying to show that Jemal bribed Lorusso in return for favorable deals. Whether Lorusso is helping to build a case against Jemal is up to the jury to decide; the defense is challenging his credibility. But Lorusso's testimony has been as much an indictment of the D.C. government and the Williams administration, which was forced to make changes amid pressure from outraged members of the D.C. Council.

In an administration that prided itself on running a clean, reform-minded government, the swaggering Lorusso, the deputy director of property management, said he approved hundreds of thousands of dollars in contractor payments for work that was never done.

Lorusso worked for the city from November 2000 to January 2003, when he was fired after the council raised questions about his deals. He later pleaded guilty to bribery conspiracy and is hoping for a reduced sentence in return for his cooperation against Jemal and two other executives from Douglas Development Corp.: Jemal's son, Norman, and Blake Esherick. He is scheduled to resume testifying today in the courtroom of Judge Ricardo M. Urbina.

Only when Lorusso took the stand last week did many details of his crimes, and the breadth and gall of his fraud, become publicly known.

Lorusso, 40, admitted arranging leases that paid Jemal yearly rent so exorbitant it equaled the developer's purchase price. Lorusso ran his own furniture and investment businesses from his District offices and computer and took hundreds of thousands of dollars in city property, including the chairs, the laptops and other items. But no one flagged it.

"On my signature, I could take anything I wanted in the District," Lorusso testified.

Until Lorusso pleaded guilty in 2004, Mayor Anthony A. Williams (D) was reluctant to admit that the city was cheated -- despite several independent audits the previous year which determined that millions were spent for construction work, authorized by Lorusso, that had never been done. In an interview with NewsChannel 8 in summer 2003, Williams questioned what proof anyone had of outright theft but acknowledged that the city needed stricter controls on contracts.

Administration officials say several loopholes Lorusso exploited have been tightened.

Then-newly arrived Herbert R. Tillery, deputy mayor for operations, was tapped in 2003 to protect the city from another Lorusso. In an interview last week, Tillery said that the city largely had safeguards and good rules in place when Lorusso was working but that they needed to be diligently enforced. He said the city now has officials within each agency review all leases, contracts and routine price increases in contracts -- instead of continuing the unusual arrangement in which Lorusso single-handedly authorized such deals.

Each agency's contracting officer is now trained to spot fraud and given stern warnings about the responsibility to protect city money. Although the city had regulations allowing it to penalize such officers for losses and improper cost overruns, Tillery said, now it follows through. Similarly, the city had a computer system for tracking contracts before Lorusso, Tillery said, but now it has improved it and required that agencies monitor such contracts monthly.

"Now there are several extra eyes on the contracting process," Tillery said. "It takes longer . . . but when we take shortcuts on contracts, that's when we get into trouble."

Lorusso was fired after the council began challenging leases for office space with Jemal's company as well as a plan to buy an impoundment lot from Jemal in Prince George's County. Council members also looked into steep payments Lorusso arranged to a contractor at One Judiciary Square, a municipal building.

The first indications of trouble surfaced in fall 2002, when the council balked at the impound lease proposal. More was revealed in the summer of 2003, when Jim Graham (D-Ward 1) completed an extraordinary council investigation into Lorusso's dealmaking, revealing, among other things, that Lorusso had "cooked" an appraisal to suggest that the city should pay $12.5 million for the impound lot. It had cost Jemal just $1.5 million four years earlier. After a council outcry, the city did not buy the lot.

Lorusso is the only D.C. government employee charged in the case. But based on his testimony, D.C. officials have more digging to do. He asserted in court that other city workers helped him break the law. Lorusso told the jury, for example, that he invited two staff members to join in a plan designed to help him get rid of a burdensome car payment. Together, they fabricated a $25,000 bill to the city for moving services from a company that employed one of the staffer's relatives, Lorusso said. The moving company then cashed a city check for the staffers, Lorusso said. The staffers gave him most of the $25,000 in return for his Audi convertible, he said.

As of Friday, the staff member were still on the Office of Property Management payroll, although one is on leave. They did not return calls.

Carol Mitten, the new director of the office, said she was surprised by what surfaced in court. "The first I heard about this dummy invoice is from the trial," she said.

Lorusso's testimony raises questions about whether more protections are needed, according to council member Adrian M. Fenty (D-Ward 4), who likely will succeed Williams as mayor next year.

"This type of waste, fraud and abuse is inexcusable, and those responsible must be held accountable," Fenty said.

Council member Carol Schwartz (R-At Large), who was the first to balk at the impound lot proposal in September 2002, said she remains mystified at how top city leaders couldn't have known some of what Lorusso was doing.

Graham said the testimony vindicates his investigation but won't satisfy the larger question taxpayers should be asking the city: "Just how did he get away with all this?"

'Liberty Dollars' Can Buy Users A Prison Term, U.S. Mint Warns (WP)

By Elizabeth Williamson

The Washington Post, October 10, 2006

Once upon a time, a "monetary architect" named Bernard von NotHaus decided to make his own money.

He put a beautiful Lady Liberty and a majestic flaming torch on the silver and gold coins, and he named them "Liberty Dollars." On his Web site, http://www.libertydollar.org , he said: "It is fun to use REAL money. Liberty Dollars are a proven and profitable currency that protects and grows the purchasing power of your money!"

True story, phony money. So says the U.S. Mint, which would like to remind Liberty Dollar users that since the United States already has its own currency, the only thing Liberty Dollars buy in these parts is a jail term.

Liberty Dollars were coined by von NotHaus and an Evansville, Ind.-based group called Norfed, which stands for (sort of) the National Organization for the Repeal of the Federal Reserve Act and the Internal Revenue Code. In the late 1990s, the group began hawking its money as a hedge against inflation, and as a way to compete with the Fed. Von NotHaus makes the pitch online, using a raft of statistics and graphs that he says show the greenback is well nigh worthless.

Norfed Executive Director Michael Johnson says the group isn't aiming to overthrow the American monetary system. "We're not locking horns with the Fed. I mean, that's crazy," he said. Norfed simply wants "to offer a solution to the Federal Reserve Note," a.k.a. U.S. dollars.

Norfed struck the first gold- and silver-backed coins -- which, to avoid charges of making its own money it calls "rounds" -- in 1998 at its private mint in Idaho. Today the group claims to have more than $20 million in Liberty coins and notes in circulation, and about 2,500 merchants who accept Liberty Dollars for goods and services from doughnuts to tattoos.

But there's a potentially more sinister side to all this. A 1999 report by the Southern Poverty Law Center calls Norfed a far-right anti-government group that has "long claimed that American dollars are . . . part of a vast conspiracy by international bankers to defraud the rest of the world." The center links some Norfed devotees to far-right hate groups.

"That definitely is not the philosophy of the organization," Johnson said. "I've been a Republican for most of my life. . . . We are focused on the mainstream. . . . I guess we are libertarian. But definitely not anti-government."

The U.S. Mint acted after federal prosecutors around the country began forwarding inquiries about the coins. "We don't take these consumer alerts lightly," said spokeswoman Becky Bailey. "Merchants and banks are confronted by confused customers demanding they accept Liberty Dollars. These are not legal coin."

Norfed responded to the Mint on its Web site. "Here it is in plain sight . . . the Liberty Dollar is not a coin, not legal tender, and backed with inflation proof gold and silver!"

"Goliath just introduced David to millions of Americans as a nationally recognized underdog," the site continues. "Just as Pepsi went up against Coke with their 'take the Pepsi Challenge' campaign, the Liberty Dollar will take it to the people to decide which currency they should use."

DOJ_NMG_0076994

Norfed encouraged people to keep doing "the drop," referring to its advice to drop the coin into merchants' hands so they can feel its weight.

That could land the dropper in prison, Bailey warns, for up to five years.

L.A. Police Say Killing Of 3-Year-Old In Gang Attack Was Intentional (LAT)

By Richard Winton And Erika Hayasaki, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, October 10, 2006

Kaitlyn Avila, 3, was shot at point-blank range after her father was wounded in the gang-related attack in Baldwin Village, police say.

A 3-year-old girl, fatally shot as her family arrived home after a Sunday afternoon trip to McDonalds, was intentionally targeted by a teenage gang member who fired at point-blank range, police said Monday.

The announcement, which came as detectives sought the public's help in finding the killer, prompted new anxiety in the Southwest Los Angeles neighborhood of Baldwin Village, which has struggled with gang violence for decades.

Though police said they don't know the motive for the girl's slaying, some parents expressed fear that the Oct. 1 shooting was a twisted gang initiation gone tragically wrong.

A joint task force of the Los Angeles Police Department and FBI, which has been investigating Kaitlyn Avila's death, arrested one suspect. But Jonathan Banks, the 17-year-old suspected of pulling the trigger, is still being sought.

LAPD Deputy Chief Charles Beck said the killer approached Kaitlyn, her father and her 6-year-old sister as they were getting out of the car outside their apartment building.

He shot and wounded Cesar Avila, a glass worker, erroneously believing that he was a member of a rival gang. He then aimed his gun at Kaitlyn and shot her once in the chest, police said.

"This wasn't an accident or case of her getting caught in the fire," Beck said. "He intended to kill her. This was callous killing. It is beyond even what gangsters consider usual."

Authorities said they pieced together the chain of events after interviewing people who witnessed the shooting, as well as Cesar Avila and Kaitlyn's sister Kassey, who was unhurt in the attack.

The shooting occurred at 2:45 p.m. on a block of densely packed apartment buildings. Several people were outside and saw the attack, detectives said.

Beck said Kaitlyn's death underscored the continuing gang problems in Baldwin Village, a neighborhood of less than a square mile between La Brea Avenue and Crenshaw Boulevard off Coliseum Street.

The revelations stunned residents there.

One mother, who asked that her name not be used, suggested that the shooter was trying to "earn his stripes" and gain respect from gang members.

"I don't even feel safe walking down the street," said a 20-year-old woman who was holding her 5-year-old son's hand.

Another mother, Joy Daniels, 17, carried her 1-year-old daughter home from day care, across the street from a memorial for Kaitlyn that was overflowing with teddy bears, flowers and candles.

She said she was scared to drop her daughter off every morning, fearing that bullets from outside the school might somehow find her daughter.

The thought of the killer deliberately targeting a child gave her chills. Daniels said she wanted to knock some sense into the shooter.

She wished she could ask him: "How do you feel? Do you have remorse? You just took her little life, and on top of that it was intentional?"

The killer may have earned the respect of gang members, Daniels said, but the community was disgusted with him.

"I just pray and ask God to watch over all these little kids," she said.

The LAPD's Beck and Kaitlyn's father, Cesar Avila, appealed Monday for the public's help in finding Banks, who is believed to be in the Los Angeles area.

"We're heartbroken, we're very heartbroken for the death of my daughter," Avila said.

"We ask the suspect to turn himself in," he said, his voice breaking.

"Even though it won't bring my daughter back, at least we know more innocent people won't get hurt," he said. "I don't care so much for what he did to me, but for what he did to my daughter."

Avila and his daughters were getting out of their car outside their Pinafore Street home when the killer jumped out of a gray Chrysler Pacifica and began firing a 9-millimeter handgun. Both the shooter and the driver, identified as Laron Lee Larrimore, allegedly shouted gang slogans.

Avila spent nine days in the hospital, some of them in critical condition.

DOJ_NMG_0076995

"Something made me come back," he said. "The whole time I was thinking about my [other] daughter. I still had something."

Avila said it was hard for him to return to his home, where his daughter's bedroom overlooks the crime scene.

The LAPD has focused considerable resources recently on cracking down on gang violence in Baldwin Village, with help from the U.S. Justice Department, police officials said. Though crime in Baldwin Village is down, officials said, the influence of gangs remains strong.

"The monster of gangsterism in South Los Angeles is the cause of this shooting," Beck said.

Two warring gangs occupy the area: the Black P-Stones, a mostly black gang, and 18th Street, a mostly Latino gang.

Though the victims were Latino and the suspects African American, police officials said they believe the shooting was gang-related, not racial.

Police released a photo of Banks and described him as African American, 6 feet 4 and about 200 pounds. They said he should be considered armed and dangerous.

A $50,000 reward is being offered for information leading to arrests and convictions in the case.

Detectives can be reached at (213) 485-2417 or (877) 529-3855, a 24-hour toll-free number.

As police hunted for Banks, some Baldwin Village residents said they had had enough.

Gabriela Vasquez, 21, walked her two nephews home from school Monday afternoon, past the spot where police found Kaitlyn's body.

"It's not hard to believe," Vasquez said. "They thought the little girl saw them. She's little, but if she [saw] them again she could point them out."

Vasquez said she planned to leave Baldwin Village this year because of the gang violence.

"These people out here, they just don't care," Vasquez said. "They kill little kids and even the elderly."

Pirating Songs Of Praise (LAT)

By Geoff Boucher, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 9, 2006

Some Christian music fans believe digital downloading is a way to spread the Word. Other voices tell them: Thou shalt not steal.

Regina Kennedy prides herself on being a good Christian, so when the pastor at her Pentecostal church in Delaware called it a sin to download gospel songs without paying for them, her heart began to race.

The out-of-work driver went home and stared at her download collection, which included artists such as Yolanda Adams, Kirk Franklin and others. "The songs are so beautiful, and I couldn't afford to buy them all," the 43-year-old said. "I just didn't know what to do."

In the end, she deleted every song. She's still not sure, though, that she was really stealing. "I don't know what to think, really."

Kennedy is hardly alone among conflicted fans of Christian music, but her decision to erase her library does set her apart from most of them, especially younger ones. Surveys show that born-again Christian teens are just as active in stealing and swapping music as their secular peers who pinch the latest Eminem rap hit or Kelly Clarkson power ballad.

Take Matthew, a 13-year-old who attends Hewes Middle School in North Tustin and attends youth programs at nearby Red Hill Lutheran Church. Asked if it's wrong to take songs for free, he answered: "No, because the artists are making billions of dollars anyways." Another kid at Red Hill, 16-year-old Mike, a student at Beckman High, said that music is beyond commerce or at least beyond the cash register: "They should give it away 'cause it's art anyways."

Those attitudes, along with the arrival of an edgy and restless new generation of artists and lean times in the music industry, have created a clash between familiar imperatives: Spread the Word and Thou shalt not steal.

"We are all conflicted, it's true," said John Styll, president of the Gospel Music Trade Assn. "This is not a business first, but it still must be a business at some point to keep going."

Styll's association was behind a campaign called "Millions of Wrongs Don't Make a Right," which used well-known Christian artists as spokespeople against piracy, but Styll said the perception lingers that all music stars are fabulously wealthy, and he wonders how effective they are as voices in the debate anyway.

His association is preparing to go to youth events and organizations in coming months with presentations that frame the question of digital downloading as a purely ethical issue. That's a far different tack than the mainstream music industry, led by the Recording Industry Assn. of America, which has used legal action and language to spook young pirates.

"The RIAA feels it can't address it as a moral issue, but we certainly can, and our audience should be more receptive to that," said Styll, who seemed plainly exasperated with the notion of young churchgoers taking music illicitly. "It's like stealing. You wouldn't walk into a Christian bookstore and steal a Bible off the shelf…. some fans say, 'This music is made to spread the Word, and I'm just helping.' Well, this is also about people's livelihoods."

"Christian music" is an unwieldy and misleading name for a music market that is big enough to cover recent releases from artists as disparate as Ohio pop-punk band Relient K, smooth L.A. gospel singers Mary Mary, country singer Alan Jackson and P.O.D., a hip-hop and reggae tinged band from San Diego.

It's hard to imagine fans with music tastes eclectic enough to embrace all the artists on that list. But as a collective, the sector just got some great news. Christian music sales, both on CD and via paid download, over the first six months of 2006 were 11% higher than during the same period in 2005. That double-digit surge stands in stark contrast to the rest of the music industry, which experienced a 4% decline during the same time period. And no other genre has a 2006 sales jump anywhere near the level of the Christian sector.

When the six-month numbers were released, industry leaders said the figures showed that efforts such as the "Millions of Wrongs" campaign were making in-roads. But that view may be a leap of faith, says Joe Fleischer, chief of marketing for Big Champagne, a top barometer of online media activity.

Fleischer said the uptick in Christian music sales was more than matched by a jump in Christian music that was traded on peer-to-peer networks, e-mailed as file attachments and (the new popular mode of youth distribution) via digital files tucked into instant messages.

While much new revenue came in, more was missed, Fleischer said, adding that the same zealous fans that are taking their music for free are also minting new stars for a genre that is amid a major crossover into mainstream rock.

"That increase in sales is driven by what's going on with these newer acts, and all of that is happening on the Internet," Fleischer said. "Bands like Underoath."

Underoath is a Florida hard-core band whose spiritual message is delivered with a sonic style not intended for the faint of heart. The messages too are far from the psalms or greeting-card sentiments that the term "Christian music" conjures up. Take its wrenching song on abortion, "Burden in Your Hands":

So they take your life before your first breath / When will it stop, the killings continue / Babies die every day because of a pro choice made / Helpless and innocent they are put to death.

The six-member band shocked the music industry in June when its most recent album debuted at No. 2 on the nation's pop charts despite zero airplay on mainstream commercial radio and no presence on MTV.

It wasn't a surprise to fans who visited the band's page on MySpace.com, the Internet portal that has become a pop culture echo chamber. On the Underoath page, the digital player shows their songs have been listened to close to 17 million times.

The upheaval in Christian music circles isn't limited to rock and edgy youngsters.

The traditional Nashville scene, with its country-tinged sound and its Heartland appeal with artists such as Amy Grant and Steven Curtis Chapman, has lost jobs, Styll said, especially because the revenues for artists are limited by lower royalty payments from church and religious outlet performances. That has made the trade association especially stern, but it's set the stage for maverick attitudes as well.

Take singer-songwriter Derek Webb, an up-and-coming Christian recording artist who has not only received good reviews for his tour but also a flurry of coverage in industry outlets such as Billboard magazine. The reason? He's opted to give away a full download of his new album for three months on the Internet. He had sold 17,000 copies (both as CDs and downloads) since its December release and has given away 50,000 more since the download offer began in September. In exchange for the free music, he asks only that fans give him the names of five more people to e-mail about his music.

The idea came to him after he sold enough copies to break even financially on the project. The free-music period will pay off in the long run, he says, by building his career and also spreading the spiritual message of his music. His concerts have, in recent weeks, jumped from audiences of about 100 to crowds of 500 and more, he said.

"I can't think that's a coincidence and all of this, it's a huge part of my future," he said. Webb categorizes his music as songs of protest in an industry more comfortable with shiny happy platitudes.

"I don't think most Christian music is very good — I don't like it and I don't listen to it," the 32-year-old Nashville singer said. He pointed to the growth of rock and metal acts with Christian messages that use the Internet to bond with young fans and sidestep the traditional industry mechanisms. "Forgive me for saying it this way, but that looks a lot more like Jesus to me than packaging some album and telling people what to do with their art. "

In a Times entertainment poll this summer, teens were asked about downloading songs from an unauthorized file-sharing network. Among those who identified themselves as religious (of any faith), 63% said they would never do it. Among teens who did not describe themselves as religious, it was a similar proportion at 61%.

Those numbers didn't surprise Styll because he had seen even more distressing stats when his trade association commissioned a study in 2004 by the Barna Group, a Ventura research and strategy company that focuses on young Christian consumers.

That survey found that about 1 in 10 born-again Christian teens believe it is morally wrong to take and share songs. The ones who do have second thoughts often said that they felt the religious connection the music provided them made it all less objectionable.

"What we're seeing is young people and youth pastors are bringing this moral perspective that, well, it's not exactly right to download the music, but from their point of view they're doing it for greater good, and in their minds that offsets it to some degree," said David Kinnaman, vice president of Barna Group.

Top executives in the Christian music industry have lobbied on Capitol Hill for protections for music and other copyrighted material. But the tougher rooms to win over are at church halls such as the one at Red Hill Lutheran Church.

At any given time there about 120 kids in the programs, from fourth-graders through college-age young adults. Isaiah Coughran, co-leader of the church's youth ministry, noted that the congregation is relatively affluent, so the youngsters who take music for free have other options.

"The kids here are split on it. We get both ends, for sure — the kid that has 7,000 songs and the kid that won't do it because it's stealing," Coughran said. "We want them to make their own decision, but at least be aware of the issues and talk about them."

Some of the kids chew on the debate for a minute but then swallow it with a shrug: "They're teenagers and they say, 'It's what I want to do,' and that sort of flattens the argument for them, just like with anything."

Coughran himself was in a Christian punk-pop band called Value Pac that got as far as a record contract on an indie label. That's when Coughran noticed that their music was available on Napster and pinging through the Internet for free.

"For me, I was actually thrilled, because part of what I wanted to do was share the message of the music," he said. "And one big way to spread the Word — any word — was Napster, right? I wasn't doing it so much for the money, so the message was more important to me. It's different if you need to do it for a living, though, isn't it? That changes everything."

Threats Of Violence As Homes For Sex Offenders Cluster In Suffolk (NYT)

By Corey Kilgannon

The New York Times, October 10, 2006

MASTIC, N.Y. — Not long after four men moved into the small ranch-style home at 115 Eleanor Avenue this summer, one man is said to have readied a special greeting.

Donald Keegan, a fellow resident of this working-class Suffolk County town, prepared a concoction of paint thinner and road flares to burn the place and, the police said, kill the occupants, who had all recently served prison time for crimes including rape and sodomy.

The four housemates, ranging in age from 36 to 74, were all registered as Level 3 sex offenders, the highest rating, saved for those the state deems “most likely to re-offend.” One had attacked a man in a wheelchair; the others’ victims were girls ages 8, 9 and 11.

Mr. Keegan was arrested before the plot could be carried out, but his case has exposed a raw and widespread fear over spreading clusters of sex offenders in Suffolk County’s lower-income neighborhoods, like Mastic — where opponents say 76 offenders live within a five-mile radius — and nearby Coram and Gordon Heights, where 39 offenders, most having assaulted children, live within a square half-mile, many grouped in the same houses. This is the highest concentration of Level 2 and 3 offenders on Long Island.

As laws across the country have radically restricted where sex offenders can live once released from prison, a growing number of landlords here and elsewhere are marketing their properties to the ex-convicts, who often receive government rent subsidies. While some landlords see a business opportunity or even a moral calling in opening their doors to such a vilified population, many residents say the clusters threaten the safety of their children.

Mr. Keegan, 36, is in the Suffolk County Jail in Riverhead, with bail set at $1 million, and is facing a sentence of up to 25 years on charges of attempted murder and attempted arson. A county maintenance worker, he lives with his wife and their 2-year-old daughter on Patchogue Avenue, whose residents include two convicted child rapists, state records show.

In a jailhouse interview, Mr. Keegan insisted on his innocence but said, “I would do anything to protect my daughter.”

The situation at 115 Eleanor developed even as the authorities moved to evict the four men, having decided that after-school programs at the community center on the Poospatuck Indian Reservation — a block from the house — should have disqualified the site for sex offenders. A new county law took effect in June barring registered offenders from living within a quarter-mile of a school, playground or licensed day care center.

Though two of the four offenders have already moved out of the house, state and local politicians are now scrambling to reduce these clusters; one Suffolk County lawmaker has introduced legislation that would bar the Department of Social Services from putting more than one offender in a single house.

Charles Manolakos, who owns 115 Eleanor Avenue, defended his tenants as “citizens who have paid their debt and have a right to live there.” But Joyce Pulliam, who lives across the street, complained that the authorities “protect the sex offenders more than us.”

“They’re letting four and five offenders gather in a single house to create little sex offender clubs to prey on our children,” said Ms. Pulliam, who has worked strenuously to rally neighbors against the newcomers to her block. “The police have the manpower to arrest Keegan, but they don’t have the manpower to protect us from sex offenders.”

Situated between the high-priced Hamptons and the densely populated, upper-middle-class precincts of Nassau County, this area over the past decade has become a magnet for sex offenders upon their release from prison.

Of some 24,000 registered sex offenders in the state, 825 live in Suffolk County, nearly twice the 452 in neighboring Nassau, whose population is only slightly smaller. Some blame the county’s Department of Social Services for referring offenders to landlords who have bought inexpensive houses in neighborhoods with little political clout.

“D.S.S. has seen this building for a long time in these neighborhoods, and they’ve never done anything to stop it,” said Laura Ahearn, executive director of Parents for Megan’s Law, a national group based on Long Island that works to prevent sexual abuse of children.

But given the number of sex offenders in Suffolk, “There is no way they could all be placed in neighborhoods without kids,” said Dennis Nowak, a Social Services spokesman.

Required by state law to help find and finance housing for sex offenders released from prison, the department refers offenders to nonprofit agencies, which connect them with landlords who will accept them — and the $309 monthly rent stipend allocated by the county — in homes that meet state and local regulations.

“This is an issue that communities across the country are facing, and there’s no easy solution,” Mr. Nowak said. “We’ve become a lightning rod for the issue, but it’s much bigger than us.”

The lightning struck in Mastic this summer, when the four men moved into the Eleanor Avenue house, paying $550 each per month. It is next door to a family with seven young children, and across the avenue from a residence for 12 women recovering from drug and alcohol abuse.

“With all these kids on this block and 12 vulnerable women in a house, this is where they allow a house full of sex offenders?” said one of the women, Denise Mello, 32, a recovering heroin addict.

Soon, parents on the block began keeping their children indoors. Neighbors picketed in front of the house, and members of the Mastic Park Civic Association went door to door distributing fliers with the offenders’ names, police photos and criminal records.

At one homeowners’ meeting at the local library, a resident, not Mr. Keegan, stood up and said, “I’ll burn the house down,” recalled the civic association president, John Sicignano. In response, he said, “Fifty people stood up and started clapping.”

“He definitely expressed it the wrong way, but who knows, if something threatened my kid, maybe I’d react the same way,” Mr. Sicignano, 49, who runs an aircraft engineering firm, said of Mr. Keegan.

Mr. Manolakos commented ironically: “This guy was doing what the whole neighborhood wanted to do. He’s a local hero.”

Mr. Keegan said that his lawyer had warned him not to talk about the case, and that he was a law-abiding man with no time for mischief.

“I have three jobs,” said Mr. Keegan, who does private landscaping after his maintenance work with the county. “I come home exhausted every night and turn on the Discovery Channel.”

Mr. Keegan denied plotting to burn down the house Sept. 9, when he was arrested with road flares on the front seat of his Ford Mustang. The police, acting on a tip, had sent a detective to befriend Mr. Keegan and caught his threats on tape.

Fred Hollman, 36, who served time for first-degree rape of an 11-year-old girl, moved into 115 Eleanor Avenue in June after living briefly in western Suffolk County, but said in an interview in September that he was looking for a new home because of the furor.

"The last place I was staying, in Brentwood, all the neighbors knew about my status and were friends with me," he said. "We all hung out together." But, Mr. Hollman added, he has four children and "wouldn't want them living around sex offenders either." Mr. Hollman said he saw Mr. Keegan "in and out of the neighbors' houses a bunch of times" before his arrest.

Mr. Manolakos, who co-owns a number of homes on Long Island and rents rooms mostly to mentally disabled tenants, says he plans to fight the mid-September order to remove the sex offenders within 45 days. He argued that that the Indian reservation, a 250-resident maze of scruffy suburban streets lined with smoke shops and trailer homes, has no legal bearing on the block, since it operates as its own sovereign territory, outside of many state laws and regulations.

Other landlords defend their right to rent to sex offenders.

"They just want to live their lives," said Bernadette Parks, whose mother, Mary Dodson, rents to 27 offenders in 11 houses in a small area in Coram and Gordon Heights nicknamed Dodsonville.

On a single block of Homestead Avenue, Mrs. Dodson owns homes filled with 15 offenders, said Mrs. Parks, who manages the properties. The extended Dodson family, with many young children, lives in the surrounding neighborhood.

"They're being closely watched, and they're more scared than the other folks here," said Mrs. Parks, a devout Christian who sees the family's thriving rental operation as a kind of religious mission, and invites the sex offenders to join her grandchildren in tending rabbits, for therapy.

"My grandchildren all play on this block," Mrs. Parks said, cradling a bowl of newborn bunnies in her living room. "That's how much I trust these people. They've been deemed to enter back into society and they'll have to suffer the rest of their lives with being labeled."

Don't tell that to Chief Harry Wallace, who runs the Poospatuck Indian Reservation. A Dartmouth-educated lawyer with a ponytail, he keeps two sets of business cards on his desk, one for his law practice, the other for his Poospatuck Smoke Shop and Trading Post.

"What these landlords are doing by renting out to sex offenders," Chief Wallace said, "are undermining communities trying to better themselves."

California Prosecutor's Novel Gets Her Bumped From A Case (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, October 9, 2006

A California prosecutor's fictional alter ego has gotten her kicked off a real-life case.

In January, Joyce Dudley, a deputy district attorney in Santa Barbara, published a crime novel called "Intoxicating Agent." Its heroine, Jordon Danner, has the same initials and the same job as Ms. Dudley, and the novel concerns a rape case with echoes of a real one. In both, the victim said she had been sexually assaulted after being given an intoxicating drug.

Acting on a motion from the real defendant in a real rape-by-intoxication case, an appeals court in Ventura, Calif., ruled on Thursday that Ms. Dudley's novel had crossed an ethical line.

"She has a disabling conflict of interest," Justice Kenneth R. Yegan of the California Court of Appeal wrote of Ms. Dudley for a unanimous three-judge panel.

Ms. Dudley must be disqualified, Justice Yegan continued, because the defendant, Massey Haraguchi, "is being prosecuted for raping an intoxicated person while the prosecutor is promoting her novel involving the identical charge."

Justice Yegan wrote that Ms. Dudley's desire for money and fame might tempt her to throw the book at the defendant, as it were.

"Dudley will garner no laurels, and the case will not generate favorable media publicity for her book," Justice Yegan wrote, "if she enters into a negotiated settlement."

The question of whether a lawyer's freelance fiction can require disqualification was both novel and important, Justice Yegan wrote. He said he hoped "that this case of first impression will make a lasting impression."

Ms. Dudley declined to comment. "The litigation is still pending," she said, "and it would be unethical for me to respond in any way."

In a sworn statement filed in opposition to the disqualification motion, Ms. Dudley said her book was not based on a real case.

"The fact that I have written and published this fictional book," she added, "has not affected or impacted any of my decisions in this case."

Robert M. Sanger, a lawyer for Mr. Haraguchi, declined to comment. In his own sworn statement, Mr. Sanger said that aspects of Ms. Dudley's book were based on a separate rape-by-intoxication case that twice ended in hung juries and was eventually dismissed.

DOJ_NMG_0077000

Mr. Sanger was Ms. Dudley's adversary in the other case, too. In the Haraguchi case, Mr. Sanger wrote, Ms. Dudley refused to discuss a settlement though she conceded that no other prosecutor in her office was willing to pursue the case.

"Intoxicating Agent," which Ms. Dudley paid to have printed, is made notable by Ms. Dudley's acknowledgment to a local newspaper that her fictional heroine was "a pumped-up version" of herself.

Ms. Danner, Ms. Dudley writes, has "the poise and sexiness of a dancer, the brains of a scholar and the protective passion of a mother."

"She had always been attractive," Ms. Dudley continues, "but now, having reached middle age, experience, confidence and poise further enhanced her beauty."

Prosecutors in "Intoxicating Agent" are fearless champions of the truth; defense lawyers, unethical and manipulative; and defendants, despicable and unattractive. One is called "felony ugly."

Deborah L. Rhode, an authority on legal ethics at Stanford, said the appeals court's ruling was correct but too broad.

"There's a lot not to like in the way that this deputy district attorney traded on her office to promote her book," Professor Rhode said. "And the court could justifiably be concerned that her desire for publicity could affect her decision whether to try the case or accept a plea."

But the decision went on to seemingly ban all sorts of extracurricular writing.

"No current public employee," Justice Yegan wrote, "should be permitted to exploit his or her official position as a lever to earn extra income."

That prohibition may run afoul of the Constitution, Professor Rhode said. "Dudley has obvious First Amendment interests in being able to present her characters in whatever stereotypical form she chooses," she said.

Linda Fairstein, a former prosecutor in New York who has written nine successful crime novels, called that aspect of the decision overreaching and absurd.

But she expressed little sympathy for Ms. Dudley.

"It's not really a good judgment call to closely mirror the facts of a case while it's still pending," Ms. Fairstein said.

A New Glimpse Into Night Of D.C. Slaying (WP)

By Paul Schwartzman

The Washington Post, October 9, 2006

On the night of Aug. 2, Robert Wone called his wife, Kathy, at their home in Virginia, checking in as he walked to his downtown Washington office.

The Wones had rarely spent a night apart since 2002, when Robert surprised Kathy with rose petals leading to a silver fortune cookie and the message, "Will You Marry Me?" But Wone, a lawyer, planned to work late that night, his wife said. Days before, he had arranged to stay with friends at a townhouse near Dupont Circle.

"I love you," Robert told his wife as they hung up about 9:30 p.m.

Just after midnight, the phone awoke Kathy Wone. It was Joe Price, the co-owner of the townhouse. Robert has been stabbed, he said. Get to the hospital -- immediately. Less than 30 minutes later, a doctor pronounced her 32-year-old husband dead.

The killer, Wone would learn, plunged a kitchen knife into her husband's chest, piercing his heart. The knife came from the townhouse in the 1500 block of Swann Street NW -- the home of Price, his domestic partner, Victor Zaborsky, and Dylan Ward, all of whom were in the building at the time.

More than two months after Wone's death, investigators have seized personal computers, examined phone records, consulted the FBI and convened a grand jury. For more than three weeks, they kept control of the three-story, $1.2 million house where Wone died, removing flooring, pieces of walls, a chunk of staircase, the washing machine, even sink traps. They used chemicals to search for traces of DNA and other evidence, staining walls, floors and bathrooms.

Yet no arrest has been made and no suspect or motive identified, causing Kathy Wone, 35, to worry that the crime might never be solved. "I feel like I've been holding my breath, waiting for a break in the investigation, hoping that this doesn't become a cold case," she wrote in an e-mail, her first public comments about the slaying.

Authorities have offered only the broadest outline of what transpired, saying that a resident told them an intruder came through the back door and killed Wone -- a theory that detectives have publicly questioned. Yet as police await the results of evidence testing, new details have emerged about Wone's final hours and what Price, Zaborsky and Ward have said occurred after their friend arrived.

In a city of more than 100 homicides this year, Wone's death captured public attention because he was a rising star in Washington's legal world, active in the Asian American community. He died in a neighborhood where homicides are rare, at the home of friends who are affluent, well-established professionals; one is prominent in the gay community.

The case took on greater notoriety when investigators asserted that the crime scene was cleaned before police arrived. And they expressed doubt that an intruder killed Wone, saying they found no sign of forced entry or anything taken.

Police Chief Charles H. Ramsey said detectives are waiting for the FBI to complete tests on blood and other items from the crime scene. Police want the FBI to treat the case with urgency, Ramsey said, and hope to get the results in a matter of weeks or months.

Police and prosecutors have sought to reconstruct what happened inside the house before and after the killing. According to sources with direct knowledge of the investigation, Price, Zaborsky and Ward have described a routine evening that began with a dinner at home before Wone arrived about 10:30 p.m. to sleep over.

The sources, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because the case is under investigation, said the men have given this account:

Wone first sat in the kitchen, chatting with Price, 35, a lawyer at a prominent law firm with whom he attended the College of William & Mary, and Ward, 36, who works for a software company. Zaborsky, 40, a marketing manager at the International Dairy Foods Association, was in the third-floor bedroom he shared with Price. A female tenant who lived in the basement was not home.

Price has said that he went upstairs to the third floor to sleep about 11 p.m. Ward retired to his bedroom, near the top of the stairs on the second floor, overlooking the back yard. He later told police that he took a sleeping pill that night, as he often did. Wone showered and went to a second-floor guest room facing Swann Street.

According to the sources, Price recalled falling asleep and then being awakened by a chime that the alarm system sets off when the front or back doors open. Price did not go downstairs because he assumed that his tenant was returning; she did not return home that night.

Price has said that minutes later, perhaps as many as 10, he heard the sound of deep, guttural moaning. He ran downstairs with Zaborsky and found the door to the guest room ajar and Wone on the sofa bed, bleeding. Price moved the knife from Wone -- police later found it on a side table -- and tried to stanch the bleeding, the sources said. Zaborsky stood in the hallway, his screams waking Ward.

At 11:49 p.m., Zaborsky called 911. Paramedics arrived at 11:54, followed by police, who found Wone, wearing bed clothes, unconscious and showing no signs of life. He had been stabbed twice in the chest and once in the abdomen.

After Price phoned Kathy Wone, she picked up her husband's parents, who had recently moved nearby from Brooklyn to be closer to them, and his brother, Andrew, 27, who had flown in to visit. A doctor pronounced Robert Wone dead at 12:24 a.m., before his family reached George Washington University Hospital.

The next day, friends and family sat vigil with Kathy Wone, a crowd that included Price, Zaborsky and Ward. The men attended the funeral; Price was a pallbearer.

By then, investigators had taken over the Swann Street townhouse, obtaining search warrants to seize computers and phones there and from Price's law office. In an affidavit used to get one of the warrants, Detective William Xanten cast doubt on the idea that an intruder killed Wone, writing: "There was nothing that appeared out of place, nothing disturbed, nothing ransacked and nothing was taken." Police technicians, using chemicals and artificial light, had determined that the crime scene was "tampered" with, the detective wrote.

Price hired a criminal defense lawyer, Kathleen Voelker, and Ward retained David Schertler, a former federal prosecutor. Zaborsky hired Thomas G. Connolly. Before they had hired lawyers, the three men submitted to hours of police questioning immediately after Wone died. Days later, they submitted their fingerprints and DNA samples.

In a statement issued Friday, the attorneys said the three men "continue to mourn the death of their dear friend" and remain hopeful that "the authorities will identify and apprehend the intruder who is responsible for the senseless murder."

Through their attorneys, the men declined to comment for this article. With their home in disarray, they are now living in Virginia. Their friends and associates are reluctant to speak about them publicly, seeking to protect their privacy.

Price, a lawyer at Arent Fox, also serves on the board of Equality Virginia, a gay rights group, where Ward formerly was development director.

In her e-mailed responses to questions, Kathy Wone cited the investigation in declining to share her view of the men, with whom she was friendly through her husband. She is being advised by Eric H. Holder Jr., a former U.S. deputy attorney general, and Benjamin J. Razi, who work at Covington & Burling, her husband's former firm.

Describing her emotional state in her e-mail, she said: "It hurts me a great deal to think that whoever took Robert's life is probably going on with life as usual while I'm struggling to close an enormous, gaping wound and move on; I can't help but shake my head at that picture of incredible unfairness."

The Wones met in January 2002 at a conference in Philadelphia, where they struck up a conversation that continued as they took a late-night stroll and ended up at a Cosi cafe eating s'mores. "It was cold that night," recalled Kathy Wone, a public-interest manager for the American Health Lawyers Association. "But we didn't feel it."

Until then, Robert Wone had concentrated on his career, pro bono work and keeping up with a wide network of friends, including Price. Small-framed and boyishly handsome, he often seemed more mature than his years, urging friends to buy life insurance and arrange their wills.

In interviews, friends described him as energetic and earnest, with a touch of street savvy born of growing up in New York. Jason Torchinsky, who had shared an Arlington apartment with Wone, said his friend had kept a baseball bat under his bed for self-defense and carried two wallets -- one of them an empty decoy in case he was mugged.

The son of a retired bank executive and teacher, Wone had always been serious. As a youngster growing up in Brooklyn, some classmates at his all-boys Catholic high school predicted that he would be the first Asian American president.

At William & Mary in the mid-1990s, he majored in public policy and immersed himself in student government, through which he became friendly with Price. At exam time, Wone liked to sneak around the library, handing out candy to unsuspecting students. "He was about random acts of kindness," said classmate Tara Ragone. "It was like a Disney movie."

Although he seemed a natural politician, remembering names and keeping in touch, Wone shunned the spotlight. "He often said he'd love to be chief of staff," classmate Michelle Kang said. "He wanted to be the person in the background who made it all happen."

After graduating from the University of Pennsylvania law school, Wone clerked for a federal judge before landing a job at Covington & Burling. His work was his focus until he met Kathy. Within months, he was talking about marriage. "I was stunned," Torchinsky said. "I had never seen him so interested in anybody. It was like this instant thing."

They were married in 2003. Robert turned 30 the next year, an event marked by a party at the home of Price, Zaborsky and Ward, who were then living on Capitol Hill. The Wones bought a townhouse in Oakton and began talking about adopting a baby girl from China.

Then, in the first week of July, Wone started a new job as general counsel at Radio Free Asia, which broadcasts news in Asian countries that do not get free media. It was a dream position, allowing him to be the legal version of a jack-of-all trades.

More than a week before he died, Wone told his wife that he planned to work late Aug. 2, attending a seminar and then making a stop at Radio Free Asia to meet the night staff. He said he might stay over in the city and visit an old friend -- either Price or another William & Mary alum. "Robert was trying to kill three birds with one stone," Kathy Wone wrote. "Attend a class, get to know more of the Radio Free Asia staff and spend time with a friend."

"I thought it was a great idea," she recalled. "Our marriage was such that I completely trusted and supported pretty much anything he wanted to pursue."

A few days later, she said, her husband told her that he'd stay at Price's house. On the morning of Aug. 2, the couple worked out at their gym and then took Metro into the District. As usual, he walked her to her office, where they kissed goodbye.

At 6 p.m., he arrived at the seminar, after which he called his wife to say good night. At close to 10, he arrived at his office. He stayed for 15 minutes, introducing himself to the staff, before heading off to see his friends on Swann Street.

Activists Take To Prince George's Pulpits To Break A Pattern Of Domestic Violence (WP)

By Avis Thomas-lester And Rosalind S. Helderman, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, October 9, 2006

Yvette Cade stepped up to the microphone and the church went silent.

"I am a victim of domestic violence. I was set on fire by my estranged husband," she said, head held high, looking out over the 350 or so people gathered inside the main sanctuary at Fort Foote Baptist Church in Fort Washington. "Take a look at my scars. I was burned at 1,500 degrees. . . . One year later, I am here as a witness, a survivor and a soldier on the battlefield for Christ. Stop the domestic violence. Please."

The church erupted in a thunderous ovation. It was more than two hours into the 11 a.m. church service, and Cade, along with other Prince George's County "soldiers" in the war against domestic violence, had come to the church as part of Project Safe Sunday, a program started four years ago to bring the clergy into the effort to fight the problem. Prince George's has more domestic violence than any other jurisdiction in Maryland.

According to statistics from the Maryland Network Against Domestic Violence, 5,085 cases of domestic violence were filed in Prince George's District Court last year, accounting for more than 21 percent of the cases filed statewide. The county has had the highest number of cases filed for more than five years, statistics show.

The other jurisdictions with the most reported domestic violence cases last year were Baltimore City with 4,152, Baltimore County with 3,780; Anne Arundel County with 1,998; and Montgomery County with 1,712. A total of 23,627 cases were filed statewide.

Joining Cade yesterday were Prince George's State's Attorney Glenn F. Ivey (D), who has actively promoted the program, and Debra Williams, who conceived of the program in 2003 after the domestic violence slaying of her sister, Ernestine Bunn-Dyson. Dozens of churches participated in the program.

Through the program, which spread to Baltimore and Northern Virginia this year, victims of domestic violence are encouraged to report their abuse and leave violent homes, and abusers are urged to seek help to stop attacking their victims. A third goal, organizers said, is to work with ministers and other church administrators to change the sometimes antiquated thinking that leads some to believe the Bible justifies a husband's right to abuse his wife.

"Silence has been one of the biggest contributions to the problem," Ivey said in an interview. "The faith community is the place where ministers talk about the private and intimate issues. A lot of women say they turn to the church, but to be candid, some ministers take the view that some degree of [abuse] is permissible. . . . We also wanted to have a dialogue with the ministerial community to address that mentality."

Domestic violence cases filed last year include the September attack on Cade, who was set on fire after a judge dismissed a protective order against her estranged husband, Roger B. Hargrave. Three weeks later, Hargrave went to the store in Clinton where Cade worked, doused her with gasoline and set her on fire. Cade, 33, suffered horrific burns to her face, head and torso. Her estranged husband was sentenced to life in prison for attempted murder.

The issue of domestic violence in Prince George's has been under the microscope in recent days, after the publication of an article in Essence magazine highlighting stories of women in the county who were abused for years and kept quiet.

Headlined "The Secret Shame of Prince George's County," the story was denounced by members of County Executive Jack B. Johnson's administration, who accused the magazine of unfairly painting the county as unresponsive to the issue. Aides to Johnson (D) have marshaled statistics showing that county spending on domestic violence issues has risen from $1.7 million to more than $3 million in the past three years.

"How is it possible that you would paint us as a county that doesn't talk about it when we're doing things every day?" said Jacqueline F. Brown, the county's chief administrative officer and top aide to Johnson. Brown, a former family therapist, said she has counseled abuse victims.

Brown cited county support for the Safe Sunday program as a sign that officials have been addressing domestic abuse, in addition to training for 911 operators and a computer system that alerts law enforcement when those accused of domestic violence are charged with unrelated offenses.

It is not the first time county officials have issued a prompt response when the county's reputation has come into question. Last year, Johnson held a news conference to denounce an episode of the ABC television show "Commander in Chief" that featured a fictional president sending U.S. marshals to Prince George's to quell crime.

Ivey, who was interviewed for the Essence story, said county leaders should use the story to raise awareness. He said the high incidence of protective orders and cases filed indicate that the county's pro-active approach has led to an increase in reporting, in victims seeking protective orders and a subsequent increase in the number of cases that go to court for prosecution.

In a case from last week, Jackie M. Lewis, 57, was shot to death in her Fort Washington home by a former boyfriend, Arthur Comer, law enforcement officials said. Comer, also 57, called 911, told a police dispatcher that he had shot Lewis and then killed himself, police said. The judge in the case had dismissed a temporary protective order against Lewis after she told the judge that Comer had not hurt her, according to a recording of the hearing.

The murder-suicide occurred almost a year after the attack on Cade.

Fort Foote Baptist's pastor, Joseph Lyles, said his church began participating in Project Safe Sunday four years ago because he has four sisters "who have each, in some way, experienced domestic violence."

As a minister, Lyles said one of his missions is to change the minds of other clergy, who sometimes play down the seriousness of the domestic violence problem and believe that the Bible justifies a man's right to "discipline" his wife if she disobeys or disrespects him.

"The Bible verse that people often misinterpret to mean that a man has a right to beat his wife is Ephesians 5:22-23, which says a wife should be submissive to her husband, and a man has authority over his wife just as He has authority over the church," Lyles said. "But if you look at Verse 25, it says that a man should love his wife as Christ loved the church. Love has no place in a relationship where someone is using violence to achieve dominance. Being submissive does not mean being abused."

Short Odds For Ignorance (NYT)

By Robert Hahn And Paul Tetlock

DOJ_NMG_0077004

The New York Times, October 9, 2006

LATE last month, as Congress rushed to adjourn, lawmakers passed legislation that would make it a crime for credit card companies and banks to send payments to Internet gambling sites.

The measure was attached to an unrelated bill on port security at the 11th hour. If the president signs the legislation, as expected, it will have major implications for the millions of Americans who gamble online. It will also likely lead to a temporary halt in domestic online betting, which will result in billion-dollar losses for Internet gambling sites.

While these would be significant outcomes, they are probably not that important for the overall economy. Consumers will find other ways to spend their money, either in casinos or elsewhere.

The bigger economic story is how this act, by effectively prohibiting Internet betting, could unintentionally slow the emergence of new tools that have the potential to improve the productivity of the private sector and the government. Sadly, this is an aspect of the measure that both its supporters and its opponents seem to have overlooked.

Representative Jim Leach, an Iowa Republican who was a co-sponsor of the bill, suggests that it will help reduce gambling addiction and money laundering. Not surprisingly, executives at online gambling companies argue that the bill unduly restricts consumer freedom.

What neither side has mentioned, however, is how the prohibition on Internet gambling could wind up putting the kibosh on several forms of Internet wagering that provide useful information.

For instance, we now have markets for predicting political and economic events, where you can wager on the monthly unemployment rate or the outcome of the presidential race. (If you visit TradeSports.com, you can bet on Hillary Clinton's chances of becoming the next president: a contract purchased for $1.91 would yield $10 if she wins — implying that the senator has about a 1 in 5 chance of winning.)

Why should we care? Because information markets, which essentially reflect the collective wisdom of savvy bettors, can help us make more accurate forecasts. Information markets have outperformed experts in a number of areas, whether it's predicting point spreads in football games or elections or printer sales. There are more than 20 Web sites that offer information-market securities, including those run by Goldman Sachs and the University of Iowa.

These markets work for several reasons: first, almost anyone can participate; second, people think hard when they have to back up their predictions with money — buy the right presidential contract and you win, buy the wrong one and you lose; third, the profit motive encourages people to look for better information.

Many academics across the political spectrum believe that information markets could be critical in improving decision making by governments, nonprofit organizations and the private sector. Yet, because of current regulatory restrictions, the Iowa market is the only place in the United States dedicated to improving our understanding of these markets. Also, those information markets whose purpose is to make money have generally based themselves offshore, partly in reaction to existing state and federal restrictions on Internet gambling.

So what can be done? Congress needs to draw a distinction between run-of-the-mill Internet gambling and information markets that can serve a broader economic purpose. To this end, it should empower the Commodities Futures Trading Commission to regulate information markets. The commission is already charged with regulating futures contracts, and information-market contracts can be thought of as futures contracts because they represent bets on what will happen down the road.

Congress should also impose a requirement that information-market contracts pass an economic purpose test. The futures commission should permit information market contracts that are likely to provide significant financial hedging opportunities or valuable information for improving economic decisions. Internet poker games and lotteries would not pass the test; contracts involving Gross Domestic Product, housing starts or expected annual rainfall would. So, too would predictions on who will be president: that would affect the economy.

For such regulation to work, it needs to be light-handed. To maximize innovation, Congress should allow for federal pre-emption of state and other federal regulatory authorities for information-market contracts that pass an economic purpose test. Such pre-emption would reduce uncertainty for innovators concerned about violating state gambling laws.

The regulation should also allow for broad exemptions where sensible. One could, for example, introduce exemptions for research where the size of individual investments does not exceed $1,000 per participant. The futures commission already has the power to encourage such research, but thus far it has only given its blessing to the Iowa markets.

We think that Congress has correctly pinpointed Internet gambling as an area deserving of further study, and possibly legislation. But a blanket prohibition on such gambling is premature, and likely to be counterproductive. If this prohibition becomes law, Congress should make sure that productive information markets are allowed to flourish.

The White House And Mr. Abramoff (NYT)

The New York Times, October 9, 2006

The sordid Mark Foley controversy has diverted public attention from another major Washington ethics scandal — the influence peddling involving the disgraced former superlobbyist Jack Abramoff. That's good news for the Bush administration, given freshly heightened suspicion that its dealings with Mr. Abramoff and his sleazy K Street operation were far cozier than it is willing to admit.

The White House has consistently played down the ties key officials like Karl Rove had with Mr. Abramoff, who pleaded guilty last January to conspiring to bribe public officials. But the administration has declined to publicly provide detailed answers or grant full access to relevant documents needed to establish the truth.

A newly released report, prepared with unusual bipartisan backing by the House Government Reform Committee, paints a different reality. It reveals that between January 2001 and March 2004, Mr. Abramoff and members of his staff had some 485 contacts with key White House officials, including at least 10 direct contacts between Mr. Abramoff and Mr. Rove. Billing records and e-mail messages unearthed by the committee indicate that Mr. Abramoff and his colleagues spent nearly $25,000 on meals and tickets for White House officials.

The report belies Mr. Rove's description of Mr. Abramoff as merely a "casual acquaintance." An assistant to Mr. Rove, Susan Ralston, who resigned on Friday, had formerly worked for Mr. Abramoff. The report suggests that she sought Mr. Abramoff's help to obtain seats for Mr. Rove and his aides at popular sporting events, and often acted as a conduit, passing messages between the lobbyist and top White House officials, including Mr. Rove and Ken Mehlman, the current chairman of the Republican National Committee who was then a senior White House political strategist.

Indeed, it appears that Mr. Rove sat with Mr. Abramoff in the lobbyist's box seats for an N.C.A.A. basketball playoff game in 2002, an occasion Mr. Abramoff memorialized in an e-mail message to a colleague. "Told me anytime we need something just let him know through Susan."

It is plain that Mr. Abramoff had unusual access. As for his effectiveness, Mr. Abramoff rated the results as "mixed." But he scored some important victories. In 2002, for example, the administration made the unusual decision to release $16.3 million to a Mississippi tribe Mr. Abramoff represented, notwithstanding the Justice Department's opposition to the project. The role campaign gifts and contacts between Mr. Abramoff and Mr. Mehlman may have played in this action is a matter warranting close scrutiny by prosecutors, and further digging by the committee.

As Tom Davis of Virginia, the Republican chairman of the committee, and Henry Waxman of California, the ranking Democrat, take pains to note, their report is based on documents that were provided under subpoena by Mr. Abramoff's firm and, for the most part, tell just one side of the story. The White House spin is that Mr. Abramoff had a well-known affinity for exaggerating the impact of his lobbying efforts. If so, full disclosure of relevant records by the White House could help support that claim. Meanwhile, the idea that Mr. Abramoff exerted no influence with the administration seems about as believable as Mark Foley's early claim that his only interest in 16-year-old pages was "mentoring."

CIVIL LAW:

Judge Names Tower Records Liquidator (WSJ)

By A Wall Street Journal Staff Reporter

The Wall Street Journal, October 9, 2006

A bankruptcy judge named a liquidation venture led by Great American Group the winning bidder for Tower Records, sealing the fate of the once-iconic record-retailing operation.

U.S. Bankruptcy Judge Brendan Shannon in Wilmington, Del., chose the liquidation offer over one from Trans World Entertainment Corp., an Albany, N.Y., operator of retail chains that was expected to keep at least some of the West Sacramento, Calif., company's stores open and operating under the Tower Records name. Trans World came in $500,000 below the roughly $134 million bid from liquidators at the conclusion of a 30-hour auction that began Thursday.

On Friday, Trans World urged that its offer be given a second look, and said the court should take into consideration the jobs that would be saved if Tower Records wasn't handed over to the liquidators. Judge Shannon refused, however, and said he would approve the offer from Great American.

Big Tobacco Spending Big Money To Fight State Bans, Taxes (WSJ)

By Christopher Cooper

The Wall Street Journal, October 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0077006

American tobacco giants, facing state ballot measures that would sharply increase excise taxes or expand smoking bans, are fighting back. They are spending tens of millions of dollars and, in some cases, pushing rival propositions that sound like tough restrictions but would actually ease antismoking laws already on the books.

The campaign drawing most of Big Tobacco's attention is in California, where Reynolds American Inc. and Philip Morris USA, along with parent Altria Group Inc., have already sunk a combined $55 million into a drive to oppose increasing taxes on a pack of smokes by $2.60. The measure, on the November ballot, would generate an estimated $2.1 billion in annual revenue for the state and make California's tobacco excise tax, currently at 87 cents a pack, the highest in the nation. Proceeds from the tax would be used to finance health programs, primarily for children.

The companies are spending so heavily there because the stakes are so high. Philip Morris, the industry's largest cigarette maker, says that California is its single-largest domestic market. Reynolds, the nation's No. 2 tobacco company, says the state accounts for about 6% of its cigarette sales. "Clearly, the impact of California would put pressure on earnings," said Dianne Neal, Reynolds's chief financial officer, during an analyst conference in late July. During the same conference, Ms. Neal said that, altogether, the company planned to spend $40 million to defeat tax increases and smoking bans on state ballots around the country this November.

A leader in citizen-driven proposition balloting, California has often seen pricey campaigns by big businesses seeking to defeat hostile ballot initiatives, and this year is no exception. Another measure, to raise taxes on oil, has sparked an expensive campaign by oil companies. In 2005, a group of pharmaceutical companies spent $73 million to defeat a proposed prescription-drug discount plan. And in 1998, insurance companies spent $66 million to defeat an auto-insurance measure. "Initiative campaigns are not cheap -- this is not an inexpensive venture," said Reynolds spokesman David Howard.

So far, the coalition of cigarette companies and snuff and cigar manufacturers has outspent proponents of this year's cigarette-tax proposal -- mostly a collection of California hospitals -- by a 3-to-1 margin. State records show that, a month before the election, Philip Morris had put $30.7 million into the campaign and Reynolds had donated nearly $24 million. As of the end of September, the antitax campaign had already spent more than $48 million.

The result has been a tidal wave of television advertising attacking the tax increase and its main backer, a California hospital association, whose members stand to benefit most from the new tax. "I was in California two days last week, and that's all I saw on TV," said Kristina Wilfore, executive director of the left-leaning Ballot Initiative Strategy Center. "They were even airing it on the Cartoon Network at midnight."

Beyond California, the companies are fighting similar tax measures in Missouri, Arizona, South Dakota and Ohio. In Missouri, the state's Supreme Court is considering whether to allow an 80-cent-a-pack tax increase to appear on the November ballot, over a legal challenge. If the measure survives, Mr. Howard said, "it's safe to say" the company will wage a multimillion-dollar campaign to defeat it.

Philip Morris spokeswoman Peggy Roberts said the company has begun consumer and vendor campaigns to defeat a proposed $1-a-pack tax increase in South Dakota and an 80-cent-a-pack increase in Arizona. She said the company was mounting a similar effort in Cuyahoga County, Ohio, where voters will be asked to approve a 30-cent-a-pack tax on cigarettes to finance a local arts program.

Ms. Roberts declined to say how much the company was spending on the campaigns.

The ferocity that Big Tobacco has shown this year in opposing the cigarette taxes contrasts with the industry's relative inactivity on the issue in recent years. The two cigarette companies offered only token resistance to a 2002 proposal in Missouri to raise cigarette taxes 55 cents. They spent a combined $77,000 defeating the proposal, state records show, even as a group of health charities and others spent more than $5 million pushing the effort. That same year, a 60-cent tax increase proposed in Arizona passed with no money being spent by opponents, according to state records. In Florida in 2002, Philip Morris abruptly ended a drive to counter a smoking ban with a softer measure after spending $360,000 on a petition drive.

Political observers say they haven't seen tobacco interests spend so much money on a statewide proposition since 1994, when a cigarette-tax increase went down in defeat in Colorado after an $8 million campaign against it -- a sum that remains a record in that state.

Company spokesmen declined to discuss their reasons for increasing their political activities this year beyond saying that business considerations govern their decisions to enter the political fray.

Dan Smith, a University of Florida political-science professor who studies ballot issues, said the sheer number of proposals may have convinced the companies they need to counter the mushrooming antismoking activism that has taken over statehouses in recent years. Some 41 states have passed cigarette-tax increases in the past five years. A host of others have banned smoking in many public places.

"In the last political round, the tobacco giants basically conceded the issue," Mr. Smith said. "I think they've decided to make a last stand. These proposals are going to keep coming if they're not knocked down."

While Philip Morris has focused its efforts on taxes, Reynolds has mounted a sturdy resistance to proposed smoking limits in Ohio and Arizona this year. Both states are entertaining proposals to virtually eliminate smoking in public buildings.

Reynolds is bankrolling proposals in both states that critics say are designed to confuse voters. In Ohio, voters will be asked to consider two smoking-related measures. One, called SmokeFreeOhio, would change state statutes to ban smoking in most buildings other than private homes and a certain percentage of hotel rooms. It is supported by health charities such as the American Cancer Society.

A rival proposal on the ballot, backed by a group called Smoke Less Ohio, also purports to restrict smoking, through a constitutional amendment. But this proposal would exempt restaurants, bars, bowling alleys and similar establishments. If passed, it would actually unwind more restrictive existing municipal bans. It is being supported by a coalition of bars and restaurants, local retail outlets, Loews Corp.'s Lorillard Tobacco Co. and Reynolds.

Mr. Howard, the Reynolds spokesman, said his company supports the constitutional measure and is prepared to bankroll a multimillion-dollar campaign to see it passed. "We believe this is a way you can still provide a smoker-friendly environment for people who choose to smoke," he said.

Jacob Evans, a spokesman for Smoke Less Ohio, declined to say how much money Reynolds was providing for the campaign but acknowledged that the company was "our main supporter." State campaign-finance documents show Smoke Less Ohio spent $1.5 million through Aug. 9 gathering signatures to place it on the ballot.

Recent polling shows about 45% of the state's voters support the Reynolds-backed measure. Polling shows 58% support for the ban endorsed by the health groups. Both measures require simple-majority support to succeed. But if both pass, the Reynolds-sponsored measure would prevail.

Tracy Sabetta, of SmokeFreeOhio, admitted her group may have been politically outmaneuvered when it decided to pursue its measure as a statutory change in state law rather than a constitutional amendment. "We could get 90% of the vote and theirs could still trump ours," she said.

In Arizona, Reynolds has adopted a similar strategy of backing a rival to the proposed smoking ban. There, state records show, Reynolds had by mid-August funneled nearly $3 million to a local group called the Non-Smoker Protection Committee, which is backing Proposition 206. Though ostensibly a smoking ban, it would actually unwind existing prohibitions in Tempe and other cities by exempting bars and restaurants statewide. A rival proposal, Proposition 201, which is supported by several health charities, provides no such exceptions.

In Arizona, the smoking measure with the most votes will become law. Recent polling showed the Reynolds-backed proposal had slightly more support than the one backed by the health charities.

Dueling smoking bans will also appear on the ballot in Nevada this year, but campaign-finance records suggest that tobacco companies have left that battle to convenience stores and liquor and gambling interests.

Mr. Smith, the political-science professor, said Reynolds's tactics in Ohio and Arizona are similar to those used by insurance companies to defeat the 1998 California auto-insurance measure. They clotted the ballot with five competing ballot questions on the subject. "Counterproposals confuse voters, and when voters are confused, they vote 'No,' " Mr. Smith said. "That's just the default position."

Retired Operative Says Agency Unfairly Edited His Book

When Gary Berntsen sat down for dinner last year with the CIA's executive director, Kyle "Dusty" Foggo, the agency's No. 3 tried to talk him out of resigning from the National Clandestine Service. Foggo even offered him a university position as a placeholder until the CIA's new director, Porter J. Goss, could fix the broken personnel system and other issues that frustrated him, according to Berntsen.

But the Capital Grille meal quickly degenerated when Berntsen told Foggo that not only was he planning to resign but he intended to write a book about his experiences.

Foggo, according to Berntsen, stated flatly that Goss wanted no more books published by current or former CIA officials. Actually, according to a statement Berntsen filed last week in his ongoing lawsuit against the agency, Foggo's language was a little more colorful: "Mr. Foggo stated 'we will have no more books. I will redact the [expletive] out of your book so no one will want to read it.' "

Berntsen, who worked in the agency's operations and paramilitary branches for 23 years and led a CIA team in Afghanistan, responded that such a move would be illegal. Hundreds of former officers had written books, including some directors. One recent retiree, Gary Schroen, had even written several chapters about Berntsen, referring to him as "Gary 2."

"I just told him I'm preceding. I wasn't going to back down," Berntsen said in an interview last week. "It was very awkward."

Berntsen resigned, wrote his book and, as required, submitted "Jawbreaker: The Attack on Bin Laden and Al Qaeda: A Personnel Account by the CIA's Key Field Commander" to the CIA's Publications Review Board, which redacted about five pages of the 400-plus-page manuscript. "They were very efficient and thoughtful," he said last week.

Then the board sent it to the Directorate of Operations, where Berntsen had worked, as is the practice. There, Berntsen contends, "Mr. Foggo made good on his word" and 70 pages were blacked out.

Berntsen's lawsuit, filed earlier this year in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, asserts that the CIA violated his First Amendment rights in redacting as much as it did.

His case rests, in part, on assertions that the information is virtually the same as information the PRB cleared for publication in a prior book by Schroen, or released upon the orders of then-director George J. Tenet to Washington Post reporters Steve Coll and Bob Woodward, whose separate books included sections on the CIA's work in Afghanistan.

Berntsen thinks the CIA's aim was to make his book "unreadable, so few would purchase it."

Foggo declined comment through his attorney.

CIA spokesman Mark Mansfield said he could not comment on Berntsen's specific allegations. But in an e-mail response to questions, he said that "for former employees, the sole yardstick for pre-publication review has been -- and remains -- the simple requirement that their writings contain no classified information."

In papers filed in the court case, the CIA said Berntsen's unredacted draft "reveals intelligence sources, methods and activities, foreign government information, and information impacting U.S. foreign relations." The information "reasonably could be expected to cause serious damage to national security" and none of the information in question "has been officially disclosed," which would give it a level of credibility beyond that written in nonfiction books by journalists.

The agency says the information is more detailed and covers a different period of time than information the agency released for Schroen's book.

Berntsen published his book, with the redactions, in late December 2005. The paperback editions are due out soon. If he wins back some of the redacted material, he plans to publish an updated edition. "I'm not walking away," he said. "You can't have your First Amendment rights stamped on."

Berntsen's complaints about the agency's publication review decisions are shared by a half-dozen former CIA employees who, in the past two years, have sued or publicly criticized the agency for withholding information they believed would not damage national security but would, perhaps, embarrass the CIA or the White House.

Some administration officials and others in the national security world think Tenet allowed former employees to publish deeply critical books -- such as Michael Scheuer's "Imperial Hubris: Why the West Is Losing the War on Terror" -- in retaliation for the White House allowing the agency to take so much heat for the failed prewar judgments on Iraq and other missteps.

Asked for new CIA Director Gen. Michael V. Hayden's policy on book publishing, Mansfield wrote: "Director Hayden has emphasized the importance of responding in a timely way to employees who write books. And while he is committed to protecting intelligence sources, methods, and other classified information, the director also believes in a reasonable, common-sense approach to pre-publication review."

Berntsen said his legal appeal is being hampered because the CIA, with the court's approval, has refused to allow his lawyer, Mark Zaid, who is cleared to read some classified information, to see the unredacted text to prepare his case. Instead, Berntsen has had to prepare his own appeal, a 70-page rebuttal that documents, line by line, the previous publication of the information the CIA wants to deny him.

While he waits for his case to be adjudicated, Berntsen has written a second book, this one a policy book on "counterterrorism and human intelligence operations." The PRB redacted "only 1 to 2 percent" of the text, he said.

The tables will soon turn on Tenet, who is writing his own book. He has asked for and received access to agency records, including classified documents, "to refresh his memory about events that occurred during his tenure," Mansfield said. He said Tenet's book will be subject to CIA review and that appropriate sections will also be given to the offices where the information originated.

With Health Care Fraud Rampant, States Are Urged to Pass Their Own False Claims Acts, But Foes Warn of Windfalls for Plaintiffs Lawyers

As if the Civil War hadn't started off badly enough for the Union on the battlefield, Abraham Lincoln soon found himself fighting a second enemy at home: war profiteers out to make a buck by cheating the government in just about every way imaginable.

Some would sell the same broken-down horses several times over to different cavalry units. Others would peddle gunpowder mixed with sawdust. Still others would slap a fresh coat of paint on some leaky old tub, then offer the vessel to the Navy as seaworthy. Traffic also was brisk in rotten rations and dead mules.

So at Lincoln's urging, Congress in 1863 passed the False Claims Act to give both the government and private citizens vast new powers to take unscrupulous contractors to court.

Also known as the Lincoln Law, the act today receives widespread recognition as the most effective federal legal weapon against fraud in government programs. Most of the credit goes to a key provision that allows private litigants to sue in the government's name and share in any recovery. Called qui tam, the feature also allows whistle-blowers—relators in the act's lingo—to file claims secretly while Justice Department prosecutors decide whether to intervene and take over the civil litigation.

The False Claims Act may have yet to realize its ultimate reach, however, as Congress attempts to expand the statute's already wide scope to the states beginning in January to get a handle on health care fraud—the most popular way to steal from taxpayers.

As part of the 2005 Deficit Reduction Act, lawmakers decided in February to prod states into passing their own false claims acts with incentives to increase their share of recoveries in Medicaid fraud cases. The inducements would allow states to up their takes by 10 percentage points, provided their false claims acts follow the federal model. By involving more states and more lawyers, supporters hope to increase recovery amounts across the board.

Though any state can share in Medicaid recoveries regardless of whether it has a false claims act, the federal law that Congress wants the states to mimic dangles the extra enticement of triple damages.

WORLDS REMOVED

In Lincoln's day, qui tam was neither unusual nor controversial. The first Congress enacted citizen suit provisions to supplement scant federal law enforcement in a number of broad fields, such as bank regulation and copyright infringement. Fast-forward to today's tort reform-drenched political climate, however, and qui tam takes on an almost sinister tone.

The vital citizen suit provision that Congress insists on as part of any state false claims act unnerves more than a few legislators and lobbyists for health care providers. Opponents argue that added state qui tam procedures would do little more than create undeserved windfalls for whistle-blowers and their lawyers. Moreover, some state false claims acts on the books and the few new ones debated so far may fall short of the federal requirements.

With health care fraud as the No. 1 drain on federal and state treasuries, supporters can't see how any state can reject an offer that's as good as the one Congress made in the Deficit Reduction Act. Supporters say the federal False Claims Act's success virtually ensures similar accomplishments at the state level.

"Given that the Department of Justice is so strapped for resources, the state agencies and attorneys general offices pose a formidable force in qui tam enforcement," says Janet L. Goldstein, a plaintiffs lawyer from Washington, D.C. "I think you'll see a real shift in focus toward state cases. We've got state attorneys general who are very excited about these cases."

Health care fraud is far and away the leading target of qui tam actions at the federal level. Health care scams accounted for 46 percent of 2,490 qui tam cases filed and $5 billion in recoveries from 1987 to 2005, according to the Government Accountability Office. Procurement fraud, exemplified by the proverbial $500 toilet seat, placed a distant second, accounting for 33 percent of cases and $1.4 billion in recoveries. Likewise, health care whistle-blowers were rewarded the most handsomely, taking home $842 million, nearly triple the $291 million won by their counterparts in procurement cases.

Health care fraud can be as simple as billing for services not performed or as elaborate as the 2005 admission by Swiss pharmaceutical company Serono SA that it tried to boost sales of a nearly worthless AIDS drug, partly by taking 10 physicians on an all-expenses-paid trip to a medical conference in Cannes, France. In exchange, each doctor was to write 30 new prescriptions for the drug Serostim. The medication costs $21,000 for each three-month course of treatment, totaling $630,000 in new prescriptions per doctor.

In the end, Serono wound up repaying $567 million in bogus claims covered by Medicaid and federal health plans for veterans and government workers as part of a $704 million civil and criminal settlement. The investigation also produced five criminal indictments against individuals.

Prosecutors say the fraud may well have gone undetected had an employee at a company laboratory in Rockland, Mass., been unable to file a secret qui tam complaint. Four other employees filed similar lawsuits in Maryland and Connecticut. The five whistle-blowers will share $51.8 million from the recovery.

But detractors can't resist pulling out familiar arguments that the incentives will do nothing more than line plaintiffs lawyers' pockets or serve as launch pads for politically ambitious state attorneys general who may be more interested in television exposure than building solid cases.

"The idea of being able to get in front of a camera and tell people how much money you are recovering and how tough you are on defrauders of the state is very appealing," says Washington, D.C., defense lawyer John T. Boese, author of one of the leading texts on the federal act and co-chair of this past June's ABA national institute on qui tam enforcement. "The idea of waiting four years for a case to develop is not so appealing."

Despite the tort reform arguments from some quarters, qui tam cases stand apart because they boil down to government actions to recover stolen tax money. While other plaintiffs lawyers can pick and choose their cases, a qui tam complaint obligates the government at least to investigate the matter.

And unlike personal injury plaintiffs with nothing to lose and everything to gain, qui tam whistle-blowers risk their jobs and careers. Supporters say that highly detailed pleading requirements for fraud complaints and a battery of government lawyers to vet cases add further assurance against abuse.

"This is not a practice that lends itself to voluminous filings with the hope that some of it sticks to the wall," says New York City plaintiffs lawyer Neil V. Getnick. "These cases are not developed during the discovery phase. These cases are developed during the pre-pleading phase. The very nature of the practice does not lend itself to a blunderbuss approach."

Still, Boese says that qui tam plaintiffs lawyering in recent years has come to resemble what he describes as the "franchise model" of the highly criticized 1990s state tobacco litigation, where the handful of plaintiffs firms in control spread their costs and made billions of dollars in fees by farming out much of the actual work to local counsel.

Boese says he regularly encounters plaintiffs lawyers in false claims cases who appear to use a similar tag-team approach. "Will this become tobacco?" Boese asks. "It already has."

A STAUNCH SUPPORTER IN THE SENATE

That's not the kind of talk U.S. Senate Finance Committee Chairman Chuck Grassley wants to hear.

"It ought to be black and white as far as state legislators are concerned," says the Iowa Republican, the act's loudest supporter. "If you are a forward-looking state legislator, you should have passed this years ago, instead of waiting for an incentive from the federal government."

Grassley helped breathe new life into the False Claims Act in 1986 after it had fallen into disuse. He sponsored amendments that tilted the odds toward plaintiffs and prosecutors, and that receive most of the recognition for raising recoveries from close to zilch before enactment to more than $15 billion over the last two decades.

Grassley also was the leading sponsor of the Deficit Reduction Act's current state inducements, which take effect on Jan. 1.

Besides health care, the False Claims Act also deals with fraud in virtually any federal endeavor that involves outside contractors—from defense procurement to student loans and veterans benefits. The law also covers fraudulent Medicare payments. The federal government pays 100 percent of Medicare, so the new incentives apply only to the unique federal-state Medicaid partnership. The feds pick up almost 60 percent of Medicaid's cost, with the states responsible for the remainder.

No one disputes that fraud poses a monster problem in health care and other government programs. Government and private estimates of health care fraud losses range from 3 percent to 10 percent of state and federal outlays. And the Department of Health and Human Services, which administers Medicare and Medicaid, places fraud losses at 5 percent.

Even by conservative estimates, the potential losses are staggering, considering how much the government spends on health care.

Topping Social Security and the military, the federal and state governments spend more money on health care than just about anything else. For the 2006 budget year that ended Sept. 30, the feds expected to spend $343 billion on Medicare for senior citizens and another $192 billion on Medicaid coverage for poor people. Add an expected state Medicaid contribution of another $142 billion, and the two programs total $677 billion. By comparison, Social Security was expected to cost $550 billion at year's end, while the Pentagon was on track to spend $420 billion.

Though a handful of legislatures considered false claims statutes during the spring and summer, the Deficit Reduction Act's February passage came after bill-filing deadlines in many states. The issue promises to heat up considerably this fall with the approach of the deficit act's effective date, just ahead of the next round of legislative sessions.

Before deficit reduction passed, 15 states and the District of Columbia had false claims laws that allowed some form of qui tam litigation. Five of them deal only with health care fraud. If this year's limited experience is any indication, however, many legislators likely will balk at the qui tam provisions.

RESISTANCE FROM PROVIDERS

DOJ_NMG_0077011

With strong bipartisan support that included a Republican governor and a Democratic attorney general, Missouri state Sen. Chris Koster figured his false claims act was a shoo-in. Though the Senate twice passed it unanimously, Koster could only watch as opposition to qui tam drowned his bill in May before the House Special Committee on Health Care Facilities, whose 11 members include six health care providers.

"It was a hot bill," says Republican Koster, a former elected prosecutor from the Kansas City area. "It was very strongly worded. It had provisions in there that I think really shook the provider community."

To be sure, Koster's bill may not have received federal approval anyway, because it would have dismissed suits the state rejected, rather than let relators proceed alone as the federal act does. Though additional proposed criminal penalties also worried providers, even the limited qui tam section proved too much for House committee members. In an effort to keep money away from plaintiffs lawyers, they stripped out qui tam in favor of a straight reward system for tipsters. Neither that version nor the Senate's made it to a House floor vote before the session ended.

"We felt the attorney was going to get a huge chunk of the payout, just by referring the case to the attorney general," says Republican House committee chairman Dr. Rob Schaaf, a family physician from St. Joseph. "We just didn't think that was necessary."

Providers also are skeptical of President Bush's claim that the Deficit Reduction Act can save Medicare and Medicaid more than $48 billion by 2015 and not cut services. The administration aims to accomplish that by a combination of stepped-up fraud enforcement, higher Medicare premiums for some seniors and reduction of federal payments for prescription drugs.

But organized medicine in Missouri says already miserly Medicaid reimbursements don't justify the risk of doctors getting nailed for fraud to boot.

"They literally lose money on Medicaid," says Tom Holloway, lobbyist for the Missouri State Medical Association. "They get 30 to 35 cents on the dollar. They see it as charity care. A lot of them just point-blank told me they're going to get out."

In New York, plaintiffs lawyer Getnick reports similar reactions from legislators there, who passed a massive health care fraud bill in June sans qui tam. Costing $45 billion a year and eclipsing the entire budgets of most other states, New York's Medicaid program is the nation's largest and most generous. It's also a system repeatedly criticized as rife with fraud.

Opponents of qui tam conjure up visions of disgruntled employees clogging the courts and running up legal bills with meritless claims. But Getnick notes that rival providers in some competitive sectors, such as drug manufacturing, also can become qui tam plaintiffs.

"If a pharmaceutical company is able to make huge profits by cheating the government, it becomes much more difficult for a competitor to follow the law," says Getnick, who also serves as board chairman for Taxpayers Against Fraud. The influential lobbying organization also helps plaintiffs and their lawyers assemble qui tam cases and finances litigation.

Relators currently file qui tam actions under seal in federal court, usually along with corresponding state claims, while the Justice Department investigates the allegations to decide whether to intervene and take over the litigation before serving the defendant. The department on average accepts one in three cases. Though cases today typically wind up in a single federal court, the proposed state incentives hold the possibility of parallel proceedings across numerous jurisdictions.

As Justice investigates, defense lawyers scramble to learn the nature of the allegations, who filed them and where. Boese says it's like voting in Chicago.

"You show up early and often," he told an ABA conference on health care fraud in May. "I'm going to start calling state attorney general offices, and I'm going to talk to everyone as quickly as I can. You've got to figure out what's going on."

Though federal qui tam actions can continue without the government's participation, whistle-blowers who go it alone stand only about a 5 percent chance of success and average only $22,400 in payments when they do win, compared with a $175,754 average with government intervention.

The federal act hasn't always worked so efficiently. It saw only sporadic use until 1943, when Congress crippled it by severely curtailing qui tam in response to complaints of "parasitic suits" where whistle-blowers filed cases based on public knowledge, such as criminal indictments. For its success, the act depends on true inside information that normal investigative techniques often fail to reveal. The 1943 restrictions also applied to frauds the government knew about but didn't pursue.

Things changed in 1986 when Grassley assumed the lead in fighting fraud with amendments that changed the face of the False Claims Act.

Besides adding protection from retaliation for whistle-blowers, the amendments contained major financial plums. Included was an increase in relator shares, from a maximum of 10 percent, to at least 15 percent and up to 25 percent of the recovery, with government intervention and depending on the relator's contribution to the action's success. In the remedy department, lawmakers increased damages from double to triple the cost of the fraud, and upped other penalties from $2,000 to between $5,000 and $10,000 per false claim.

Moreover, because some courts demanded that plaintiffs produce clear and convincing evidence to prevail, Congress set a uniform standard of proof at the lower preponderance level. Lawmakers also expanded scienter from the knowing submission of a false claim to cover recklessness and deliberate ignorance.

This year, HHS Inspector General Daniel R. Levinson's office likely struck a nerve in the provider community when in late August it published guidelines for determining whether individual state false claims acts qualify for increased awards. Among other factors in evaluating compliance with the federal version, HHS, in consultation with the Justice Department, will consider whether state laws allow sealed complaints and contain qui tam provisions that permit relators to proceed solo should the government decline the case. HHS also recommends that states award relators at least 15 percent of any recovery from their shares and provide for assessments against defendants for costs and attorney fees.

'THE RIGHT THING TO DO'

Throughout the spring, Grassley had pressed HHS and Justice especially hard on the qui tam provisions.

"There's no doubt that this is the right thing to do, but if a state doesn't want to pass it, it doesn't have to," says Grassley. "But it's not worth doing if you don't have the qui tam provision. They can either pass it according to the intent of Congress or forget it."

Members of the defense bar had hoped that HHS would show some flexibility because the Deficit Reduction Act also states simply that state false claims statutes must be "at least as effective in rewarding and facilitating qui tam actions" as the federal law. Though HHS strongly suggests that states won't qualify for more money if they don't meet the minimum provisions laid out in the guidelines, the department also appeared to leave itself some wiggle room by saying it would evaluate more restrictive state laws on a case-by-case basis.

"No realistic evaluation of these guidelines will be possible until the OIG begins rendering decisions," Boese wrote in a client newsletter.

Texas could be an early testing ground for the HHS guidance. Though Texas has one of the nation's most successful state acts, it still may not qualify for larger recoveries, because a case dies and the relator gets thrown out of court if the state turns it down. Nevertheless, Congress and other states looked to Texas as a model in pondering the new weapons against health care fraud.

"No good deed goes unpunished," says Patrick J. O'Connell, civil Medicaid fraud chief for the Texas attorney general's office, which has recovered more than $100 million since 1999, when relators first began bringing qui tam cases after a change in the law. "We have become sort of a lightning rod for what a state can do if it uses its false claims act correctly."

Like New York, Texas sucks up Medicaid dollars big time. With about 30 percent of Texas residents lacking private insurance, the nation's highest rate, state Medicaid spending doubles every six to seven years. Today, Medicaid costs taxpayers $750 for each man, woman and child in the state, easily more than some families pay in premiums for private health insurance.

The Lone Star State's budget for Medicaid is expected to climb from the current $17 billion annually to $136 billion a year within 20 years, according to the nonpartisan Texas Public Policy Foundation. That's almost as much as the entire $138 billion state budget for the current year that began Sept. 1. So business is vigorous in O'Connell's office, which has grown from two to nine lawyers. "We've got more than we can do," O'Connell says. "We're working nonstop."

MORE THAN ENOUGH ENCOURAGEMENT

But defense lawyer Boese says the federal relator cut is more than enough to encourage the mega-national cases that yield global settlements responsible for much of the act's recent success, regardless of whether states have their own false claims acts. Of the top 25 federal cases that have settled since 1992 for $100 million or more, 21 involved pharmaceutical companies, hospital and nursing home chains, medical device makers and other medical providers or support industries.

Of greater concern to Boese is a separate provision in the Deficit Reduction Act that requires nearly every provider to conduct employee education programs on fraud and how to file false claims complaints. Besides their potential for increasing the number of new cases, Boese says such programs also undermine the stricter internal company compliance plans and financial controls that have become hallmarks of post-Enron corporate self-accountability.

Worker training in the False Claims Act could become the functional equivalent of a company hiring a plaintiffs lawyer and suing itself, Boese complains.

Indeed, some states actually could lose money with their own statutes if they must pay at least a 15 percent relator's share. Washington state prosecutor David W. Waterbury says he's no math whiz, but a 15 percent relator's share sounds like more to him than the promised 10 percentage point increase in the state's share of damages.

"As portrayed, it looks like states are leaving money on the table," says Waterbury, Medicaid fraud control director for the state attorney general's office. What's more, he says, nothing would stop legislators from passing an even more ambitious false claims act aimed at all sorts of state contracts. Waterbury wonders who would pay for that.

DOJ_NMG_0077013

"You have to take the blinders off," Waterbury says. "While this sounds seductive, it may cover the waterfront. If the statute covers everything, you're looking at replicating the Civil Division at the Department of Justice."

At the Civil Division, commercial litigation director Michael F. Hertz says his prosecutors likely will notice little difference in their jobs as state involvement increases.

"I'm not sure we know exactly how this is going to play out or work," Hertz says. "But I don't think it will change that much."

Though total damages are expected to increase and the distribution of awards will change, the states, as they now do, are expected to continue to divvy up recoveries among themselves through the National Association of Medicaid Fraud Control Units, which operates out of the attorney general's office in most states.

"Both of those are mathematical calculations," Hertz says. "The work for lawyers won't change that much."

Federal and state prosecutors say they already work together smoothly, though they expect to see much more of one another in the future. The national association already assembles state teams to assist in cases, and representatives from states with false claims acts meet by conference call every two weeks.

"It will intensify the relationship with DOJ," says Vermont fraud chief Linda A. Purdy, the outgoing association president. "It brings more people into the mix, which requires more efforts at coordination."

MORE TO CONSIDER

But though Justice Department lawyers publicly downplay problems the approaching era may cause, one former health care fraud prosecutor says Congress failed to appreciate the increased complexity that would accompany an explosion in parallel proceedings. Jonathan L. Diesenhaus served as a senior Justice Department trial counsel specializing in false claims cases from 1998 to 2005, when he left for private practice and defense work in Washington, D.C. He envisions control over qui tam sliding away from federal prosecutors to relators and their lawyers.

"Every step of the way, you have a national consortium of people in a case," Diesenhaus says. "The federal prosecutor's job becomes one of traffic cop, not law enforcer."

Besides creating new perils for defendants and administrative headaches for prosecutors, Diesenhaus says criminal enforcement may become a major victim of stepped-up state civil litigation in multiple forums. He cites the possibility of a rogue state unsealing a civil complaint on its own or allowing discovery and tipping off defendants who may be under criminal investigation elsewhere where complaints remain sealed.

"Those circumstances would present a real possibility that the relator could seek deposition testimony from witnesses the government would not want deposed or, of greater concern, individuals whose status in the criminal investigation dictated that they assert their Fifth Amendment rights and decline to testify," Diesenhaus writes in a recent analysis of the Deficit Reduction Act.

Career federal criminal prosecutors often single out New York's Eliot Spitzer as a prime specimen of a genus of political creatures that inhabit the offices of elected state attorneys general and just don't respect the integrity of other agencies' investigations.

As the Democratic gubernatorial candidate in the November election, Spitzer enjoys widespread recognition as the state prosecutor who embarrassed the feds by getting the jump on them in a string of high-profile Wall Street corruption cases. He also severely chastised New York legislators early in the summer for failing to include qui tam in this year's health care fraud legislation.

"Having these state AGs ride along really can undermine federal criminal prosecutions," Diesenhaus says. "The problem is many times greater with state qui tam out there. Criminal prosecution would grind to a halt. Prosecutors would lose interest if there are too many players."

Grassley says in one way he's reliving the resistance to his 1986 amendments, which largely came from defense contractors. He says state legislators should expect more of the same from health care providers as they debate false claims acts.

"They're going to be fighting the same battle I fought 20 years ago," Grassley says. "But we're right, and right wins out—most of the time."

And he says he's not about to listen to federal prosecutors sing the blues about states crowding the field.

"If they want to do their jobs, then they should take these cases from the whistle-blowers," Grassley says. "Sometimes they don't want to. Sometimes it's workload, and sometimes there are more powerful forces at work. Sometimes they don't want a farmer from Iowa who knows something about fraud on the government telling them what to do."

FBI Arrests 2 In Alleged Sex Case In Samoa (AP)

AP, October 10, 2006

PAGO PAGO, American Samoa » Police have arrested two people accused of luring two Chinese women to American Samoa, trapping them in a karaoke bar and forcing them into prostitution.

The women claim they paid $2,000 to travel to the U.S. territory to get jobs as cashiers at a grocery store, but instead they were imprisoned in a karaoke bar and made to have sex with customers, according to an FBI affidavit by Special Agent Jason Cherry.

After six months the victims eventually escaped by climbing down a rope from the third-story balcony of the Bao Kai Karaoke Bar, according to the FBI.

Fu Shen Kuo, 39, and Shenji Wang, 35, were indicted Wednesday by a federal grand jury in Honolulu. They are being held without bail at the federal detention center in Honolulu, said Pamela Tamashiro, Wang's attorney.

The women told police they were recruited around Jan. 26 to work in American Samoa. But once they arrived in March, Wang threatened to beat them if they did not have sex with her customers.

Wang told one of the victims that her family's arms and legs would be cut off if she attempted to escape, according to the affidavit.

One victim told the FBI she was forced to have various forms of sex with between 60 and 70 customers during the six months she was held.

Ex-officers May Face U.S. Trials, Despite State Outcome (MJS)

By Gina Barton

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, October 10, 2006

The constitutional prohibition against double jeopardy says the same person can't be tried twice by the same sovereign for the same crime.

So far, the three former Milwaukee police officers who were tried and acquitted in state court in the beating of Frank Jude Jr. - Jon Bartlett, Andrew Spengler and Daniel Masarik - have not been charged federally. But they could be, and federal plea agreements last week by two other officers involved in the beating make it seem likely.

Bartlett already faces a retrial in state court because the jury could not reach a unanimous verdict on one of the charges against him.

Such a hung jury is an exception to the double jeopardy rule.

And a federal prosecution against Bartlett, Spengler and Masarik wouldn't be double jeopardy even though they already have been tried in state court. Why? Because the state and the nation are separate sovereigns - and because Wisconsin and the United States have different criminal statutes.

Even so, it is unusual for federal prosecutors to intervene after a failed state case, said Tom Schneider, a former U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Wisconsin.

"There are policies within the U.S. Department of Justice that limit when the federal government will step in and bring a prosecution where there has already been a state prosecution," he said.

Prosecutors in Washington, D.C., must review and approve such a case before a local U.S. attorney can bring charges, Schneider said.

"The department is looking for particularly serious cases where there appears to have been a real injustice," he said.

One example is the Rodney King case in Los Angeles. In the 1992 state prosecution, three police officers were acquitted of beating King and the jury was unable to reach a verdict concerning a fourth officer. Federal prosecutors then filed charges, and two of the four officers were convicted.

One of the same Washington, D.C.-based prosecutors who worked on the King case is assisting in the Jude investigation.

U.S. Winning Access For The Disabled Through Mediation (WP)

The Washington Post, October 9, 2006

In nine of every 10 cases involving federal disability laws in the past five years, the Justice Department achieved compliance by government agencies and businesses by using mediation and not imposing penalties.

DOJ_NMG_0077015

Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales said that 1,800 complaints out of 2,000 cases involving the Americans With Disabilities Act had been settled through mediation. The department's civil rights division also settled 151 such cases against state and local governments.

"We have accomplished this through an aggressive program of enforcement and public education," Gonzales said in Minneapolis on Thursday at the annual conference of the U.S. Business Leadership Network, which promotes employment of people with disabilities.

The cases were pursued under a Bush administration initiative to improve the access that people with disabilities have to theaters, sport venues, hotels and other destinations where large numbers of people gather.

The administration is also taking steps to ensure more cities and counties make their public spaces and services accessible to disabled people. Those efforts include modifying sidewalk curbs for wheelchairs, allowing guide dogs for the blind in shelters and installing telephone systems that assist deaf people in making 911 calls.

In Hennepin County, which includes Minneapolis, local officials agreed to provide a sign language interpreter for deaf people who are undergoing chemical dependency treatment and other programs. Anne Arundel County in Maryland agreed to improve services for the deaf and the hard of hearing in its two jails.

The report included a few cases in which offenders faced penalties. In one, movie theater chain AMC Entertainment had to pay $100,000 in damages to customers discriminated against because of access problems.

John Wodatch, who runs the disability rights section at the Justice Department, said most employers are eager to fix problems. He estimated that as much as 70 percent of his staff spends time helping businesses and local governments comply with the law. Department lawyers try to reach a negotiated solution first. "We're not trying to get litigation. We're trying to get compliance," he said.

Former Partners Tied Up In Court (WP)

By Griff Witte, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 9, 2006

Contractor Alleges Racial Bias

Two Washington area government contractors that were once partners on work in Iraq and Afghanistan are now tussling in federal court over allegations of racial discrimination, with one firm claiming the other has nearly driven it out of business.

Worldwide Network Services LLC filed suit in D.C. federal court last week, alleging that its workers were subject to racial epithets, banned from meetings and in some cases forced to leave Iraq as part of a deliberate effort by security firm DynCorp International to force the African American-owned company off of a pair of large State Department contracts. District-based WWNS had been a subcontractor to DynCorp, and the lawsuit claims that DynCorp used WWNS's status as a small, minority-owned firm to help win the deals before the relationship soured.

The suit names as defendants both Falls Church-based DynCorp and EDO Corp., a New York-based firm that was also a DynCorp subcontractor.

"DynCorp's actions, clearly designed to force WWNS out of the Iraq and Afghanistan projects, were motivated by racial animus toward WWNS and its African American founders and owners," the suit contends. "Piling on DynCorp's racially discriminatory actions, DynCorp and EDO have conspired to defame WWNS, interfere with WWNS's contracts with its employees, and interfere with WWNS's prospective business relationships."

DynCorp spokesman Gregory Lagana disputed the suit's claims, saying that DynCorp chose not to renew WWNS's contracts because the firm was not getting its work done. "The charge of racial discrimination is outrageous. The issue with WWNS all along was performance," he said. "We will fight this all the way."

An EDO spokeswoman declined to comment because the company had not been served with the suit as of late Friday afternoon.

Lagana said that DynCorp, which had $2 billion in revenue last year, had been getting complaints from the State Department about poor performance by WWNS.

In the suit, WWNS defends its work, and points to e-mails from DynCorp employees and U.S. officials that praised the accomplishments of the communications firm.

It is not unusual for relationships between prime contractors and their subcontractors to turn bitter. But the suit against DynCorp casts light on an unusually acrimonious end to what WWNS said had been a harmonious partnership as recently as two years ago.

Founded in 1993, WWNS lately had been receiving more than 95 percent of its business from DynCorp subcontracts, amounting to approximately $30 million a year, according to WWNS senior vice president Reginald Bailey Sr.

DOJ_NMG_0077016

Much of the work stemmed from State Department deals to train police officers and provide protection for dignitaries in Iraq and Afghanistan. DynCorp picked WWNS to provide information technology support for those deals, but the suit claims DynCorp soon decided it wanted to get rid of WWNS in favor of EDO.

One DynCorp official, according to the suit, told WWNS employees that they had been hired only because they were black. Another DynCorp manager used a well-known racial epithet in reference to a WWNS manager, the lawsuit says.

The suit claims that WWNS employees were banned from meetings and denied their identity cards, so they could not do their jobs. One WWNS employee was ordered out of Iraq without explanation, and another had to leave because of "his refusal to give [DynCorp] WWNS's proprietary employment information."

Since the relationship between the companies dissolved, the suit contends that DynCorp spread false information that WWNS was going bankrupt, and hired away many of WWNS's workers.

Bailey said that WWNS, which had nearly 100 employees in Iraq and Afghanistan at its peak, is now completely out of both countries and is fighting for its life with a skeleton staff. "Our business has been drained," he said. "DynCorp has essentially taken away our employees. And they were our company."

Asked how his business will survive, founder and president Walter L. Gray Jr. replied, "With a lot of prayer."

Don't Remove Safeguards (USAT)

By Rose Saxe

USA Today, October 9, 2006

Required consent, counseling aren't barriers to testing for HIV.

The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention is right to want more people to get tested for HIV. But eliminating specific consent and pretest counseling, as the CDC recommends, would remove safeguards guaranteeing that testing stays voluntary and informed.

It's not surprising that some doctors and health care workers are welcoming what they see as time-saving measures. But testing people without informed consent doesn't ensure that people with HIV get the care they need. Studies have shown that patients who are tested without consent are less likely to get necessary follow-up care.

Without pretest prevention counseling, we also lose a critical opportunity to educate. The reason people aren't getting tested is not consent requirements or even stigma about testing; it's because people still don't understand HIV. A recent survey found that 22% of Americans wrongly believe that you can get HIV from sharing a glass of water. And 25 years into the epidemic, people continue to lose jobs and housing because of prejudice. Can we really afford to abandon this chance to help people understand HIV?

The new recommendations also raise privacy concerns. Virtually every state now collects the names of those who test positive. If the government is going to collect names and deeply personal information, people tested deserve to know that this information is being collected and how it will be used.

Early in the epidemic, our government ignored AIDS until it was confronted by persistent protests by gay people. As the demographic of the disease shifts to include more women and people of color, why are we abandoning those safeguards? And why is the government so heavily focused on promoting testing, while continuing to fund misleading sex education and refusing to adequately support proven programs, such as needle exchange, that reduce the transmission of HIV in the first place?

Written consent and counseling need not be barriers to HIV testing. Everyone wins when people are able to make informed decisions to protect their health.

South Dakota Nears Vote On Abortion Ban (AP-Y)

By David Crary, Ap National Writer

AP, October 9, 2006

Circled around a living room, sipping coffee, five long-acquainted couples grappled with their stark differences on a topic they would have skirted in the past but now cannot avoid — abortion.

Like other South Dakotans, people in this tiny farming town are confronting a historic opportunity on Nov. 7. They'll sway a tortuous national debate by making a choice no statewide electorate has faced before: whether to approve a sweeping ban on virtually all abortions.

"None of us think abortion is a desirable thing," said Tom Dean, a family physician who hosted the discussion along with his wife, Kathy. "But it's not a problem for government to solve by passing a rigid law."

Yet Lynn Ogren, who helps her husband run a sheep and cattle ranch, choked up with emotion as she explained her support for the ban.

DOJ_NMG_0077017

"I value every child's life, whether it's from a rape or not," she told her friends. "Who's fighting for these kids?"

The measure would allow abortions only to save a pregnant woman's life. It makes no exception for other health concerns, or for cases of rape or incest; a doctor performing illegal abortions could face five years in prison.

The Legislature passed the law overwhelmingly in February, expecting it to be challenged in court and perhaps lead to a U.S. Supreme Court reversal of the 1973 Roe v. Wade decision legalizing abortion. Instead of suing, opponents swiftly collected signatures to force a referendum; the law will be scrapped if voters reject it.

Each side depicts the other as dominated by out-of-state groups — and indeed such forces are active, viewing the vote as an unprecedented gauge of public sentiment on abortion. The Rev. Jerry Falwell has urged his conservative followers to donate in support of the ban; Planned Parenthood and NARAL Pro-Choice America have raised funds to oppose it.

"We're David, they're Goliath," contended Leslee Unruh, head of the campaign group supporting the ban. Parked outside her VoteYesForLife.com office in Sioux Falls were cars with a blunt bumper sticker: "The Killing Stops Here."

The most recent independent poll, in July, found 47 percent of voters opposed the ban, 39 percent favored it, 14 percent were undecided. When asked if they would approve a ban with exceptions for rape and incest, support rose to 59 percent.

Unruh, who had an abortion years ago that she now regrets, says momentum is turning as more voters hear her side's core message: Abortion hurts women. In the event of defeat, she vows to keep fighting.

"Sometimes it's not about votes — it's about the truth," she said.

Jan Nicolay, a former school principal and Republican state legislator, is co-chair of the campaign to keep abortion legal. She knows the stakes are high.

"People from other states are telling me, 'You're in the limelight. Good luck. Please do everything you can to defeat it,'" she said.

Among her colleagues is Russ Tarver, a retired Methodist minister who signed a statement against the abortion ban along with 16 other ministers. "Some legislators were stunned to learn there were pastors on the other side of the issue," he said.

If the ban is defeated, anti-abortion activists might try again later with a milder version making exceptions for rape and incest, but the outcome would be heralded nationally as a major victory for abortion rights. If the ban is approved, several other state legislatures might follow South Dakota's example — building momentum for a possible Supreme Court review of Roe v. Wade.

Each side has recruited South Dakota rape victims to aid their campaigns. Connie Pich, impregnated by a rapist as a teenager in 1973, said victims must be able to choose freely whether to bear the child. On the pro-ban side, Megan Barnett has spoken at the Legislature and in campaign videos about how glad she is to have borne a daughter resulting from a rape.

Barnett, in a telephone interview, expressed empathy with women in comparable plights, but said abortion shouldn't be an option. "Two wrongs don't make a right," she said. "It's a baby, whether you're raped or not. You need a choice both you and your baby can live with."

The ban's supporters note that the measure allows rape and incest victims to get emergency contraception, which is effective if taken within 72 hours. Opponents say emergency contraception isn't widely available in South Dakota, and argue that many victims are too overwrought to seek prompt help.

"It's a sham," Nicolay said of the contraception provision. She noted that anti-abortion lawmakers quashed a measure this year that would have required hospitals to inform raped women that emergency contraception is available.

One of the legislators responsible for the toughly worded measure is House Majority Leader Larry Rhoden, a Republican cattle rancher. He was swayed by women's testimony that their abortions left emotional scars, but now — aware of polls showing his side behind — he has second thoughts.

"I've spent a great deal of time and thought wondering if it would have been wiser to write in the exceptions," he said. "We have a long row to hoe based on the numbers I've seen."

In some ways, South Dakota is an odd venue for the showdown. It has had no resident abortion provider for 10 years, and most of its 800 or so annual abortions are performed at an often-picketed Planned Parenthood clinic in Sioux Falls by doctors flying in once a week from Minnesota.

Sarah Stoesz, president of Planned Parenthood's Minnesota/Dakotas chapter, said even people on the sidelines of the abortion debate rallied to help the petition drive after lawmakers approved the ban.

"It was a political moment like I've never seen, a spontaneous uprising of grass-roots fury," she said. "Abortion isn't a subject people normally discuss, but this has forced ordinary mainstream people to talk about it."

A case in point is Wessington Springs, a town of 1,000 where pride in its seven churches and Shakespearean Gardens mingles with worries over business failures and an exodus of young people.

Tom Dean, whose family's local roots date to 1882, and his wife, Kathy, a nurse-midwife, decided to serve on the anti-ban campaign's statewide board, then placed a small ad in the local paper explaining their stance.

DOJ_NMG_0077018

"We were a little concerned — not for our safety, but of offending our friends," said Kathy Dean, a longtime abortion-rights supporter.

For several years, the Deans have hosted a monthly discussion group, broaching an array of topics. Its members recently convened to wrestle with the abortion ban.

Near the end, after listening in silence, Evelyn Bradley spoke out.

"Life isn't always black and white," said Bradley, the wife of an Air Force retiree. "There are situations where it would be really difficult to have another child, and I'd resent the law saying you have to have it. Shouldn't I be allowed to make that choice?"

The issue has been raised at the town's Roman Catholic church by the priest, Jim Friedrich, who fervently supports the ban.

"So far no one (in the parish) has spoken against it," he said quietly in his rectory. "The way I spoke, I doubt they'd have the guts to tell me otherwise."

John Paulson, minister at nearby Our Savior's Lutheran Church, takes a different tack.

"We can't read God's mind on this," he said. "As pastor, I'd support people voting their conscience with a prayerful heart."

Antiabortion Campaign Waves Feminist Flag (LAT)

By Stephanie Simon

The Los Angeles Times, October 9, 2006

SIOUX FALLS, S.D. — In the fight to preserve the toughest abortion ban in the nation, the talk is not of a fetus' right to life. It's of a woman's right to motherhood.

Antiabortion activists here deliberately avoid the familiar slogans of their movement. They don't talk about the "murder of innocent babies" or quote the Bible on the sanctity of life. Instead, campaign manager Leslee Unruh has taken what she calls a feminist approach, arguing that legalized abortion exploits women and — for their sake — must be stopped.

The bumper stickers and T-shirts that fill campaign headquarters spell out her message, in pink and blue: "Abortion Hurts Women."

"We women buy the choice line. We're panicked, or we're being pressured, or we're ashamed to have a child outside marriage," Unruh said. She speaks from personal experience; she had an abortion nearly 30 years ago and said her life since has been darkened with regret and longing. "If you don't do your job right as a mother," Unruh asked, "what good is everything else?"

Abortion-rights supporters call such rhetoric patronizing and presumptuous; they say many women find that ending unwanted pregnancies brings relief and the freedom to pursue other dreams. But they acknowledge that Unruh's tactic is effective — and that it has thrown their campaign off balance.

"Historically, this debate has been focused on fetal rights, fetal life. We have a lot of language about that," said Sarah Stoesz, president and chief executive of Planned Parenthood of Minnesota and North and South Dakota. "This adds an element we're not accustomed to. It's a different line of debate…. And that is something we struggle with politically."

The ban, passed overwhelmingly by the South Dakota Legislature in February, makes it a felony to help any woman terminate a pregnancy at any stage, unless an abortion is necessary to prevent her death. Women would not face criminal charges, but their doctors could get up to five years in prison.

Rather than challenge the law in court, Planned Parenthood chose to put it to a public referendum, gambling that people would vote to repeal it on Nov. 7. (South Dakota law permits interest groups to refer legislation to the ballot if they can collect enough signatures.)

If voters reject the ban, abortion-rights advocates hope it will deter states such as Ohio, Indiana, Missouri, Georgia and Rhode Island, which have been considering similar measures. If the ban is upheld, Planned Parenthood will challenge it in court. Antiabortion leaders would welcome that battle. They hope the U.S. Supreme Court will use the case to overturn Roe vs. Wade, the 1973 ruling that found a constitutional right to abortion.

Both sides call this election crucial and are putting out urgent appeals to raise millions of dollars for the fight.

But if this is the frontline of the abortion wars, the guns sound oddly muted.

Attuned to the values of this very conservative state, abortion-rights activists have decided not to make a stand on a woman's right to choose. The big poster outside their campaign headquarters makes a much milder point: "This law simply goes too far." One of their TV ads starts out: "South Dakotans agree, honor and protect human life." The ad goes on to affirm support for reducing the number of abortions, but argues that the law is too inflexible.

The only exception in the law states physicians will not be prosecuted for procedures "intended to prevent the death of a pregnant mother." Even then, however, doctors must try their best to save "the life of her unborn child."

A provision allows women to use the morning-after pill, which can prevent pregnancy if taken within 72 hours of sex. But under South Dakota law, pharmacists are not required to dispense the pill — or refer women to a pharmacy that will. And the Legislature has repeatedly voted down a bill to require emergency rooms to stock the contraceptive.

Walking a neighborhood of gracious homes the other day to rally voters against the law, Emma Tupper, 20, made just one pitch, again and again. "Our main concern is the lack of exception for rape and incest," she said. Some residents nodded and pledged to vote against the ban. Nearly as many politely said they would support it.

"Even if there's no exception for rape and incest?" Tupper asked one elderly man.

"I've looked at the bill pretty closely, and I feel comfortable with my decision," he replied, and closed the door.

Tupper — who came from Seattle to work on this campaign — walked on, crunching through drifts of yellow leaves. "It's a tough state," she said.

An independent Mason-Dixon poll in June found voters opposed to the ban, 47% to 39%. But a Zogby International survey last month, commissioned by an antiabortion group in Washington, D.C., found that gap had narrowed to 47% to 44%. In another unsettling sign for abortion-rights supporters, four Republican state senators who opposed the ban lost their seats in the primary election this summer.

"I don't know if I want to say we have a lot of momentum," said Jan Nicolay, a former Republican legislator working to overturn the ban.

The antiabortion camp has attracted hundreds of activists; some have brought with them the strident language Unruh had hoped to avoid. A voter guide produced by the Roman Catholic Diocese of Sioux Falls refers to abortion as a "moral evil," part of "the culture of death." Last month, activists from Wisconsin waved photos of dismembered fetuses at a busy intersection in Rapid City.

Unruh says she hates such messages "with a passion." Banning abortion should be about "compassion and love," she says — not "anger and death."

On a recent afternoon, she spotted a family of volunteers wearing olive-green T-shirts that read "Abortion — the leading cause of death in America." Unruh sent an aide to get them official campaign shirts, which feature the cheery faces of three women and a bright-eyed baby.

One of the women on the shirt is Kayla Brandt, 29, who had an abortion four years ago. "My mind-set was, if it's OK for so many other people, it will be OK for me," she said. But she was so burdened with guilt and shame, she said, she could barely function. In a radio spot, she says mothers "weren't designed to abort our babies" and asks voters to spare other women "the pain of imagining a life that could have been."

Her voice catching, she adds: "Please, to protect women like me, vote yes on Referred Law 6."

The spot caught the attention of Dick Murphy, 58, a local shop owner. He thought at first it was intended to evoke sympathy for a woman's right to choose. "Then it flipped the other way around," he said. "I thought, 'That's a new twist.' " The ad did not change Murphy's mind; he still plans to vote against the ban.

But other voters are torn.

Roger Turnquist, 57, a rancher in town to take his wife and daughter out to lunch, said he could speak for the family: They all backed the ban. "We're Catholic," he explained. His wife, Helen, looked uneasy.

"I'm a little pro-choice," she said. "But I'll probably vote for the ban because I'm Catholic." She paused. "I really haven't decided."

The South Dakota fight marks the first time antiabortion groups have built a public campaign around abortion's effect on women. But for the last few years, activists have tested the tactic as they lobby state legislatures for measures such as more counseling for women seeking abortions.

"It's been very helpful for the pro-life movement…. Who doesn't want to protect women?" said Daniel McConchie, vice president of Americans United for Life, a national group based in Chicago.

Unruh's campaign has made that point in several ways. Along with the radio spot, Brandt tells her story in an online video and campaign fliers. The campaign has also distributed a DVD with testimony from Brandt and three women who decided against abortion in tough circumstances. (One segment is titled, "I love my baby who was conceived by rape.")

Volunteers offer the DVD to voters as they canvass door to door; it's also been shown in churches and at dozens of house parties.

DOJ_NMG_0077020

"The clips really hit me hard," said Jazmine Brown, 13, who was moved to volunteer for the campaign after seeing the DVD at church. "I knew women were hurt by abortion, but that implanted it in my heart."

The concept that women are exploited by abortion has been nurtured by the many "post-abortive support groups" around the nation. Unruh runs one such group in Sioux Falls; the women gather to mourn and to help one another through "side effects" as varied as substance abuse, anorexia and detached parenting.

Their stories have led to a shift in perspective that parallels the religious right's changing attitude toward homosexuality. After years of condemning homosexual behavior as evil, some ministries have begun to portray gay men and lesbians as victims of an immoral society, led astray by gay-pride parades, gay romances on TV, and other signals that same-sex relationships are normal.

Similarly, women who choose abortion are now increasingly treated as victims, let down by a society that keeps abortion legal and relatively accessible.

Abortion-rights supporters respond with exasperation. The American Psychological Assn. has found that abortion carries few long-term emotional risks. And clinic doctors routinely turn away women who are uncertain or seem to have been coerced.

Some women undoubtedly regret their abortions. "But women also marry someone who turns out to be an abusive spouse, and we don't therefore say that marriage hurts women," Stoesz said.

With so much at stake, political scientist Robert Burns says he expects both sides to turn up the rhetoric as the election draws near. Burns, who teaches at South Dakota State University, will not venture to predict the vote's outcome. But it's safe, he said, to foretell this much: "It will get down and dirty before it's all over."

Military Ballots Still Have Glitches (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 9, 2006

The system used by military personnel to cast absentee votes is still not working well, six years after the problem was highlighted by disqualified ballots in the contested Florida recount of 2000, election officials say.

But the Pentagon is releasing statistics and fact sheets to show that armed-forces voting is, in fact, increasing, with more avenues available to the estimated 1.7 million uniformed and civilian personnel in the states and abroad to obtain ballots.

This year, Congress has heard from many sources, including the election commission and the Government Accountability Office, that problems remain less than a month before the Nov. 7 midterm elections.

Sen. Conrad Burns, Montana Republican, says the Pentagon has been reluctant to embrace the Integrated Voting Alternative Site (IVAS), a fast way to get ballots to far-flung troops via the Internet.

Congress started IVAS in 2004 by providing money in a defense-spending bill, but Mr. Burns had to block six Pentagon nominations before he got results, his office says. The Pentagon changed this summer from a pilot program to a permanent IVAS operation.

But the senator says the Defense Department lost precious time.

"If the current bureaucracy can't do it, then we need to throw it out and start over with one that does," he said.

By the Pentagon's own count, only nine states participate in IVAS. The system works by allowing personnel to go to an IVAS Web site and request a ballot from their home county. An election official sends an e-mail alert, and the person then logs on to a secure server, prints the ballot, fills it out and returns it by postal mail.

"This program eliminates the most time-consuming step in the process: getting the ballots to a potentially moving target," said a statement from the senator's office.

A Senate aide says Mr. Burns' attack on the bureaucracy was really criticism of David Chu, undersecretary of defense for personnel and readiness. The aide said Mr. Chu has shunned IVAS in favor of another Internet program.

The Pentagon is defending Mr. Chu's record on making registration and voting more accessible.

"I think we are working very hard here to carry out the [IVAS] initiative," said Maj. Stewart Upton, a Pentagon spokesman. "We support the IVAS program. We believe that it's working and this year has been very effective."

The main voting problem for military personnel away from home is meeting the ballot deadline.

It takes on average 45 days to get an absentee ballot to the troops, have them fill it out and then mail it back to the election board. The constraint has resulted in late, disqualified ballots. In the tight 2000 Florida recount, where a majority of overseas service members voted for President Bush, Democratic lawyers fanned out to election boards to challenge any military ballot that did not strictly meet requirements.

While the Pentagon talks of voter progress, other officials see persistent problems.

DOJ_NMG_0077021

Paul DeGregorio, chairman of the U.S. Election Assistance Commission, told Congress that a summit of election officials last spring concluded that "the current voting process for military and overseas citizens is not working." He blamed the time it takes to mail out and then receive ballots from people thousands of miles away.

Still, the federal voter-assistance program reports a higher military participation rate.

Mr. Chu has told the Senate Armed Services Committee that 73 percent of military personnel voted by absentee ballot in 2004, compared with 57 percent in 2000. The 2004 rate exceeded the 60.4 percent turnout of the general public.

An unscientific poll by the Army Times Publishing Co. in 2004 garnered e-mail responses from more than 4,000 service members. The results: 73 supported Mr. Bush and 18 percent Sen. John Kerry, Massachusetts Democrat. Nearly 60 percent identified themselves as Republicans and 13 percent as Democrats.

Where Faith Abides, Employees Have Few Rights (NYT)

By Diana B. Henriques

The New York Times, October 9, 2006

J. Jeffrey Heck, a lawyer in Mansfield, Ohio, usually sits on management's side of the table. "The only employee cases I take are those that poke my buttons," he said. "And this one really did."

His client was a middle-aged novice training to become a nun in a Roman Catholic religious order in Toledo. She said she had been dismissed by the order after she became seriously ill — including a diagnosis of breast cancer.

In her complaint, the novice, Mary Rosati, said she had visited her doctor with her immediate supervisor and the mother superior. After the doctor explained her treatment options for breast cancer, the complaint continued, the mother superior announced: "We will have to let her go. I don't think we can take care of her."

Some months later Ms. Rosati was told that the mother superior and the order's governing council had decided to dismiss her after concluding that "she was not called to our way of life," according to the complaint. Along with her occupation and her home, she lost her health insurance, Mr. Heck said. Ms. Rosati, who still lacks health insurance but whose cancer is in remission, said she preferred not to discuss her experience because of her continuing love for the church.

In court filings, lawyers for the diocese denied her account of these events. If Ms. Rosati had worked for a business or almost any secular employer, she might have prevailed under the protections of the Americans With Disabilities Act. Instead, her complaint was dismissed in December 2002 by Judge James G. Carr of the United States District Court for the Northern District of Ohio, who decided that the order's decision to dismiss her "was an ecclesiastical decision" that was "beyond the reach of the court" because "the First Amendment requires churches to be free from government interference in matters of church governance and administration."

Legislators and regulators are not the only people in government who have drafted special rules for religious organizations. Judges, too, have carved out or preserved safe havens that shield religious employers of all faiths from most employee lawsuits, from laws protecting pensions and providing unemployment benefits, and from laws that give employees the right to form unions to negotiate with their employers.

Some of these exemptions are rooted in long traditions, while others have grown from court decisions over the last 15 years. Together, they are expanding the ability of religious organizations — especially religious schools — to manage their affairs with less interference from the government and their own employees.

The most sweeping of these judicial protections, and the one that confronted the novice nun in Toledo, is called the ministerial exception. Judges have been applying this exception, sometimes called the church autonomy doctrine, to religious employment disputes for more than 100 years.

As a rule, state and federal judges will handle any lawsuit that is filed in the right place in an appropriate, timely manner. But judges will almost never agree to hear a controversy that would require them to delve into the doctrines, governance, discipline or hiring preferences of any religious faith. Citing the protections of the First Amendment, they have ruled with great consistency that congregations cannot fully express their faith and exercise their religious freedom unless they are free to select their own spiritual leaders without any interference from government agencies or second-guessing by the courts.

To do otherwise would be an intolerable government intrusion into employment relationships that courts have called "the lifeblood" of religious life and the bedrock of religious liberty, explained Edward R. McNicholas, co-chairman of the national religious institutions practice in the Washington, D.C., office of Sidley Austin, a law firm with some of the country's largest religious organizations among its clients.

Judges have routinely invoked the ministerial exception to dismiss lawsuits against religious employers by rabbis, ministers, cantors, nuns and priests — those "whose ministry is a core expression of religious belief for that congregation," as Mr. McNicholas put it.

But judges also have applied the exception to dismiss cases filed by the press secretary at a Roman Catholic church, a writer for The Christian Science Monitor, administrators at religious colleges, the disgruntled beneficiaries of a Lutheran pension fund, the overseer of the kosher kitchen at a Jewish nursing home and a co-founder of Focus on the Family, run by the conservative religious leader James C. Dobson. Court files show that some of these people were surprised to learn that their work had been considered a "core expression of religious belief" by their employer.

Religious employers have long been shielded from all complaints of religious discrimination by an exemption that was built into the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and expanded in 1972. That historic exemption allows them to give preference in hiring to candidates who share their faith. In recent years, some judges have also refused to interfere when religious groups have dismissed lesbians, unwed mothers and adulterous couples, even if they profess the same faith, because they have violated their employers' religious codes.

A federal court decision has given religious broadcasters an exemption from some of the fair-hiring requirements of the Federal Communications Commission, even when they are hiring secretaries and receptionists. Two other decisions, one in federal court affecting a Mormon church and the other in a state court of appeals case involving a Roman Catholic nursing home, affirmed the right of religious employers to dismiss employees whose faith changed after they were hired.

"These are very difficult cases because they pull at some very fundamental heartstrings," said Steven C. Sheinberg, a lawyer at Outten & Golden, specializing in employment law. "There's our belief that employees should be free of discrimination in their work, versus our belief that religious organizations should be free to hire people who best help them fulfill their religious mission, without the intrusion of government."

Employees at religious institutions face other risks as well, thanks to pension law exemptions granted by Congress and upheld by the courts. Religious employers are exempt from Erisa, the federal pension law that establishes disclosure requirements and conflict-of-interest restrictions for employee pension plans. That exemption has given rise to several cases in which workers at religious hospitals found that their pensions had vanished because of practices that would not have been allowed under Erisa's rules.

A related exemption frees religious employers from participating in the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation, the government-run insurance program that provides a safety net for corporate pension plans. And some significant court decisions in labor disputes in the last several years have made it easier for religious schools and colleges to resist collective bargaining efforts.

But for Mr. Heck, the question of whether these workplace exemptions are fair to religious employees was crystallized by the case of Ms. Rosati, the novice nun in Toledo.

He said the doctor involved in her case had been prepared to testify under oath on Ms. Rosati's behalf. The doctor "had quite a vivid memory about these events." In fact, Mr. Heck said, the doctor had cautioned the nuns who accompanied Ms. Rosati that it would be virtually impossible for the ailing novice to get affordable insurance anywhere else if she were dropped from the diocesan health.

Lawyers for the diocese disputed Ms. Rosati's account of that visit and denied that health reasons were the causes of her rejection by the order, the Sisters of the Visitation of Holy Mary, which is covered by the diocesan health plan. For the court "to even begin to inquire into that decision-making process, we believe, crosses the line set by the First Amendment," said Gregory T. Lodge, a lawyer for both the Toledo diocese and the order, which operates under papal authority.

"I understand and absolutely appreciate that in matters of religion, the state has no business meddling," Mr. Heck said. "It would be unthinkable for a judge to be able to say, 'Hey, I don't like the way you're interpreting the Book of Luke.' "

But what religious principle is offended when an employee simply grows old or becomes ill, he asked. If the answer is "none," he continued, judges should be more willing to "look behind the curtain."

Exemptions From Employee Suits

For 28 days last May, Lynette M. Petruska, a former nun who now lives in St. Louis, thought she had finally found judges willing to listen to her complaint against Gannon University, a coeducational Catholic college in downtown Erie, Pa. As it turned out, she was wrong.

Ms. Petruska was educated in Catholic schools from kindergarten to college commencement, graduated at the top of her law school class and practiced law for several years before deciding to become a nun. In 1999, as she was working toward taking her final vows, she became the first woman to serve as Gannon's chaplain.

Three years later she was demoted and, according to her complaint, effectively forced out. In her lawsuit, she said this action was in response to her having notified the administration of a case of sexual misconduct by a senior university official, resisted efforts to cover up that case and opposed proposals to weaken campus policies on sexual harassment. In 2004, she sued, accusing the university administration of forcing her out simply because she was a woman and because she had opposed the sexual harassment others experienced on campus.

Gender bias claims against religious employers have generally been dismissed under the ministerial exception. But some judges across the country have been less quick to dismiss cases where sexual harassment or abuse of an employee is involved. And unlike many other plaintiffs, Ms. Petruska claimed that her supervisor had actually acknowledged to her that she was being demoted solely because of her sex, not because of any religious doctrine.

Judge Sean J. McLaughlin of the United States District Court for the Western District of Pennsylvania nevertheless ruled that Gannon was protected by the First Amendment and the ministerial exception from any court interference in its choice of chaplain. Gannon itself argued that it had many women in leadership positions and that Ms. Petruska had resigned simply because she was unhappy with a staff reorganization. But its fundamental argument was that it would be unconstitutional for the court to second-guess these disputed decisions.

"You may ask, 'Why should these decisions go unquestioned?' The reason is plain and simple: The First Amendment protects a church's right to freely exercise its religion," said Evan C. Rudert, a lawyer for the university. "And that includes organizing itself as it chooses and selecting those who it believes will serve best as its leaders — without interference from the courts."

Then, last May, in a decision that caused considerable comment in legal circles around the country, a federal appeals court panel reversed the trial judge's decision.

For four weeks, the prevailing law in Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware and the Virgin Islands — the jurisdiction of the United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit — was that "employment discrimination unconnected to religious belief, religious doctrine, or the internal regulations of a church is simply the exercise of intolerance, not the free exercise of religion."

Appellate Judge Edward R. Becker wrote that opinion; his colleague on the three-judge panel, Judge D. Brooks Smith, filed a stinging dissent. A few days later, Judge Becker died. On June 20, in a rare move, the Third Circuit granted Gannon's routine request to have the case reconsidered and named Judge Smith to the new three-judge panel that would do so.

On Sept. 6, the new panel swept the earlier decision away, unequivocally restoring the protections for religious employers that it had put in doubt. As Judge Smith put it, the ministerial exception "applies to any claim, the resolution of which would limit a religious institution's right to choose who will perform particular spiritual functions."

Ms. Petruska, who has left her order and returned home to work at her old law firm, describes herself as a feminist who is "committed to peace and freedom." She has a long history of putting her words into action — she has been arrested at protest marches, most recently at an antiwar rally the day before the Iraq war began, she said. She plans to appeal the ruling against her.

"I think this issue needs to be decided by the Supreme Court," she said. And she has hopes that the justices will agree with Judge Becker that, absent some grounding in religious doctrine, sex discrimination by religious employers is wrong.

No Recourse On Age Bias

Add age discrimination to that wish list, the Rev. John Paul Hankins says.

At 73, Mr. Hankins can look back on 50 years in a loving marriage, 40 years as a minister in the United Methodist Church — and 3 years as the plaintiff in an uphill court fight over his denomination's mandatory retirement policy.

Eight months after he turned 70, that policy forced Mr. Hankins to leave his pulpit in the historic Stony Brook Community Church in Stony Brook, N.Y., where he had served for 37 years. He loved his flock and the feeling was mutual: the congregation withheld part of its annual contribution to the regional church that year to express its dismay.

"He had served for many, many years and wanted to continue to serve, and his congregation wanted that, too," said David S. Warren, a professor of computer science at Stony Brook University who had been a member of the congregation for more than 25 years but who left because of how Mr. Hankins was treated.

Mr. Hankins said he was suing because age discrimination is almost as hateful and senseless to him as the racial segregation and bias against women that used to be "mandatory policies" of his church.

"I feel, and have long felt, that discrimination in any form has no place in the life of a faith community," he said.

Under the federal age discrimination law, most employees of all but the smallest businesses can sue if they are forced to retire for no other reason than that they reached a certain birthday; increasingly, government and academic employees have the same protection. But Mr. Hankins knows his complaint will probably never come to trial simply because he is a clergy member trying to sue his church. Indeed, court rulings around the country suggest that if he had been forced out at any age and for almost any reason — for a deceptive reason, or even for no reason at all — he would face the same judicial roadblock.

"I never, ever thought that the last years of my ministry would be involved in a fight like this," Mr. Hankins said.

Lawrence H. McGaughey, the lawyer for the regional Methodist governing body and its bishop, acknowledged that there is a movement in the church to eliminate the retirement rule opposed by Rev. Hankins. But if the rule is ultimately changed, it should be the church's decision, not a court's, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0077024

"Any private employer would feel the same way — they'd like to be able to make these decisions without having to face the courts," Mr. McGaughey said. "But the difference is the First Amendment."

He continued: "We're talking about worship here. Are you going to go into church and have someone standing there who was ordered to be there by the courts? There are certain things a government just cannot do in this country."

In September 2003, a federal trial judge on Long Island ruled that Mr. Hankins's complaint was barred by the ministerial exception. Last February, a federal appeals court panel sent the case back, directing the trial judge to decide the case by applying a 1993 federal law, the Religious Freedom Restoration Act, rather than the ministerial exception doctrine. But there was little in the instructions to the trial court to encourage Mr. Hankins.

He nevertheless thinks his complaint will eventually help his church see that its mandatory retirement rule is unfair.

"I don't need to win the case," Mr. Hankins said. "I feel the movement of history at work here, I really do. Ideas find their feet, and start to walk."

State judges have been equally reluctant to interfere in disputes between religious employers and their staff members — to the sad frustration of Rabbi Isaac H. Celnik of Albuquerque.

Rabbi Celnik, one of the youngest men ever ordained in Conservative Judaism, was just 30 when he was hired in 1971 as the spiritual leader of Congregation B'nai Israel. Eight years later, he entered into a 30-year contract with the synagogue, an arrangement his congregation endorsed by a margin of almost nine to one, he said.

Then the medical problems began. In 1996, Rabbi Celnik was told he was in the early stages of Parkinson's disease; in April 2000, his wife, Peggy, was told she had breast cancer. In October 2000, he said, the president of the congregation's governing board at the time suggested he retire on disability.

But the rabbi did not consider himself disabled and did not want to retire, he said. He had two young children and a wife whose treatment required continuing health insurance. He "loved the work, and loved the congregation," he said. Indeed, when the synagogue's cantor resigned a month after the retirement discussion, Rabbi Celnik proposed, and the board agreed, that he would take on the cantor's duties as well, he said.

But the relationship deteriorated as he tried to negotiate retirement terms that would provide him and his family with adequate financial security. In January 2002, after those negotiations faltered, he was dismissed; in 2003, he sued. But last February, the state's court of appeals dismissed his case, based on the ministerial exception, also called the church autonomy doctrine.

"We are sympathetic to Rabbi Celnik's struggles with Parkinson's and the manifestation of the disease after so many years of service," the chief judge wrote. But he ruled that the dispute "is precisely the type of religious debate that the church autonomy doctrine is intended to protect from judicial review."

The congregation's current president, Alan M. Chodorow, declined to discuss the details of the dispute. "I do not want to talk about anything that might impair our search for reconciliation and forgiveness" with Rabbi Celnik, he said. "But I will say that we believe strongly in the separation of church and state, and that the state should not have any part in choosing our spiritual leaders."

But Mr. Chodorow said that he was sympathetic to the situation that this freedom for congregations created for employees and that he believed that religious institutions have to provide other protections by contract. Although clergy members in many faiths work without formal contracts, the model contract in wide use within Conservative Judaism provides that rabbis and cantors can terminate the agreement without cause and seek binding arbitration to resolve disputes, he said.

The church autonomy doctrine "takes away certain rights and this is put in specifically for the purpose of preserving rights," Mr. Chodorow said.

Rabbi Celnik and his wife continue to struggle with the financial and physical burdens of his deteriorating health and her second episode of cancer. "They don't teach this in rabbinical school," the rabbi said in a recent interview. Teach what? Mrs. Celnik answered before he could: "Don't get old. Don't get sick."

Mr. McNicholas, the Sidley Austin lawyer, acknowledged that some "unjust and sinful" treatment has been protected from litigation by the ministerial exception. But he argued that "the openness of the religious process" would remedy those situations, making it possible for a clergy member dismissed by one congregation to find a home in another.

But what if they are sick? "That's harder — and very troubling," Mr. McNicholas said. "But if you have a judge deciding it, that's just too much intervention in the process of deciding the hiring issues" at religious institutions. "There's no easy answer."

Protections Against Unionization

The University of Great Falls, in Montana, has a tidy urban campus, a bold crucifix-topped chapel, a master's program in criminal justice and, according to one student's Internet posting, a cafeteria that serves pretty good spaghetti.

What the small Roman Catholic college doesn't have is a faculty union.

It wasn't for lack of trying. In 1995, the Montana Federation of Teachers, which had unionized most of the public universities in Montana, asked the National Labor Relations Board to recognize it as the collective bargaining agent for the teaching staff at Great Falls.

"Some of the faculty members there traveled in circles that included professors at the other schools," recalled James McGarvey, who was president of the Montana Federation of Teachers at the time. (It has since merged with the Montana Education Association.) Teachers at those other campuses had better pay and more favorable work rules, and some professors at Great Falls had expressed interest in seeing whether the federation could help them as well, according to Mr. McGarvey. "We felt we had a pretty strong showing," he said.

J. C. Weingartner, a union lawyer who worked on the campaign, said that while "pay did come into it, it wasn't what got it started." That spark was discontent among some professors over the president's appointing members to an important advisory council who "did not reflect the views of the majority of the faculty" in negotiations with the administration, he said. "So they felt their interests would be better served with collective bargaining."

The university, which has a new management team today, declined to comment on the long legal battle.

But when the labor board held a hearing on the union's request, the university's lawyers argued that the board had no jurisdiction because the university was a religious institution, and to force it to negotiate with the union would violate its religious liberty.

The university based its case largely on a 1979 decision in which the United States Supreme Court ruled that the labor board's jurisdiction did not extend to religious schools. After that decision, which resulted in what is called the Catholic Bishop doctrine, the board began case-by-case examinations to determine whether the schools that came before it were sufficiently religious — whatever their faith — to be exempt from its jurisdiction.

The University of Great Falls did not qualify, the board concluded in February 1996.

For the next seven years, the little Catholic college fought both the federal labor board and the faculty union, keeping lots of lawyers busy and incurring official charges of unfair labor practices in the process. In 2002, it won.

The federal appeals court panel in Washington ruled that a three-prong test should be the labor board's only standard for determining which schools were religious enough to be exempt from the nation's collective bargaining laws under the Catholic Bishop decision.

Any school that is nonprofit, has a religious affiliation and presents itself to the public as a religious institution must be exempted from jurisdiction, the court said. And that included the University of Great Falls.

And the court ruled that the labor board's old case-by-case approach had to stop immediately. For the board even to conduct such inquiries raised serious issues of religious freedom, the judges said.

Of course, some casually faithful or broadly tolerant schools that might previously have failed to win a labor board exemption would easily pass the court's new test.

The appellate judges anticipated that complaint, and dismissed it. "If the university is ecumenical and open-minded, that does not make it any less religious, nor N.L.R.B. interference any less a potential infringement of religious liberty," they said.

David Strom, general counsel of the American Federation of Teachers in Washington, doesn't mince words about the impact of the Great Falls decision. "It means that the difficulty of organizing a religiously affiliated college has become enormous."

Although federal statistics show that one of every seven colleges in the country describes itself as a religious institution, it is not clear how far-reaching the Great Falls decision will be. On its face, it would seem likely to reduce any union-driven salary pressures on exempt religious schools, allowing them to maintain more competitive tuition levels. However, some colleges that might be eligible for an exemption under the new rules may already have collective bargaining in place or may not oppose unions as fiercely as the Montana university did.

And the decision limits only the protections of the National Labor Relations Act. But last fall, in a case involving teachers at Catholic schools in Boston, a federal district judge in Massachusetts ruled that part of another federal labor statute called the Taft-Hartley Act could not be applied to church-operated schools without raising First Amendment issues.

Notwithstanding the protracted battle in Great Falls, Catholic institutions are not doctrinally opposed to collective bargaining, said Julie N. Secviar, senior vice president for strategic resources for the Franciscan Sisters of Chicago Service Corporation, which manages Catholic hospitals, nursing homes and retirement communities.

In fact, the ethical health care directives of the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops require "recognition of the rights of employees to organize and bargain collectively without prejudice to the common good."

Next, Exemptions for Hospitals?

DOJ_NMG_0077026

schools and colleges, including Loma Linda University in California. But it also operates the largest Protestant nonprofit health care system in the country, with 38 hospitals in 10 states, 23 nursing homes and 44,000 employees.

And not one of those employees is in a union, for a very simple reason: The church believes that collective bargaining "defies Christ's admonitions that behavior must be directed by individual conscience" and "is inherently disruptive" of the church's healing mission, as lawyers for the denomination first explained to the national labor board in 1998.

The lawyers were responding to a petition by the California Nurses Association to represent the nonsupervisory nurses employed at Ukiah Valley Medical Center.

As in the Great Falls case, the lawyers argued that the labor board had no jurisdiction because the hospital was a religious institution and to force it to recognize or bargain with a union would violate its freedom under the First Amendment and the Religious Freedom Restoration Act.

As in the Great Falls case, the labor board ruled otherwise. The next step should have been union balloting, explained Jeffrey A. Berman, the Sidley Austin lawyer who represented the hospital in the case. But the nursing association withdrew its petition and the case ended, he said.

According to the American Hospital Association, about one of every four of its members has a religious affiliation. But the Adventists' problem before the labor board was that hospitals, unlike religious schools, were specifically included in the board's jurisdiction by Congress. The only labor-law accommodation that Adventists have been able to win from Congress was a provision in 1974 allowing church members to pay the equivalent of their union dues to one of several agreed-upon secular charities, according to Mr. Berman.

Adventist hospitals are still waiting for their own Great Falls moment. As Mr. Berman put it, "We're not asking for carte blanche, for the ability to be exempt from all laws — just with respect to what is unique about these hospitals."

Cities Opt For Economics Instead Of Religion To Boost Downtown Areas (USAT)

Church advocates: Zoning rules unfair

Churches are being turned away by cities and towns that hope to enliven a fading downtown or boost their tax base.

"There's more interest than ever in attempting to exclude churches and other houses of worship," says Kevin "Seamus" Hasson, president of the Becket Fund for Religious Liberty. "They say they don't want churches there. They want something that generates tax revenue."

The Liberty Legal Institute, which represents churches in religious-freedom disputes, says more communities are tightening zoning codes or considering other ways to restrict church locations.

The group received 18 calls last year from churches concerned about restrictive zoning ordinances, up from four in 2004, says Hiram Sasser, director of litigation. There have been 12 calls so far this year.

Sasser's institute, the Becket Fund and others often go to court to fight the restrictions. A federal law passed in 2000 says zoning rules must treat a house of worship the same as any secular meeting place.

The communities with restrictions say they're not against churches, they just want a variety of services for their residents and businesses that attract customers seven days a week.

Some recent examples:

·Kenly, N.C., adopted a moratorium on storefront churches in August and later expanded it to include halls, theaters and other gathering places.

·Stafford, Texas, home to 51 places of worship in its 7 square miles, intends to tighten the zoning rules that govern church location, Mayor Leonard Scarcella says. Only 300 acres of empty land remain available for development.

"There has been this desire to locate these religious facilities in our city," he says. "That has precluded other types of development."

·Miramar, Fla., put a six-month hold on "places of public assembly," including churches, in June and is working on a permanent plan.

Miramar's leaders worry about storefront churches and other halls because they're "taking up parking at particular times and not contributing to the dynamism" of the area, says Wazir Ishmael, assistant city manager.

·The Liberty Counsel, a group that defends churches, sued Titusville, Pa., in July over zoning that prohibits churches in commercial zones where clubs and theaters are allowed. "If theaters or private clubs are permitted, then churches cannot be banned," Liberty Counsel President Anita Staver says.

Titusville Mayor Brian Sanford says the rule protects businesses that cannot be near churches. The Pennsylvania Liquor Control Board, for instance, may refuse to grant a liquor license application to an establishment within 300 feet of a church.

"When you establish a church in a commercial district, that changes the rules for everyone," he says.

Faith Embraces Pop Culture, Technology (USAT)

By Tom Krattenmaker

USA Today, October 9, 2006

Evangelical Christians have always used innovative outreach to spread their message, and the tech boom has given the movement new platforms to be 'culturally relevant.' It's a wave other faiths might want to catch.

If you want to understand why evangelical Christians are such an influential force in American culture these days, revisit a recent moment from the Steelroots television program on the i-Lifetv Christian cable channel.

The host, Ben Cerullo, is a youthful-looking skateboarder type in a T-shirt and backward ball cap who blows up objects on camera for the sheer entertainment value. "Awesome," he says as he interviews Chandler Brownlee of the outreach group Christian Surfers. Brownlee tells Cerullo and his viewers about the success of the Florida-based ministry bringing thousands of surfers into the Christian fold. He uses a telling phrase for his ministry's approach to evangelism. "Culturally relevant," he calls it.

Brownlee is talking about surfer outreach, but culturally relevant applies across the landscape of the evangelical Christian engagement with American popular culture. The basic idea: Identify the communications channels that have the attention of the public and use them to spread the message of Jesus. Skeptics might question the appropriateness of this melding of the sacred and "profane," but there's no doubting its effectiveness as a means of reaching people.

Think of a pop culture form, and chances are there's an evangelical Christian ministry reaching out to its devotees and, wherever possible, creating an alternative Christian version. Action sports, rock and rap music, pop literature, movies, news, radio and television — few cultural stones are unturned, and in production quality, the Christian versions are often indistinguishable from their mainstream corollaries. Don't forget video games. Are you ready for Bibleman: A Fight for Faith?

In Christian TV, the Inspiration Network — the parent company of i-Lifetv airing Steelroots programming — might be the most technologically forward. Like other well-known Christian TV networks, such as the Trinity Broadcasting Network and Pat Robertson's Christian Broadcasting Network, the Inspiration Network reaches its subscriber base (22 million households) via cable and satellite. But that's just the start. The network is making Steelroots and its other signature programs available on the Web. Click on the episode, and watch it on your computer.

Jumping on the latest content-delivery bandwagons, the Inspiration Network is also touting soon-to-launch features that would allow viewers to download ring tones, devotionals and video to their cellphones and iPods for use wherever, whenever. Last month, the organization rolled out video-on-demand programming for 177,000 cable subscribers in its home market of Charlotte.

"One way we try to be 'fishers of men' is by seeking to be culturally relevant," says Inspiration Network spokeswoman Kristina Hill, "which means being sensitive to the needs and interests of different demographic groups." As Hill suggests, Steelroots is more likely to connect with its skateboarding, snowboarding audience than would a program featuring a sermon by a fiftysomething man in a gray suit. Blowing up objects on camera is more reminiscent of MTV's Jackass than Jesus, but it's sure to raise the show's cool quotient and improve the odds of a 15-year-old viewer listening to the religious message.

In the quest to market Christianity to the masses, is the Inspiration Network watering down the exclusive message of the evangelical faith? Judging from the network's name — note the conspicuous absence of the word "Christian" — I initially thought as much. Before I began sampling the network's offerings, I expected Oprah-style, vaguely Christian lifestyle programming.

Underneath the broad-appeal gift wrap, however, I found straight-up evangelical Christianity with heavy promotion of the imperative to accept Jesus and the Christian Right worldview. The shows condemn abortion and homosexuality. Guests on Inspiration Today! recently have included author John McTernan, who argues that God elevated America to supremacy but is turning away from our country because of its liberal direction. (Such talk on Christian TV is hardly rare. Think Robertson.)

Featured in recent appearances on the same program was evangelical preacher and writer John Hagee, whose book Jerusalem Countdown argues that the Bible demands that the United States stand squarely with Israel or incur God's wrath. The network hypes such guests, and their views, approvingly.

That's its right, of course. The difficulty of getting these messages taken seriously by mainstream media is a major reason why Christian media exist. If secularists lack the motivation to create their own media universe, it's because, in a sense, they already have it. Their outlets are known as CBS, CNN, USA TODAY and the like.

Except for the particulars, there is nothing new about the innovative outreach by evangelicals today. Entrepreneurship and energy have characterized the movement in this country for decades, which explains its continued vitality in a time when mainline Protestantism has waned. While claiming to represent an unchanging, timeless truth, evangelicals continue impressively to reinvent the language of the message and the means of delivering it. That is why fans will soon be able to watch Inspiration Network video on their iPods.

Certainly, liberal Christians — perhaps in recognition of the advances made by the competition — are starting to get in the game. The National Council of Churches, for example, produced a TV program on poverty for NBC affiliates that aired last month. On the other hand, you will be hard-pressed to find progressive Christian groups running skateboard outreach programs, proselytizing to snowboarders, or developing video games.

As Woody Allen famously said, 80% of success is just showing up. Evangelicals are definitely showing up, and with a lot of hustle and muscle. Those Americans who worry that conservative Christians go too far in imposing their religion and values on the rest of the country — and polls show they are many — will need to do more than complain if they're to counteract that influence. They will need to get very busy.

In N.Y., Sparks Fly Over Israel Criticism (WP)

By Michael Powell, Washington Post Staff Writer

Polish Consulate Says Jewish Groups Called To Oppose Historian

NEW YORK -- Two major American Jewish organizations helped block a prominent New York University historian from speaking at the Polish consulate here last week, saying the academic was too critical of Israel and American Jewry.

The historian, Tony Judt, is Jewish and directs New York University's Remarque Institute, which promotes the study of Europe. Judt was scheduled to talk Oct. 4 to a nonprofit organization that rents space from the consulate. Judt's subject was the Israel lobby in the United States, and he planned to argue that this lobby has often stifled honest debate.

An hour before Judt was to arrive, the Polish Consul General Krzysztof Kasprzyk canceled the talk. He said the Anti-Defamation League and the American Jewish Committee had called and he quickly concluded Judt was too controversial.

"The phone calls were very elegant but may be interpreted as exercising a delicate pressure," Kasprzyk said. "That's obvious -- we are adults and our IQs are high enough to understand that."

Judt, who was born and raised in England and lost much of his family in the Holocaust, took strong exception to the cancellation of his speech. He noted that he was forced to cancel another speech later this month at Manhattan College in the Bronx after a different Jewish group had complained. Other prominent academics have described encountering such problems, in some cases more severe, stretching over the past three decades.

The pattern, Judt says, is unmistakable and chilling.

"This is serious and frightening, and only in America -- not in Israel -- is this a problem," he said. "These are Jewish organizations that believe they should keep people who disagree with them on the Middle East away from anyone who might listen."

The leaders of the Jewish organizations denied asking the consulate to block Judt's speech and accused the professor of retailing "wild conspiracy theories" about their roles. But they applauded the consulate for rescinding Judt's invitation.

"I think they made the right decision," said Abraham H. Foxman, national director of the Anti-Defamation League. "He's taken the position that Israel shouldn't exist. That puts him on our radar."

David A. Harris, executive director of the American Jewish Congress, took a similar view. "I never asked for a particular action; I was calling as a friend of Poland," Harris said. "The message of that evening was going to be entirely contrary to the entire spirit of Polish foreign policy."

Judt has crossed rhetorical swords with the Jewish organizations on two key issues. Over the past few years he has written essays in the New York Review of Books, the London Review of Books and in the Israeli newspaper Haaretz arguing that power in Israel has shifted to religious fundamentalists and territorial zealots, that woven into Zionism is a view of the Arab as the irreconcilable enemy, and that Israel might not survive as a communal Jewish state.

The solution, he argues, lies in a slow and tortuous walk toward a binational and secular state.

He has, of late, defended an academic paper -- co-authored by professor Stephen M. Walt of Harvard University's John F. Kennedy School of Government and John J. Mearsheimer, a professor at the University of Chicago -- which argues the American Israel lobby has pushed policies that are not in the United States' best interests and in fact often encourage Israel to engage in self-destructive behavior.

These are deeply controversial views -- Foxman of the ADL and writer Christopher Hitchens, among others, have attacked the Walt and Mearsheimer paper as anti-Semitic. And Judt's advocacy of a binational state has drawn a flock of critics, the more angry of whom accuse him of "pandering to genocide" as the Committee for Accuracy in Middle East Reporting in America put it. Former Bush speechwriter David Frum said Judt was pursuing "genocide liberalism."

Foxman has referred to Judt's views of Israel as "an offensive caricature."

DOJ_NMG_0077029

The Mearsheimer and Walt paper, however, has drawn praise in some quarters in Israel, particularly on the left. So, too some Israeli writers, not least Israeli historian and social critic Amos Elon, have praised Judt's writings on Israel. Nor are Judt's arguments without historical precedent: Massachusetts Institute of Technology linguist and political philosopher Noam Chomsky, who is Jewish, has advocated a binational solution in Israel, a view that three decades ago sparked such anger that police stood guard at his college talks. More recently, the ADL repeatedly accused DePaul University professor Norman G. Finkelstein, who is Jewish and strongly opposes Israeli policies, of being a "Holocaust denier." These charges have proved baseless.

"There is an often organized and often spontaneous attempt to marginalize anyone in the Jewish world who offers a critique of Israeli policy," said Rabbi Michael Lerner, editor of the liberal magazine Tikkun. "It's equated with anti-Semitism and Israel denial."

Foxman says such complaints are silly. "Nobody has called Judt an anti-Semite," Foxman said. "People who are critical of Israel and of the Jewish people often flaunt their Jewishness. Why isn't that an issue?"

Judt replies that he only reluctantly talks of his Jewishness, in no small part to inoculate himself against charges of anti-Semitism. "For many, the way to be Jewish in this country is to aggressively assert that the Holocaust is your identification tag," Judt said. "I know perfectly well my history, but it never occurred to me that my most prominent identity was as a Jew."

A Vote We Can Believe In (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, October 10, 2006

Sometimes, paranoids are right. And sometimes even when paranoids are wrong, it's worth considering what they're worried about.

I speak here of all who are worried sick that those new, fancy high-tech voting systems can be hacked, fiddled with and otherwise made to record votes that aren't cast or fail to record votes that are.

I do not pretend to know how large a threat this is. I do know that it's a threat to democracy when so many Americans doubt that their votes will be recorded accurately. And I also know that smart, computer-savvy people are concerned about these machines.

The perfectly obvious thing is for the entire country to do what a number of states have already done: require paper trails so that if we have a close election or suspect something went wrong, we have the option to go back and check the results.

So it is heartening that a diverse group -- Republicans and Democrats, liberals and conservatives -- in Congress has proposed legislation to give everyone, even the supposedly paranoid, confidence that our elections are on the level.

The bill has been pushed by Rep. Rush Holt (D-N.J.), with strong support from Reps. Tom Davis (R-Va.) and Tom Cole (R-Okla.). It has 219 co-sponsors, which happens to be a majority of House members.

The bill requires that voting machines produce a permanent paper record that voters themselves can verify. It requires random, unannounced hand-count audits in 2 percent of all precincts to make sure the machines recorded votes properly.

It prohibits connecting any voting machine component to the Internet and bans political and financial conflicts of interest among manufacturers, test laboratories and political parties. It also includes protections for voters with disabilities.

Pretty much common sense, right? The problem is that the issue of protecting the right to vote has been mired in partisanship and in the suspicion that all who worry about electronic voting are crazy conspiracy-mongers who imagine the worst about everybody.

But Holt and Davis don't fit the stereotype. "I have steered clear of conspiracy theories because I'm not a conspiracist by nature," says Holt who has a PhD in physics and has no problem with innovation. "But I'm quick to say that you cannot disprove the conspiracy theories if you don't have a paper trail." Anyone with confidence in these machines should have faith that they'll pass any tests of how well they'd work.

Because of the bitter disputes over what happened in Florida in 2000 and Ohio in 2004, some Republicans are suspicious that all the noise surrounding the new voting machines is being generated by angry Democrats. "When I first introduced the bill a couple of sessions ago," Holt says, "a lot of Republicans stayed away from it because they believed that it was payback for Florida."

But over time, many Republicans have come to realize that machine errors are nonpartisan. Tom Davis is about as loyal a Republican as you'll find. He came to this cause in part because a result in a Virginia school board race not only defied everyone's expectations but seemed to him flatly wrong.

"Some people will call me paranoid," Davis chuckles, "but it was real clear to me that in that race, some votes weren't picked up." And the technology, he says, made it impossible to check the count.

DOJ_NMG_0077030

In fact, as Davis notes, partisan splits on the new technologies vary sharply from state to state. Whichever party happened to control the election board that spent a lot of money on the new technologies tends to resist challenges to it. But defensiveness, by election officials or by vendors, should not get in the way of reforms and protections.

Nor, says Davis, should political polarization be allowed to stop even those reforms that have a lot of bipartisan support. "A lot of no-brainers that ought to be getting done," he says, "aren't getting done."

There are respectable studies -- for example, one released this summer by the Brennan Center for Justice at New York University School of Law -- suggesting that the new machines may be far easier to hack than we want to know. But Holt explains why even skeptics of such studies should favor technological safety nets just in case they someday prove to be right.

"The winners will always believe the results of elections," says Holt. "But it eats away at democracy if the loser thinks that something went wrong, for accidental or malicious reasons."

Let's hope that things go okay this November, and then let's make sure that winners and losers alike can have confidence in our system the next time around.

Real Bad ID (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 10, 2006

It's unfair to say that the Republican Congress has done nothing on immigration. In one respect, according to a new report from state officials, Congress made matters worse.

In May of last year Congress passed the Real ID Act at the urging of House Judiciary Chairman James Sensenbrenner (R., Wis.). It was yet another border-security measure, intended to thwart illegal immigration by denying drivers' licenses to undocumented aliens. President Bush signed the legislation in hopes that Republicans then would meet him halfway on comprehensive immigration reform. Didn't happen. We now know that the Tom Tancredo "enforcement first" crowd has no intention of ever compromising with Mr. Bush.

We doubt Mexicans willing to risk their lives crossing hundreds of miles of desert on foot care much about not being able to obtain a drivers' license once here. Nor is deputizing Department of Motor Vehicle officials going to force many illegal aliens already in the country to return home. The most likely result is more unlicensed and uninsured motorists, which means more dangerous U.S. roads.

Real ID gets worse. According to a new analysis from the National Governors Association, the National Conference of State Legislatures and the American Association of Motor Vehicle Administrators, the law is also going to be costly and burdensome.

Under Real ID, all 245 million existing holders of drivers' licenses must apply -- in person -- for new, standardized identification cards. The report says that state motor vehicle department staffs will need to be more than doubled, and workers will have to be trained to verify copies of original birth certificates, Social Security cards and the like. Misplaced your Social Security card? Have fun getting a new one. We're pretty sure that voters don't elect Republicans to increase the size of their already bloated state bureaucracies.

And yes, you can expect longer lines at the DMV in the future. "Real ID will reduce efficiencies and increase wait times," according to the report. "Real ID will also effectively reverse state practices designed to ease an applicant's interaction with motor vehicle agencies (e.g., Internet, mail in renewal, over-the-counter issuance)." The deadline for compliance is May 2008. After that, identification from states that don't meet the new national requirements won't be accepted at federal agencies.

Proponents claim that standardizing drivers' licenses is essential to fighting terrorism on the domestic front. Mr. Sensenbrenner has said that Real ID will stop the next Mohamed Atta. But the 9/11 hijackers entered the country legally, which means they qualified for valid drivers' licenses. Nothing in the new law changes that reality, or the fact that you still don't need a driver's license to board a plane. Other forms of ID, such as a passport, will continue to suffice.

All this cost and inconvenience might be acceptable if the law did what its proponents claim. But like a 700-mile fence along a 2,000-mile border, Real ID amounts to one more anti-immigration measure that ignores the economic incentives that draw immigrants here in the first place.

State agencies put the total cost of standardizing drivers' licenses at upwards of $11 billion; Congress has so far appropriated all of $40 million. Again, this is from a Republican Congress that made its first legislation upon taking power in 1995 a bill against imposing "unfunded mandates." It included a pledge not to impose any burden on the states that wasn't fully financed from Washington. Now comes Real ID, transforming state departments of motor vehicles back into everyone's worst nightmare. Some accomplishment.

Google, the internet search giant, has agreed to acquire YouTube, the California-based video start-up, for $1.65bn in an all-stock transaction that will turn the company's 20-something co-founders into instant multi-millionaires.

The deal makes YouTube – which has yet to turn a profit but which has grown into one of the most popular internet destinations with 100m daily video viewings – the first site dedicated to user-generated content to be sold for more than $1bn, setting a new price level for the sector.

"The YouTube team has built an exciting and powerful media platform that complements Google's mission to organise the world's information and make it universally accessible and useful," said Eric Schmidt, Google chief executive. "Our companies share similar values; we both always put our users first and are committed to innovating to improve their experience. Together, we are natural partners to offer a compelling media entertainment service to users, content owners and advertisers."

Google said the start-up would retain separate offices and all its 67 employees.

In spite of YouTube's popularity there have been questions about the sustainability of the company in light of the large amount of illegally copied material viewed on the site and limited advertising revenues to date.

However, YouTube has struck deals with big US media companies to legitimately distribute their video content – three were announced on Monday – reducing the threat of copyright lawsuits.

Chad Hurley, YouTube chief executive, said the acquisition would allow the company to "sharpen our focus" in working with content providers to overcome the copyright issue.

In addition, Google's technical expertise and clout with advertisers could turn YouTube into a highly profitable venture, especially as advertisers increasingly look to target the young audience which is spending less time watching television and more time watching videos on sites such as YouTube.

"Large advertisers are looking to spend more money with Google," said Ben Schachter, analyst at UBS. "Video is a major focus, and YouTube increases [Google's] inventory."

The deal is one of Google's biggest acquisitions in its eight-year history. It marks a tacit admission by Google that the search group's own video site has failed to gain the same traction among its audience as YouTube.

"When we looked at the marketplace, there was a clear winner in [the] networking and social networking side of video," said Mr Schmidt.

The deal follows the acquisition last year by Rupert Murdoch's News Corp of MySpace.com, the social networking site, for $580m in cash, at the time considered a hefty price for a media start-up but now widely regarded as having been a good investment in order to tap the online youth audience.

Facebook, another social networking site which has also grown hugely in terms of its online audience, has also had talks with media and internet companies about a possible acquisition.

YouTube signed deals on Monday to offer music videos from Vivendi's Universal Music Group and Sony BMG Music Entertainment, as well as television content from CBS, sharing any related advertising revenue.

YouTube has had acquisition talks with a number of media companies. A deal would make Mr Hurley and Steve Chen, its other co-founder, multi-millionaires.

Google, YouTube To Join Web Forces (WT)

By Kara Rowland

The Washington Times, October 10, 2006

Internet search behemoth Google Inc. said yesterday it would buy online video leader YouTube Inc. for $1.65 billion, vaulting the Mountain View, Calif., company to the forefront of the online video craze.

The much-anticipated deal, announced after the markets closed, confirmed press reports last week that Google, jockeying for a bigger slice of the online video business, was set on buying the 19-month-old YouTube.

"This is the next step in the evolution of the Internet," Eric Schmidt, chief executive officer of Google, told analysts and reporters on a conference call yesterday.

Mr. Schmidt and YouTube executives touted the potential of Google's search technology and advertising model combined with the loyal online community of YouTube, which receives 100 million video views per day.

DOJ_NMG_0077032

"Right now, we're in the middle of a shift in digital media entertainment," said Chad Hurley, chief executive officer and co-founder of YouTube. "Users are now in control of what they watch and when they want to watch it. They decide what rises to the top. By joining forces with Google, we'll be able to sharpen our focus on that vision."

Both companies have received corporate approvals for the deal, which they expect to close in the fourth quarter. Under the transaction, YouTube will retain its brand and continue to operate independently, officials said on the call.

In terms of market share, YouTube is the clear leader over Google's competing service: Last month, the video service posted a share of visits four times greater than Google Video, according to Hitwise, a New York Internet market research firm. YouTube ranked first in online video services with a share of 45.97 percent, ahead of MySpace Videos at 21.17 percent. Google Video came in third at 11.01 percent.

"This is an extremely volatile space when you consider the fact that YouTube didn't even exist a year ago in terms of having a launched service," said Bill Tancer, general manager of global research at Hitwise.

Mr. Schmidt stressed that Google Video will continue to exist, noting that it will become "even more integrated with Google overall."

Mr. Hurley, who in previous reports had said YouTube was not for sale, said the Google deal was the right fit.

"Those comments were made because we wanted to remain independent and continue on our mission to build great products for users," he said. "By working with Google, that's still the case."

YouTube, which just 20 months ago was running on credit-card debt, will keep its headquarters in San Bruno, Calif. All 67 employees will remain with the company.

Executives said it is too early to tell how the integration will take place and how user experiences might change.

"There's no shortage of projects in the weeks ahead," said Steve Chen, co-founder of YouTube.

Both companies stressed their dedication to protecting copyrights in response to analysts' concerns over potential lawsuits that could result as users incorporate copyrighted content into their creations.

By next month, YouTube plans to roll out new audio fingerprinting and search mechanisms to identify and protect copyrighted content, Mr. Chen said.

Dmitry Shapiro, chief executive officer and founder of Veoh Networks Inc. in La Jolla, Calif., said the Google-YouTube deal paves the way for thousands of similar peer-to-peer video-sharing sites.

YouTube "is much more than another Web site that shares video; what we're all trying to do is reinvent television broadcasting," said Mr. Shapiro, calling his company, which focuses on delivering longer, TV-grade content to viewers, "the next thing after YouTube."

"I think that traditional media companies very much understand that the world is changing right in front of their eyes and that they need to jump in and make some decisions and play or be disenfranchised."

The acquisition comes on the heels of announcements yesterday morning that both Google and YouTube are teaming up with major music labels to distribute music videos online and share in the advertising revenue.

Google inked deals with Warner Music Group Corp. and Sony BMG Music Entertainment, while YouTube teamed up with Universal Music Group, as well as Sony BMG.

YouTube also announced a partnership with CBS Corp. to air clips from popular shows such as "Survivor," "CSI" and "Late Show With David Letterman."

The companies described the new media partnerships as mutually beneficial to content producers, who can compensate artists and better enforce copyright protections, and video service providers, who can use the additional content to attract more viewers.

Users will be able to access streaming content and incorporate it into their own videos. In addition, Google Video will make Warner Music Group's content available for purchase at $1.99 per download.

Google Looks To Boost Ads With YouTube (WSJ)

By Kevin J. Delaney

The Wall Street Journal, October 10, 2006

With its $1.65 billion agreement to acquire YouTube Inc., Google Inc. may be able to broaden its online-advertising business and boost its video offerings to meet the rapidly changing viewing habits of consumers.

The all-stock purchase announced yesterday of closely held YouTube, a 19-month-old, San Bruno, Calif., startup with 67 employees, highlights users' growing consumption of video online and the booming sales of Web advertising. The hefty price tag also reflects the interest of other media and technology companies in acquiring YouTube as a way to jump-start their online-video efforts.

DOJ_NMG_0077033

The deal -- the largest in Google's eight-year history -- marries Google's massive collection of computers, data lines and systems for serving up online ads from hundreds of thousands of advertisers with YouTube's leading position in playing videos for users on the Web. It could transform Google, of Mountain View, Calif., into a bigger power broker for the distribution of video online, following the mixed track record of its own online-video efforts. YouTube has said that consumers view videos through its service, ranging from homemade videos to movie clips, more than 100 million times daily.

"This is going to allow us to continue to develop features for our community and our partners, allow us to sharpen our focus," said YouTube Chief Executive Chad Hurley in an interview. "We'll be able to leverage the technology and resources of Google to supercharge our efforts in those areas."

The acquisition could also boost Google's ambitions to significantly broaden its ad-brokering activities beyond simple text ads on Web pages to larger amounts of video advertising online. The Web-search company places ads, often targeted by specific keywords such as "Chicago hotel," on its own and partner sites using an automated online system and has said it intends to also broker ads in radio, print media and television.

"We believe the combination of Google and YouTube will create this very new and interesting global media platform for users, content providers and advertisers all around the world," said Google CEO Eric Schmidt during a conference call announcing the deal.

The sale is a huge windfall for YouTube, which Mr. Hurley, 29, founded in Feb. 2005 in his garage along with chief technology officer Steve Chen, 28, and another former colleague from eBay Inc.'s PayPal electronic-payment unit. Mr. Hurley had said in a June interview that an initial public offering in the future was a possibility. But the offer from Google was attractive enough to lead YouTube to abandon that interest.

Some analysts raised questions about YouTube's price tag. Critics said Google could be exposing itself to liability for copyright violations, since videos posted by users without permission of content owners are available through YouTube's site. The start-up already faces one lawsuit related to this issue. YouTube has been racing to sign deals with media and entertainment companies to license their content and head off any additional litigation, generally agreeing to share online ad revenue with the content owners. "The YouTube commitment to enforcing copyrights is very consistent with Google's," said David Drummond, Google's senior vice president of corporate development. Mr. Drummond said the two companies remove any infringing content when notified by a copyright holder.

In a prelude to the acquisition announcement, YouTube early Monday announced agreements with Vivendi SA's Universal Music Group and Sony Corp. and Bertelsmann AG joint venture Sony BMG to make their music videos available through YouTube and to allow consumers to use music from the two companies as soundtracks for their own videos on YouTube. The video site also signed a content and ad-revenue-sharing agreement with CBS Corp. related to video from CBS Television Network, Showtime Networks Inc. and CSTV Networks Inc. Google separately announced agreements with Warner Music Group Corp. and Sony BMG to make music videos and other content available for free through its video service and on partner sites.

YouTube's deal with Universal Music is particularly significant since Universal Music Chief Executive Doug Morris told investors last month that YouTube violates copyright laws by allowing users to post music videos and other content. Universal Music has considered taking legal action against YouTube over that issue, say people familiar with the matter.

Yahoo Inc., News Corp. and Microsoft Corp. were among the other companies that expressed interest in acquiring YouTube, say people familiar with the matter. YouTube had earlier passed on a lower offer from Google and held acquisition discussions with Yahoo, which tendered an offer in recent weeks, say people familiar with the matter. Yahoo's offer, valid for 24-hours, expired amid its concerns about copyright- and revenue-related issues though talks continued after the expiration, one of the people says.

A Microsoft spokeswoman said the company "evaluated acquiring this type of technology several months ago" but decided to build its own service, a test version of which opened recently.

Meanwhile, Google significantly increased its offer and deal talks between the two gathered intensity late Tuesday, when Google's Mr. Drummond and YouTube Chief Financial Officer Gideon Yu drafted a term sheet, a person familiar with the matter says. In parallel, the two companies worked to complete content and ad-revenue-sharing partnerships with the major music companies and CBS Corp. that were announced yesterday morning.

News Corp. sniffed around YouTube as recently as last week, but never made a firm offer because the start-up said it was not for sale, say people familiar with the matter. On Friday, when the news of the Google negotiations surfaced, News Corp. sent a letter to YouTube asking for an opportunity to participate in the sale process, according to the familiar people. YouTube didn't respond, these people said. Behind the scenes, Google's deal to purchase YouTube is threatening to create a rift between Google and News Corp., which jointly made headlines in August with an ad-brokering deal under which Google guaranteed revenue of $900 million over three and a half years to News Corp. for its MySpace social-networking service and other sites.

Over the weekend, News Corp. executives expressed their displeasure with the deal to Google and threatened to remove any links to YouTube videos placed by users on their MySpace blog pages, according to a person close to the situation. Google's Mr. Schmidt and Advertising Sales Vice President Tim Armstrong are scheduled to meet this week in Los Angeles with News Corp. Chairman Rupert Murdoch, President Peter Chernin and Ross Levinsohn, head of its Fox Interactive Media online unit, to discuss the matter.

News Corp. earlier this year held discussions with NBC Universal and Viacom about jointly building a YouTube rival, according to people familiar with the situation. The three media companies discussed putting their television videos on a new site, but ultimately the talks foundered, these people say. This month, News Corp. announced it would put video clips from its Fox television shows up on MySpace.

YouTube's sale could represent a significant financial gain for venture capital firm Sequoia Capital, which has provided funding to the start-up. Sequoia holds roughly 30% of YouTube, says a person familiar with the matter. Under the sale agreement, YouTube will retain some independence, keeping its brand, offices and management. Google will also continue to operate its separate Google Video service.

Google Cues Up With YouTube (USAT)

By Jefferson Graham

USA Today, October 10, 2006

Internet search giant Google on Monday snapped up red-hot video-sharing website YouTube for $1.65 billion in an all-stock deal.

Video "is the next step in the evolution of the Internet," Google CEO Eric Schmidt told news reporters in a conference call.

YouTube, which launched in 2005, has grown overnight into the Internet's most popular place to watch videos, showing 100 million daily. Yet, along the way it became a hotbed for copyright infringement, with many contributors posting videos of TV shows or using copyrighted songs in homegrown productions.

YouTube, in clearing the way for a deal, announced an alliance with record label Universal Music — one of the site's harshest critics — that called for a filtering system that would automatically weed out videos with its songs.

By aligning with Google, YouTube now has the resources to build an even stronger filtering system that would please all content owners, said Chad Hurley, 29, one of YouTube's co-founders.

Google said YouTube will remain independent, with a separate website. Google will continue to run its own Google Video site, which also features homemade videos and professional content from networks and movie studios.

Where visitors will see change is in Google searches: Videos from YouTube will begin appearing in search results.

The addition of YouTube videos brings "a humongous amount of content that will be searchable" on Google, says John Battelle, who runs the Searchblog website. That makes Google that much more valuable, he says, because it can profit with more advertising from YouTube videos.

Google reported $6.1 billion in revenue last year, virtually all from little text-based ads that appear near search results. It's been on a tear this year, trying to expand into video advertising and creating recent alliances with MTV Networks and MySpace.

Now, says Scott Kessler, an analyst at research firm Standard & Poor's, Google is "far and away the leader in video advertising."

Investors applauded Google's deal. Shares in the company rose $2.75 in after-hours trading after closing at $429, up $8.50 a share, in regular trading.

In less than a year, YouTube in San Bruno, Calif., quickly became a social phenomenon as a way for users to easily share — and discuss — homegrown videos. It has seen a 2,500% increase in its audience base, according to measurement firm ComScore Media Metrix.

The site had 72 million visitors in August, up from just 2.8 million visitors a year before. It's now the Internet's 14th-most-visited site. Google is No. 3 after Yahoo and MSN.

Google-YouTube Deal Joins Net Search And Video Forces (USAT)

By Kevin Maney

USA Today, October 10, 2006

A landmark in the future of media happened over a meal at Denny's.

Last week, as multiple offers swirled around YouTube, Google co-founder Larry Page and CEO Eric Schmidt met YouTube founders Chad Hurley and Steve Chen at a Silicon Valley Denny's.

"We discussed the possibilities and the excitement we both shared" for video on the Internet, Hurley says. "They have the resources to help us accelerate that."

DOJ_NMG_0077035

Google is buying YouTube for $1.65 billion, the companies said Monday. The biggest force in search and Internet advertising is soaking up the biggest force in online video. But the combination means more than that.

The deal is part of a vision consistent across the technology and media landscape. It's the same vision that brought together YouTube and Google. Mass media — the grand media trend of the 20th century — is becoming personal media.

The Internet is making it possible for people to find and consume any song, TV program, video or movie anytime they want. That's because video content, from instructions on how to groom a poodle to clips from CBS' 60 Minutes, is increasingly available on the Net.

At the same time, cheap technology like video cameras and editing software is allowing just about anyone to create video content, adding ever more personal and esoteric media to the mix of offerings.

If you listen to YouTube's founders or Google's leaders, you can hear what that's going to be like. Search Google for "plumbing toilet flusher" and you'll probably find a how-to video on YouTube. "For queries like that, a lot of times video is the best result," Google's Page says.

Planning a vacation to Osaka, Japan? Search and find all the home videos taken by tourists and posted on the Web. Music videos, news and movie trailers will all be there. A few hours before Google said it will buy YouTube, YouTube announced deals to legally put music videos from Universal and Sony BMG on its site, and news and sports from CBS.

"This is the next step in the evolution of the Internet," Google CEO Schmidt says. On Monday, he kept noting that YouTube founders Chen and Hurley remind him of Google's founders in Google's early days — a couple of guys with a plan to alter the universe.

All of this helps explain an explosion in Internet video. Venture capital investments in video-sharing sites are on track to set a record this year. VCs pumped $156 million into such start-ups during the first half of this year vs. $267 million all of last year, says Dow Jones VentureOne.

Internet video sites have exploded from barely any just one year ago to more than 240. New ones appear every week. The industry hasn't seen anything like it since the Web-retailing zaniness of the mid-to-late-1990s. Recent arrivals include Eefoof, Bix, Guba, Blennus, Stickam and Frozen Hippo.

Big players are crashing the party. In January, Google put up Google Video — which, by the way, isn't going away. "Google video doesn't go away ever — I want to make that clear," Schmidt says. Meanwhile, Yahoo and AOL are aggressively moving into video. So is News Corp.-owned MySpace.

Advertisers in just the past six months have come to love Internet video and are increasingly pushing ad dollars that way.

"You've got more video being viewed on YouTube than you do on some cable channels," says Ian Schafer, CEO of Deep Focus, a marketing firm that represents studios such as The Weinstein Co. He says that the marriage of Google and YouTube could form "another video network that in many ways eclipses the eyeballs of some mass media."

"We are seeing the number of terabytes of video delivered doubling every three months," says Alan Ramadan, a top executive at Macromedia, which makes the Flash player that shows video on both Google and YouTube. "I haven't seen this kind of demand before, and it's something that we all felt the Web could become one day — a distribution platform for rich content and experiences."

At the center of the whirlwind stands YouTube, which actually moved its headquarters over the weekend from San Mateo to San Bruno in California's Silicon Valley — while the founders negotiated the Google deal. "It was a busy weekend," Chen says with a laugh.

The company launched in the summer of 2005, and by March 2006 was the star at high-level tech conference PC Forum. In January of this year, YouTube had 9.5 million unique visitors, according to ComScore. In August, that had grown to 72 million. To those users, YouTube is streaming more than 100 million videos a day. Yes, a day.

"This was a company that was moving very, very quickly," says Mark Heesen, president of the National Venture Capital Association trade group. He compares YouTube's trajectory to Skype, the Internet phone company started in August 2003 and sold to eBay last year for $2.5 billion in cash and stock.

In the past few months, it seems that everyone in technology realized the power of the video trend on the Net and saw the movement toward personal media. That's when the suitors came calling.

"A lot of parties expressed interest," Hurley says. Though he won't name them, Yahoo and News Corp. were among names that surfaced as suitors. "We wanted to remain independent, but as discussions progressed with Google, we saw an opportunity to remain independent and continue our vision, but with a lot more resources and experience behind us."

Google did, in fact, promise to leave YouTube alone — it will keep all its employees, separate headquarters, its own brand.

"I've been pretty giddy over this," Chen says. But he admits that he's not yet sure what, exactly, will change about the way YouTube or Google handles video. Right now, for instance, a search on Google Video will not find a video that's on YouTube. That will change.

"It all happened so quickly, the exact details of integrating the products are still up in the air," Chen says. "We're forming integration teams right now."

For Google, the deal means it now owns the top brand in Internet video and a backup plan for its own push into video. Google Video has failed to catch fire.

Some critics say Google just bought itself a boatload of potential lawsuits. A good deal of video on YouTube is snatched off TV programs and movies by individuals and posted there — and that could be infringing on copyrights. But Google and YouTube both waved that off on Monday, pointing to the day's deals with CBS and record labels as proof that content owners would rather work with YouTube than take it to court.

"The copyright concerns are overblown," says Suranga Chandratillake, CEO of BlinkX, a video search engine that competes with Google Video. "Content owners are more interested in doing business than ever" for Internet video.

They see how powerful this new personal media can be. The rock band OK Go recently proved that. It made a simple video with a handheld video camera of its four members dancing on treadmills and posted the video on YouTube. In four weeks, the video was viewed more than 3.5 million times. As a result, OK Go's album saw a 182% jump on Billboard's Digital Album chart and shipped another 50,000 CDs.

"This is a paradigm smasher of the first order," says OK Go manager Jamie Lincoln Kitman.

In the grand scheme of things, the $1.65 billion Google is paying for YouTube doesn't rank high among the largest U.S. buyouts so far this year, tracker Dealogic says. The biggest was a deal in March by AT&T to buy BellSouth, valued at $67 billion at the time. Alcatel agreed to pay $13.4 billion for Lucent in April.

But when it comes to shaping the future, a couple billion dollars negotiated under Denny's fluorescent lights might be the winner.

Google Buys Video-Sharing Site YouTube (LAT)

By Jesus Sanchez

The Los Angeles Times, October 10, 2006

Google Inc. today agreed to purchase YouTube Inc. for $1.65 billion in stock in a deal that will combine the Internet's largest search engine and its most popular site to watch video.

The transaction, which had been widely expected, comes after YouTube's owners had fielded proposals from such media giants as Viacom Inc. and News Corp. Those suitors and others wanted to capitalize on the company's fast growing website, where visitors view an estimated 100 million videos a day

"By joining forces with Google, we can benefit from its global reach and technology leadership to deliver a more comprehensive entertainment experience for our users and to create new opportunities for our partners," said YouTube Chief Executive Officer and co-founder Chad Hurley in a statement.

Mountain View-based Google said that YouTube would continue to operate as a separate company and retain all employees. The acquisition is scheduled to be completed by year's end.

"The YouTube team has built an exciting and powerful media platform that complements Google's mission to organize the world's information and make it universally accessible and useful," said Eric Schmidt, chief executive officer of Google, in a statement.

In addition to attracting hoards of viewers, YouTube has also drawn threats of lawsuits from music labels and TV studios for not adequately blocking copyrighted works. Meanwhile, the 60-person start-up is struggling to make enough money to offset its bandwidth costs.

The deal marks the first time Google, which prefers to fill in its product line with small acquisitions, has bought a technology company that makes a competing — and more successful — product.

It also would be a major acknowledgment by Google that its own video service, launched in January, failed to keep pace with the San Mateo, Calif.-based upstart, founded by Hurley and Steve Chen.

YouTube received 46% of all visits to online video websites in September, compared with 11% for Google, according to Hitwise, a market research firm.

Observers said Google could give YouTube the advertising connections, technology team and legitimacy it needed to dominate the video-sharing business in much the same way that social-networking site MySpace blossomed into an Internet heavyweight since it joined News Corp. last year.

YouTube is experimenting with ways to make money, including charging advertisers to feature videos on its home page, and to create branded channels for the content.

Also, Warner Music Group Inc. agreed to license its entire catalog of music and videos to YouTube in exchange for a cut of any revenue from advertising or sponsorships sold around its music.

Google Gambles On Web Video (WP)

By Sara Kehaulani Goo

The Washington Post, October 10, 2006

Google said yesterday that it will acquire Internet video phenomenon YouTube for $1.65 billion in stock, a deal that leaves the search giant betting on the future of online video as well as tackling some of the risks that come with managing a site built by a homegrown audience.

The deal, which Google called "the next step in the evolution of the Internet," is reminiscent of the late 1990s, when Web companies judged their success by the buzz they created more than by immediate profits. This time, YouTube, an as-yet-unprofitable Silicon Valley start-up with two founders in their twenties, grew a huge audience at a pace outdone only by MySpace.com.

In less than a year, YouTube attracted more than 72 million unique monthly visitors by allowing users to share short homemade video clips. Through word of mouth, the site became an instant Internet phenomenon, providing a huge library of entertaining videos and giving a voice to budding Internet stars every week.

"There's a new class of sites that have really developed very quickly, are very successful and very attractive to users and are obviously delivering value," Sergey Brin, a Google co-founder, said in a conference call. "It's kind of a next generation of Internet sites and companies. . . . It's a whole new ecosystem, and we're excited to be a part of it."

Behind the buzz of the high-priced deal come a number of gambles, including a large amount of copyrighted material on the site that attracted both viewers who shared the videos and lawyers who cried foul on behalf of the copyright holders. Clips of popular shows such as "South Park," "The Daily Show with Jon Stewart" and "Laguna Beach" can be found on the site.

Also a factor is the fickleness of YouTube's online audience, which could migrate elsewhere or become turned off by the large amount of corporate advertising making its way onto the site. A year after online star MySpace.com, a social networking site, was acquired by News Corp. for $580 million, the core audience has shifted from teenagers to people in their thirties.

"The game back in the 1990s to 2001 was to attract as many eyeballs as possible. That hasn't changed," said Tim Bajarin, a longtime technology consultant and futurist with Creative Strategies. "The big difference today is the social network. One of the most powerful methods for spreading information is word of mouth, and the incredible explosion of that use, from spreading information and inviting people, especially within this young age group, is one huge difference."

Several analysts said they were surprised by the nature and price of YouTube's sale, which equates to about $22 per visitor, according to senior analyst Brian Haven of Forrester Research. That's a substantial jump from the roughly $10 per visitor in the MySpace acquisition. College-oriented networking site Facebook, which has about 14.7 million visitors monthly, has been said to be in acquisition talks with Yahoo for $1 billion -- about $67 per visitor.

Haven judged the YouTube price to be "a little high," but said "online video is really exploding. There's a lot of profit for it in the future."

Some analysts had cautioned Google not to purchase YouTube out of concern that online audiences could shift if they didn't like how a site was evolving. Earlier this year, several thousand members of social networking site Tribe.net left to start another site in protest of new restrictions put in place by new management.

"We would be cautions about [Google] paying up to buy a hot video site like Youtube.com because hot sites may fetch bubble-like valuations, and what is a fad today may be forgotten by next year," wrote Guzman & Co. analyst Phil Remek in a research note earlier this year.

After MySpace was acquired by News Corp., the Web site attracted more media companies, music labels and movie studios, which built their own pages as members of the group. But that gave the site a more corporate feel. Before the acquisition, teenagers made up 25 percent of the membership. Today, only 12 percent of the site's members are teens, according to ComScore Networks Inc.

Today, people over age 35 dominate, making up 40 percent of the membership. Overall, MySpace has gained 34 million members in the past year, according to ComScore.

MySpace "got a lot more people in the older age bracket, but not at the expense of losing people in the younger bracket. The buying power of the older people probably exceeds the younger people, so for advertisers, it's a positive," said Gian Fulgoni, chairman of ComScore. "It might turn out that News Corp. got a heck of a deal."

Google said it planned to keep YouTube separate from its own video site, though it would leverage Google search and other technology to enhance YouTube. Google declined to answer questions about how quickly it expected to earn profit from YouTube.

YouTube has received $11.5 million in venture funding from Sequoia Capital and is estimated to be spending at least $2 million monthly to operate the content-rich site. Sequoia owns roughly 30 percent of YouTube, according to the Associated Press. Google also will inherit a copyright-infringement lawsuit filed against YouTube by a journalist who operates the Los Angeles News Service. YouTube has been able to prevent more lawsuits by negotiating with media companies to provide their content on the site in revenue-sharing deals. So far, the site has announced deals with NBC Universal and Warner Music Group. Yesterday, deals were announced with Sony BMG, CBS and Universal Music Group.

Greg Kostello, a former executive at Mp3.com, which was sued for copyright infringement over its music content years ago, said YouTube has not been hit by more lawsuits because it has had few assets. "If you sue them [before they are acquired], you're not going to get much," Kostello said.

YouTube said yesterday that it is developing a technology that will scan keywords and audio in the uploaded clips for potential copyright infringements. YouTube and Google left open the possibility that the site could become more commercial. YouTube chief executive Chad Hurley said he planned to introduce new advertising platforms and ways to integrate search and advertising technologies into the video clips. But he was noncommittal when asked if he would allow "pre-roll" advertisements to run before certain videos begin playing, a move counter to YouTube's current policy.

"We're going to be exploring a lot of options," he said. Google's advertising technologies "present a good experience that benefits our users' experience and helps partners monetize their content."

But it could also upset members, who react when they feel that the site is heading in the wrong direction, such as what happened when rapper and hip-hop mogul Sean "P. Diddy" Combs was featured in a video.

Shortly after, member Lisa Donovan created her own video that mimicked the rap star's video clip.

"YouTube is very much a community. There's a community voice, and there's a group of people very protective of their space. They were turned off by P. Diddy. It was so apparent they were just being advertised to," Donovan said. "That's what you expect on TV."

Like it or not, though, this sort of site is attractive to larger companies.

For Google, the YouTube acquisition boosts its traction in the online video space, where it hasn't had much success. Google's own video site has consistently lagged behind YouTube. With more than 100 million videos being viewed on YouTube daily, it attracts about four times more traffic than Google Video, according to Hitwise.

Google To Acquire YouTube For $1.65 Billion (NYT)

By ANDREW ROSS SORKIN And JEREMY W. PETERS

The New York Times, October 9, 2006

Google announced this afternoon that it would buy YouTube, the popular video-sharing Web site, for stock that it valued at $1.65 billion.

Google beat out a number of other YouTube suitors, including Microsoft, Viacom, Yahoo and the News Corporation. By successfully negotiating the deal, Google has once again proved that it is the Internet's dominant player.

Under the terms of the deal, YouTube will retain much of its identity and will keep its name and its office in San Bruno, Calif., more than 25 miles from Google's headquarters in Mountain View.

Chad Hurley, YouTube's co-founder and chief executive, has repeatedly said he would prefer for his company to remain independent. Asked about such comments in a conference call with Wall Street analysts and investors held late this afternoon, Mr. Hurley said his company did want to stay independent, adding that "by working with Google, that's still the case."

Steve Chen, also a YouTube co-founder, said, "It is hard for me to imagine a better fit for two companies," both in terms of technology and company culture.

The rise of YouTube has been meteoric. The Internet start-up has been in operation for less than a year, yet it already has an estimated 50 million users worldwide.

The acquisition of the privately held YouTube will enable Google to thrive in one area of the Internet where it has so far failed to gain footing. According to Hitwise, which monitors Web traffic, has the lion's share of online video traffic. YouTube has a 46 percent share, MySpace has 23 percent and Google Video has 10 percent.

The deal will also greatly benefit YouTube, which would have Google's vast resources to help it navigate some sticky legal issues. Copyrighted videos often find their way onto YouTube's pages despite efforts by the site to prevent it. YouTube could also benefit from a Google alliance as it tries to develop new software to prevent copyright infringement.

These copyright issues have led some in the technology industry to compare YouTube to Napster, the song file-sharing service that eventually had to shut down after a protracted legal fight with the recording industry.

Earlier today, YouTube signed three separate deals that should provide some legal protection from copyright infringement claims. One of the deals will allow YouTube to broadcast CBS programming. In addition, YouTube reached agreements with the Universal Music Group and Sony BMG Music Entertainment that will allow it to broadcast music videos.

DOJ_NMG_0077039

YouTube, Google and Napster all share one common thread: a bootstraps success story of young technology buffs who started with nothing. Mr. Hurley and Mr. Chen started YouTube after the two struggled to share videos of a dinner party in January 2005. Still in their 20's and working from a garage, the two secured $3.5 million in capital from Sequoia Capital, the same firm that helped finance Google when it was still a fledgling company, as well as other Silicon Valley stars like Apple, Cisco, Oracle and Yahoo.

The YouTube deal represents a significant payday for Sequoia Capital, one of Silicon Valley's most successful venture capital firms. Sequoia invested a total of $11.5 million in two separate rounds and was the only venture firm to invest in the company.

Sequoia's stake in YouTube has been estimated at approximately 30 percent, which means it would be worth about $495 million based on the acquisition price.

Experts say Sequoia's go-it-alone investment in YouTube represents the kind of aggressive move for which Sequoia is known. A more typical, and safer, approach would have been to bring in other investors, especially for an early stage investment in a company at risk of becoming the target of costly lawsuits.

"They had an absurdly high level of confidence with what they were doing," said Paul Kedrosky, a venture capitalist and author of the blog Infectious Greed.

The fact that a Sequoia partner, Michael Moritz, sits on the board of Google, while his colleague, Roelof Botha, led the investment in YouTube, could have given Google more insights, and therefore, more confidence, into the legal risks associated with YouTube, Mr. Kedrosky said.

Google has experienced explosive growth in recent years, and in the past two years the value of its stock has more than quadrupled. Today, Google's shares gained $8.50, or 2 percent, to close at $429 following news reports about a deal with YouTube. The deal was announced after the stock market closed.

Google's most recent earnings report showed that the company's second-quarter profits more than doubled from a year earlier. Its employee base has grown by about a fifth during the first half of the year.<NYT_AUTHOR_ID>

Ready For Its Close-Up (NYT)

The New York Times, October 10, 2006

Even by the standards of the online world, YouTube has been something of an overnight sensation, spreading like a gale-driven wildfire almost from the moment it officially debuted last December. The Web site cracked the code for successful video on the Internet when it chose an egalitarian approach, putting the ease of posting and viewing short videos ahead of slick design and ultra-high resolution.

That course paid off. Now YouTube shows more than 100 million clips each day, a figure enticing enough that Google announced yesterday that it would buy the upstart company for $1.65 billion.

While it may be one of the most popular sites on the Internet, YouTube is not without detractors. The company has yet to turn a profit and could face significant legal challenges. It has often been likened to Napster, which was shut down by a federal court ruling in 2001 as an illegal file-swapping service.

But comparisons to the early days of music piracy are off the mark. Much of what is on the site is user-generated material, posted by pranksters and budding auteurs, politicians and video diarists seeking attention rather than money. YouTube has been working with professional content providers from the very beginning, however fitfully it may appear at times. In the site's first few months, publicity-seeking corporate marketing teams would post clips that were sometimes followed by cease-and-desist letters about the very same content from those companies' legal departments.

The 10th-most-viewed video in the site's history is "Ronaldinho: Touch of Gold," a Nike commercial featuring fancy footwork by the Brazilian soccer star. Consumers have watched it on YouTube more than seven million times. Many companies see potential and are lining up to work with the site, rather than begging a court to shut it down. Yesterday, YouTube announced deals with CBS, Sony BMG Music Entertainment and Universal Music Group.

For Google, acquiring YouTube is hardly risk-free. The posting of videos by Iraqi insurgents and recent scuffles over charges of censorship demonstrate the complexity of running a site where anyone in the world can post a video. But those are the kinds of problems a business wants to have. They signal that a critical mass of people is tuned in.

Private-Equity Firms Face Anticompetitive Probe (WSJ)

By Dennis K. Berman And Henny Sender

The Wall Street Journal, October 10, 2006

U.S.'s Informal Inquiries Have Gone to Major Players Such as KKR, Silver Lake

The Department of Justice has begun an inquiry into potentially anticompetitive behavior among some of the world's leading private-equity funds, according to people familiar with the matter.

In recent weeks, Justice Department officials have sent out a series of letters to a number of the industry's most well-known players including Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. and Silver Lake Partners but likely not limited to those firms.

These informal requests have asked for a range of information and documents related to deals and business practices, according to three people briefed on their contents, and ask about company auctions staged since 2003.

The Justice Department doesn't explicitly state a purpose for its requests, but those briefed on the matter describe the letters as expressing interest in matters broadly related to anticompetitive behavior.

It is unclear exactly who may be the subject of any inquiry, or whether any Justice Department action will develop from the information requests. A KKR spokeswoman and a Silver Lake spokesman declined to comment. A Justice Department spokesman also declined to comment.

The letters, from the New York regional office of the Justice Department, nonetheless put the clubby world of top-tier private-equity firms on notice that government officials are closely watching how they put together their transactions. And they come at a time when these funds -- which gather capital from institutions, pension plans, and state investment pools -- are on an historic buying spree for some of the country's corporate icons. In recent months, private-equity buyers have announced plans to purchase hospital operator HCA Inc., Hispanic broadcasting power Univision Communications Inc., and pipeline operator Kinder Morgan Inc.

For private-equity players, their daily battlefield is one of both fervent competition and cooperation-by-necessity.

At times the firms are avidly jostling with one another to gain an advantage in an auction. At other moments they are cooperating in "club" deals in which they combine their capital and know-how to pursue a given target.

A set of polite rules has largely applied to this dynamic. For instance, once a private-equity firm signs a definitive merger agreement with a target, competing buyout groups have shied from "jumping" the transaction with a competing bid.

The formation of the "clubs" -- which have drawn as many as seven members into one bidding team -- may at least theoretically depress prices because they limit the number of competing players in an auction.

Indeed, often these competitive auctions can have surprise endings as bidders who submitted a losing offer later join the winning group.

But the heads of private-equity firms say that such dynamics aren't evidence of collusion so much as the desire to share the risks with people who have already studied the business.

And at the heart of any inquiry into anticompetitive behavior is the nature of information -- how it is used, shared, and traded among a group of players.

If competing bidders were sharing information about their bids, for instance, or agreeing that the losers would later be invited to join in the winning group, that might represent suspect behavior, as it would artificially suppress prices that companies would fetch at auction.

"The issue of anticompetitiveness is a live one. It is easy to wonder about whether auctions can be collusive," says Josh Lerner, a professor at Harvard Business School who focuses on the private-equity firms. "So much is a repeat game. There are bitter confrontations but then they do deals with each other again and that softens things."

It is nonetheless difficult to define what exactly collusive behavior means, let alone prove it in a world where a dozen top firms constantly are battling with one another.

Executives at private-equity firms say it is hard to imagine that there would be something as overt as an exchange of promises not to compete on respective deals. At the same time though, many are aware that one of the reasons the fabled KKR deal for RJR Nabisco wasn't so lucrative in the end was that undisciplined bidding drove up the price and say that they have absorbed the lesson, which is to exercise restraint in the bidding process.

"The buyout business has always been competitive," said Steve Pagliuca, a senior executive at Bain Capital, at a recent conference. "It is just that now it isn't one on one but team versus teams."

If anything, private-equity executives say, the implicit gentleman's code is coming under pressure as firms jockey to lead the next big transaction. Such was the case for Freescale Semiconductor Inc., which signed a $17.7 billion deal with KKR, Silver Lake and Bain Capital. A rival group from Blackstone was close to mounting its own offer but ultimately backed away.

Is that a sign of anticompetitive behavior? Most private-equity executives would say not. "It has been civil and I expect it to remain so." said David Rubenstein, co-founder of Carlyle Group in a recent speech.

Two Quit BA Amid Price-fixing Probe (FT)

DOJ_NMG_0077041

By Kevin Done, Aerospace Correspondent

Financial Times, October 10, 2006

Martin George, commercial director of British Airways, resigned on Monday after admitting that "inappropriate conversations" had taken place in his department over the setting of fuel surcharges on long-haul air fares.

Iain Burns, BA head of communications, has also resigned.

Both men had been on leave of absence since mid-June, when BA was plunged into a criminal and civil investigation by UK and US competition authorities into alleged price fixing by airlines over the fuel surcharges levied for the last two years on long-haul flights to and from the UK.

Mr George was a member of the BA board and was a candidate last year for the post of BA chief executive, a contest won by Willie Walsh, to replace Sir Rod Eddington.

BA premises were raided by the Office of Fair Trading in early June.

In a letter of resignation to Martin Broughton, BA chairman, Mr George said, "I now recognise that within my department, there may have been inappropriate conversations in violation of company policy in relation to long-haul fuel surcharges. I was not involved in such conversations.

"Although the board of BA has not found, that I have behaved in a dishonest way, I fully recognise my responsibilities as head of department and as a board director."

Mr George said "I have always taken my responsibilities as a director and board member very seriously and I therefore depart with deep regret, whilst believing that departing is, in these circumstances and for these reasons, nevertheless, the right course."

Robert Boyle, BA director of planning, has been appointed commercial director and Thomas Coops, former communications director at Abbey National has been appointed interim head of corporate and media relations.

In June it emerged that Virgin Atlantic, the UK long-haul airline controlled by Sir Richard Branson, had helped the OFT with information about its rival BA, which helped to trigger the investigation of alleged price fixing by some long-haul airlines operating to and from the UK.

BA has a history of stormy relations with Virgin Atlantic. It is understood that Virgin Atlantic passed information to the OFT about an approach made by a BA executive last year about a possible raising of the fuel surcharge.

BA said on Monday that it had emerged from work done by the airline in response to requests for information made by the regulators that "contacts took place with a competitor in respect of long-haul passenger fuel surcharges in breach of the company's compliance policy."

The airline said that it was continuing to assist the regulators in their investigations.

BA shares were 2 per cent lower at 429½ p in lunchtime trading.

The BA case is the first test that has become publicly known of the OFT's new powers, acquired under the 2002 Enterprise Act, to investigate criminal cartels.

The OFT has civil law powers to impose fines of up to 10 per cent of worldwide sales on companies guilty of price-fixing. Individuals found guilty of criminal cartel charges could face five years in prison or unlimited fines.

The BA surcharges, which have risen in steps to £35 per sector or flight leg on long-haul services (£70 for a return trip), were introduced two years ago in response to the rapid rise in oil prices. Many other airlines made similar moves.

According to legal sources in Washington the June inspection of BA's premises was triggered by documents and testimony uncovered during the separate ongoing global investigation into alleged price-fixing in the air cargo sector, which was launched in February.

The joint action on cargo started by the US Department of Justice and the European Commission against a number of airlines in Asia, Europe and the US has led to multiple class-action lawsuits from US and European freight companies and customers.

Lufthansa, the German national carrier, which triggered the cargo probe by agreeing to co-operate with the DoJ at the end of last year, agreed in September to pay $85m to settle an array of class-action suits pending in the US.

The German flag carrier has also sought leniency from cartel authorities in Europe, the US and elsewhere, and said last month it had received conditional immunity.

British Airways Commercial Director Quits Amid Probe (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Kamil Tchorek And Richard Blackden

Bloomberg, October 10, 2006

Oct. 9 (Bloomberg) -- British Airways Plc, Europe's third- largest airline, said Commercial Director Martin George resigned amid an antitrust investigation of the carrier's fuel-surcharge strategy.

George has been on leave since June, British Airways said in a Regulatory News Service statement today. Iain Burns, the airline's head of communications, also resigned.

``Within my department, there may have been inappropriate conversations in violation of company policy in relation to long haul-fuel surcharges," George said in the statement. ``Although the board of BA have not found that I have behaved in a dishonest way, I fully recognize my responsibilities."

British Airways is under investigation by the U.K.'s Office of Fair Trading and the U.S. Department of Justice for the way the airline priced long-haul passenger fuel surcharges. British Airways profit rose 20 percent to 451 million pounds ($824 million) in the year ended March 31 as the airline added six fuel surcharges since May 2004 to pass higher costs on to customers.

Shares of British Airways fell as much as 8.75 pence, or 2 percent, to 429.5 pence and were 1.9 percent down at 430 pence at 9:41 a.m. in London.

The investigation by the U.K. Office of Fair Trading is ``ongoing" said John Marciano, a spokesman for the U.K. agency. He declined to comment further.

Robert Boyle, British Airways' director of planning, has been appointed commercial director with immediate effect, the airline said. Thomas Coops, previously the communications director at Abbey National Plc, has been appointed interim head of corporate and media relations.

BA Executives Exit Over Long-haul Fuel Surcharges Violation (LONIND)

By James Daley

London Independent (UK), October 10, 2006

Two senior British Airways executives quit yesterday after the airline revealed there had been a breach of its rules during the setting of its long-haul fuel surcharges earlier this year.

Martin George, the company's commercial director and an executive member of the board, resigned with immediate effect, conceding that "inappropriate conversations" may have taken place within his department, which were in breach of company rules. Iain Burns, BA's head of communications, also stepped down with immediate effect.

Mr George, who was paid £375,000 a year, stands to receive 12 months' pay in lieu of notice. Mr Burns is expected to receive six months' pay in lieu of his notice period.

The resignations came three and a half months after the Office of Fair Trading (OFT) and the US Department of Justice raided BA's offices and launched an investigation into allegations of price-fixing in the airline sector.

In particular, the OFT said it was exploring the possibility of collusion during the setting of long-haul fuel surcharges, which several airlines have begun charging over the past two years to compensate for the rapid rise in oil prices. The OFT inquiry is believed to have been prompted by a tip-off from BA's rival Virgin Atlantic.

Mr Burns and Mr George were sent on leave when the inquiry began in June. However, at the time, the BA chairman, Martin Broughton, said he was hopeful that he would have the pair back in their jobs, and the matter cleared up, very shortly.

In a letter to Mr Broughton yesterday, Mr George said it was with great regret he was resigning after 19 years with the company.

"I now recognise that, within my department, there may have been inappropriate conversations in violation of company policy in relation to long-haul fuel surcharges," he wrote. "I was not involved in such conversations. Although the board of BA have not found that I have behaved in a dishonest way, I fully recognise my responsibilities as head of department and as a board director.

"As you know, becoming a board member of British Airways has been the highlight of my career so far. I remain committed to doing what I can in the interests of the airline, to which I have dedicated my last 19 working years. I have always taken my responsibilities as a director and board member very seriously and I therefore depart with deep regret, whilst believing that departing is, in these circumstances and for these reasons, nevertheless, the right course."

Mr George is to be replaced with immediate effect by Robert Boyle, the airline's director of planning. Thomas Coops, a former communications director at Abbey National, will take over from Mr Burns on an interim basis. BA said its priority was to ensure it was abiding by all relevant competition rules, adding it was continuing to assist the regulators with their investigations. It admitted there had been a breach of its internal rules.

Two Top BA Executives Resign Amid Price Probe (AFP-Y)

AFP, October 10, 2006

British Airways has announced that two key executives have resigned amid a probe by British and American authorities into alleged cartel activity over fuel surcharges.

DOJ_NMG_0077043

Martin George, commercial director, and Iain Burns, head of communications, have left their positions with immediate effect, BA said in an official statement to the London Stock Exchange on Monday.

George's resignation letter cited "inappropriate conversations" within his department over fuel surcharges, but noted that the director had not been involved in the discussions.

Both men had been on leave of absence since June when Britain's Office of Fair Trading and the US Department of Justice began an investigation focused on long-haul passenger fuel surcharges.

"It is with regret that I notify you of my decision to step down as Commercial Director of British Airways," George wrote in a letter which was quoted in the BA statement.

He continued: "I now recognise that within my department, there may have been inappropriate conversations in violation of company policy in relation to long haul fuel surcharges. I was not involved in such conversations.

"Although the board of BA have not found that I have behaved in a dishonest way, I fully recognise my responsibilities as Head of Department and as a Board Director."

BA said that Robert Boyle, BA's director of planning, has been appointed George's successor.

Thomas Coops, former communications director at banking group Abbey National, has meanwhile been appointed interim head of corporate and media relations.

BA had announced in June that British and American authorities were investigating the carrier over alleged cartel activity involving it and other airlines.

The Great Plane Robbery? (BBC)

By Nishi Bolakee, BBC Money Programme

BBC.com, October 10, 2006

Some of the world's biggest airlines, including our very own British Airways, stand accused of ripping off consumers in price fixing conspiracies.

BA has been subject to a dawn raid

The Office of Fair Trading in the UK and the Department of Justice in the US have launched investigations into two alleged conspiracies with a series of dawn raids on airline offices.

Competition law bans firms from agreeing prices so that customers benefit from cheaper goods and services as companies compete.

Higher prices for goods

The first alleged conspiracy concerns the prices of surcharges on cargo shipments.

BA, Lufthansa and other major airlines have been accused of agreeing to add some surcharges at exactly the same rate.

The allegations are being investigated by competition authorities throughout the world while American class action lawyers also pursue the airlines in civil suits.

What the air cargo carriers did was raise the prices over and above what they should have been

Michael Hausfeld, class action lawyer at Cohen, Milstein, Hausfeld and Toll

Bruce Simon, of class action lawyers Cotchett, Pitre, Simon, and McCarthy, says "It is simply extraordinary, that all the prices were the same at the same time."

"And of course, one of the allegations is that the prices shouldn't be the same if the operating costs are different for the airlines, and there's no economic reason why it should be that way."

So how does this affect the consumer?

US lawyers suing for compensation reckon that shippers were forced to pay more for exporting their goods leading to higher prices for products in the shops.

Michael Hausfeld, another class action lawyer from the firm Cohen, Milstein, Hausfeld and Toll, says: "They are definitely affecting every consumer literally in most purchases they make. It all goes into the price."

"And, what the air cargo carriers did was raise the prices over and above what they should have been."

Recently, Lufthansa - the German national carrier, agreed to pay $85 million in compensation to shippers to settle with lawyers in the cargo case.

Other airlines may follow suit with similar payments and the total compensation bill could top $1 billion.

Increased cost of flying

The second official investigation involves allegations of price-fixing of surcharges on passenger flights.

BA's offices have been raided, and there is a mystery surrounding BA's old enemy Virgin Atlantic, run by renowned consumer champion Richard Branson, and its role in the affair.

Virgin has increased its chances of going scot free by playing the game smartly

DOJ_NMG_0077044

The allegations relate to passenger fuel surcharges which have risen from £5 return for long haul flights when they were introduced in May 2004, to £70 from April this year.

They were introduced to help the airlines with the rising cost of fuel.

While Virgin's offices have not been raided by official agencies, Richard Branson's company is being sued, along with BA, by class action lawyers in the US who allege that the two companies conspired to fix the price of the surcharges.

Immunity?

"I have nothing to indicate that Mr Branson, was involved or knows anything about the situation

Bruce Simon, class action lawyer at Cotchett, Pitre, Simon, and McCarthy

Virgin is said to have played for advantage in the controversy by blowing the whistle and reporting its old adversary to the UK's Office of Fair Trading.

That could mean that Virgin would qualify for immunity in official legal proceedings.

Some reports suggest Virgin did no more than report an illegal approach by BA although class action lawyers believe it went further.

Bruce Simon is doubtful that Mr Branson had any knowledge of a price fixing scheme and says: "I have nothing to indicate that Mr Branson, was involved or knows anything about the situation.

"Those matters don't have to rise to the level of the board. They don't have to rise to the level of a chief executive officer for them to be implemented."

Meanwhile, BA has suspended the number two in the company, Commercial Director Martin George, and its Director of Communications Iain Burns.

And on Monday BA announced that the two men had resigned.

Virgin is being sued along with BA for price-fixing

The surcharges have hit consumers like Chris and Carolyn Wood, frequent travellers to the US on both Virgin and BA.

Four generations of the Woods, eight people in total, flew to visit relatives in Florida in September.

Chris paid for five members of his family to take this trip. He was shocked to find just how much was added to the price of his tickets to help airlines pay for taxes, airport fees and the rising cost of fuel.

Chris says: "I'd offered to pay for my mother-in-law as a special treat. I found that in terms of just my cost, which was my two boys, my wife, my mother in law, and myself, we'd got an extra seven hundred odd pounds or so".

'Dirty Tricks'

The current row is the latest chapter in a long history of bitter conflict between the two companies.

Jeff Randall, Editor-at-Large of the Daily Telegraph and former BBC Business Editor says: "This is yet another delicious chapter in a saga that's been going on the best part of twenty years."

If airlines are found to be guilty of price fixing then the consequences could be severe.

Pat Treacy, a competition lawyer for law firm Bristows, says "The legal worst case scenario for BA - the very worst thing that could possibly happen to a company under the law, is that it would be fined 10% of its global turnover."

BA's turnover is around £8bn, so the company could be fined £800m.

The class action lawyers are seeking yet more huge sums in compensation for customers whom, they allege, have been overcharged.

The Money Programme report is shown on BBC Two at 10pm on Monday 9 Ocotber.

Sanofi-Aventis Is Said To Be The Mystery Suitor For ImClone, And Icahn's Competitor (NYT)

By Andrew Ross Sorkin And Peter Edmonston

The New York Times, October 10, 2006

The European drug giant Sanofi-Aventis was the mystery bidder for the biotechnology company ImClone Systems last month, people involved in the transaction said yesterday.

Shares of ImClone soared last week after the company announced that Carl C. Icahn, who holds a stake of nearly 14 percent in the company, had scuttled a potential takeover offer of $36 a share from a "major international pharmaceutical company" last month.

The disclosure of a would-be suitor, which ImClone did not identify, became the latest point of contention in an escalating battle between Mr. Icahn and the company. Mr. Icahn said last week that ImClone was worth more than $36 a share "if it is run by competent people."

In trading yesterday, ImClone stock rose just over 1 percent, to $29.90, after Sanofi's identity was reported by DealBook, a Web log published by nytimes.com. ImClone licenses a patent for the cancer drug Erbitux from the Paris-based Sanofi-Aventis, one of the largest drug companies in the world.

Sanofi's interest in ImClone suggested that the company was considering expansion in the United States and might indicate that it would look at other possible targets. The United States accounted for 35 percent of Sanofi's net sales in 2005, according to filings with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Some analysts have said that Sanofi may be interested in Bristol-Myers Squibb, a company that has been seen as a potential takeover target since it ousted its chief executive, Peter R. Dolan, last month. Bristol markets Plavix, a best-selling drug used to fight blood clots, in partnership with Sanofi-Aventis. In a conference call with reporters last month, the chairman of Bristol-Myers, James D. Robinson III, declined to speculate on a possible sale of the company.

In Bristol-Myers, Sanofi or another acquirer would get a significant piece of ImClone. Bristol-Myers is ImClone's largest shareholder, with 17 percent. Bristol sells Erbitux in the United States and pays ImClone a royalty on these sales.

The emergence of Sanofi's interest may also give new life to ImClone's attempts to find a buyer. Earlier this year, ImClone put itself up for sale, but after a six-month search, the company announced in August that it would remain independent.

Calls to representatives of ImClone were not returned yesterday. Calls to Sanofi-Aventis were unsuccessful.

ImClone, meanwhile, continues to do battle with Mr. Icahn, who is known for trying to shake up companies that he thinks are underperforming.

Last month, ImClone shareholders voted Mr. Icahn and two allies onto the company's board. Since then, he has filed a proposal urging shareholders to remove 6 other members of the 12-member board and add one of his nominees.

In a proxy statement, ImClone has urged shareholders to reject Mr. Icahn's proposal, arguing that "a balanced board is better positioned than one dominated by Mr. Icahn."

Volkswagen Urges Scania And MAN To Reach An Amicable Deal (WSJ)

By Jason Singer And Christoph Rauwald And Stephen Power

The Wall Street Journal, October 10, 2006

An attempt to create Europe's largest truck maker through a €9.6 billion ($12.1 billion) acquisition of Scania AB of Sweden by MAN AG of Germany is being thrown back to the drawing board after Volkswagen AG Chief Executive Bernd Pischetsrieder said he wants both sides in the hostile battle to negotiate a new deal.

Mr. Pischetsrieder said in a conference call with analysts and investors that he supports the logic behind the recent hostile bid for Scania by MAN. Volkswagen is the largest shareholder in Scania and last week became the largest shareholder in MAN as well.

However, the Volkswagen CEO said that he wants negotiating teams from both sides to propose a new deal to replace the cash-and-stock bid made by MAN that was rejected by Scania as well as Volkswagen and Swedish investment firm Investor AB, Scania's second-largest shareholder. He suggested the teams take no longer than four weeks to reach a conclusion.

MAN's bid for Scania has drawn some of Europe's largest industrial companies into a bitter feud, where competing interests and rival corporate strategies have clashed. To gain an edge, Volkswagen last week made a surprise purchase of 15.06% of truck and diesel-engine maker MAN.

Mr. Pischetsrieder's conference call was the first time he has outlined his views since Volkswagen became the key shareholder in both the bidder and the target. He said his comments were made as Volkswagen's CEO and not as chairman of Scania, a position he also holds. He said he has recused himself from Scania board meetings because of his conflicting interests. Mr. Pischetsrieder refused to take questions from reporters during the call.

"We need the best solution, and at the end of the day the best solution has to be in the interests of the shareholders," Mr. Pischetsrieder said. "What kind of structure a new company or a merged company would have, I don't want to speculate on."

He declined to rule out a possible reverse bid by Scania to try to take over MAN, something that would allow Volkswagen to retain its super-voting shares in Scania. Mr. Pischetsrieder had said he would like to see the super-voting shares valued more highly than common. MAN's bid values all shares at the same level.

A combined MAN-Scania would be Europe's biggest maker of commercial vehicles by market share and No. 3 globally behind Volvo AB of Sweden and DaimlerChrysler AG of Germany.

Scania's other large shareholder, Investor, said yesterday it saw some industrial logic in a tie-up between the Swedish truck maker and MAN, and it was open to all options when it comes to Scania's future. The Swedish holding company, which is controlled by the Wallenberg family, had said it would support the deal that produces the highest value for its own shareholders.

Just prior to Mr. Pischetsrieder's conference call, MAN said in a statement that it would consider withdrawing its hostile bid in favor of friendly negotiations, if certain conditions were met. Mr. Pischetsrieder welcomed the move and said he wasn't aware of what those conditions were. A MAN spokesman declined to elaborate.

PNC To Buy Mercantile In $6B Deal (USAT/BLOOM)

DOJ_NMG_0077046

By Adrian Cox And Elizabeth Hester

USA Today, October 10, 2006

PNC Financial Services, Pennsylvania's biggest bank, on Monday announced it is buying Mercantile Bankshares for $6 billion, its second acquisition in the Washington metropolitan area.

PNC offered $47.24 a share for Mercantile, valuing the Baltimore-based company 28% above its Friday closing price. Pittsburgh-based PNC will pay $2.13 billion in cash and 52.5 million of its own shares.

Mercantile owns 11 community banks and a mortgage lender with 240 branches in the Mid-Atlantic region, giving PNC more companies and wealthy individuals to serve in a market where the median income is 35% higher than the U.S. average. PNC, which entered Washington last year with the purchase of Riggs National, will become the 10th-largest U.S. bank after adding Mercantile's $17 billion in assets.

PNC "paid a premium for a premium franchise," John McDonald, analyst at Banc of America Securities, wrote in a report to clients. "Mercantile has a strong franchise in an attractive and relatively faster growth footprint."

Mercantile customers have a median income of more than $69,000 a year, 18% higher than PNC's customers, the bank said in a presentation to investors. Population is expected to surge 10% in the next five years in the counties where Mercantile does business, vs. 2.1% for PNC's population base.

Mercantile is "the jewel that fits between our Washington, D.C., franchise and our Philadelphia and Delaware and New Jersey franchise," PNC CEO James Rohr said.

PNC expects the purchase to close in the first quarter of 2007, add to earnings per share in 2008, and generate about $100 million in cost savings.

Mercantile rose $8.16, or 22%, to $44.94 Monday. PNC is giving Mercantile shareholders 0.4184 PNC shares and $16.45 in cash for each share they own. PNC shares fell $3.20 to $70.40.

Mercantile CEO Edward Kelly, who will be a PNC vice chairman after the deal closes, has been expanding the lender in the Mid-Atlantic region. Mercantile agreed to buy Community Bank of Northern Virginia for $212 million in January 2005 and James Monroe Bancorp for $143 million this March.

PNC had a gain of about $1.6 billion from division BlackRock's purchase of Merrill Lynch's money-management unit last month. Rohr said in February that the bank would consider using the money for acquisitions.

The area that encompasses Washington and Arlington, Va., is the eighth-most populous in the USA with 5.28 million residents, and is the third-wealthiest in the nation with a median household income of $76,248. Its population is projected to expand 10.8% from 2005 to 2010, according to U.S. Census estimates, compared with 6.3% for the nation overall.

"PNC recognized that if it was going to jump in deeper into this Washington, D.C., Northern Virginia, Maryland market, it was going to be an expensive market to get into," says Gerard Cassidy, an analyst at RBC Capital Markets. "This is a Neiman Marcus market, not a K-Mart market, and as a result, you've got to pay Neiman Marcus prices, which is what they did here."

PNC Plans To Purchase Baltimore's Mercantile (WP)

By Terence O'hara, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 10, 2006

PNC Financial Services Group Inc. said yesterday it would buy Maryland's largest independent bank, Mercantile Bankshares Corp., in a $6 billion deal that would make PNC the second-largest such institution in the state.

The purchase is Pittsburgh-based PNC's second major acquisition in the mid-Atlantic region. It bought scandal-plagued Riggs Bank for $652 million in May 2005.

Mercantile of Baltimore is the last independent commercial bank of substantial size in either Washington or Baltimore, and it is considered one of Maryland's leading business banks. It has a robust old-line trust business and 240 branches stretching from Hagerstown to Ocean City. "This puts us in some of the most affluent suburbs in Maryland," PNC chief executive James Rohr said.

Mercantile's banks operate under 11 different names in the state, such as Mercantile Potomac Bank in the Washington area, National Bank of Fredericksburg in Spotsylvania County and Fidelity Bank in Western Maryland. All those banks will be converted into PNC branches after the deal closes by March of next year.

The two companies did not say if the merger would result in any job losses as they seek to cut $108 million in overhead expenses. Rohr did say that branch closings would be minimal because there is very little overlap between PNC's existing branches here, mostly old Riggs branches concentrated in the city and close-in areas, and Mercantile's largely suburban and outer-suburban branch network. Rohr said most of the cost savings will be in back-office expenses, such as duplicative software vendor contracts.

PNC is to pay Mercantile shareholders $2.1 billion in cash and about 52.5 million shares of PNC stock, which put the deal value at $47.24 a share, 28 percent higher than the closing price of Mercantile shares Friday. Mercantile stock rose 22 percent yesterday after the deal was announced, to close at $44.94, while PNC shares fell about 3.2 percent, to $70.40.

Friedman, Billings, Ramsey Group bank analyst Gary Townsend issued an "outperform" rating on PNC after the deal was announced, saying that while PNC was "paying a full price" for Mercantile, the long-term promise for the alliance is strong because of the growth prospects in the region. Washington in recent years has been one of the fastest-growing banking markets in the country in terms of the rate at which deposits are increasing and is central to the growth plans of most major East Coast banks that do business here.

Mercantile has long been known as one of the industry's most conservative banks, one that survived relatively untouched by the early 1990s commercial real estate crash and the subsequent decade of mega mergers when all of its main competitors went out of business or were sold to larger regional banks. Its strong base of business customers has made it one of the most consistently profitable banks because it pays less for deposits than many of its peers. Like all banks in the mid-Atlantic, it's biggest source of profit growth has been traditional small business and consumer banking as the region's economy and population boomed in the last 10 years.

"I think at the end of the day it was our retail banking franchise that most interested PNC," said Edward J. Kelly III, who has been chief executive of Mercantile since 2001 and is to become vice chairman of PNC's holding company, PNC Financial Service Group Inc., after the deal is completed in the first quarter of 2007.

Wall Street had been watching PNC closely since its $10 billion deal to sell part of its BlackRock Inc. wealth management unit to Merrill Lynch & Co. That put about $6 billion in cash on PNC's books and analysts expected PNC to go hunting for more mergers in its core banking business. Rohr said yesterday that PNC had wanted a bigger presence in the Washington-Baltimore market since the Riggs deal because the region was growing so fast.

"The BlackRock transaction gave us flexibility," Rohr said. "It's nice when plans come together."

Family Finance Investors Are Wary Of Buyout Offer For Cablevision (WSJ)

By Peter Grant

The Wall Street Journal, October 10, 2006

For New York's powerful Dolan family, the time appears ripe for its $7.9 billion bid to take Cablevision Systems Corp. private: The cable company has been beating most phone companies and satellite-television operators in the battle for video, phone and Internet customers.

That's also why the bid could fail. The Dolans have taken Cablevision shareholders on a financial roller-coaster ride over the years, and some institutional investors say they are reluctant to sell now that the outlook is brightening.

"I'm getting tired of management and private-equity firms trying to steal companies from underneath our noses, and I think this is another example of that," says John Linehan, a portfolio manager at mutual-fund company T. Rowe Price Group Inc., which holds more than two million Cablevision shares. "Shareholders have been asked to sit through a fairly fallow period of time. As things are beginning to look up, a lot of our upside is being taken away from us."

On Sunday, the Dolans -- who control 22.5% of the company's shares and hold 74% of the voting power -- offered $27 a share for all shares outstanding. Some investors contend the company's assets, which include a cable division servicing the New York City region, cable networks like AMC and the New York Knicks basketball team, would be valued at as much as $40 a share if sold separately. Shares closed yesterday at $26.50, up $2.57, or 11%, in 4 p.m. composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange.

After years in the doldrums, the stocks of Cablevision and other cable companies have performed better this year, and some investors predict that the gains will continue. The sector has been held back by investors' concerns about major capital-spending needs, competition from phone companies and new technologies for delivering TV programming over the Internet.

The Dolans have argued that Cablevision would be better off as a private company, which would allow it to make investment decisions without worrying about meeting quarterly earnings expectations. The cable industry sometimes requires large investments that cannot be recouped over the short-term.

In a letter Sunday to the company's board of directors, the Dolans described their offer price as "fair." They noted that it represented an 11.3% premium above Cablevision's 52-week closing high and a 14.9% premium to their unsuccessful 2005 offer for the company's cable division. A spokesman for the Dolans declined to comment further yesterday.

In buyouts and takeovers, investors are always eager to get higher prices, and they sometimes succeed. The fate of the Dolans' offer now rests with a special committee of Cablevision's board that consists of two independent directors, Thomas V. Reifenheiser, a retired banker, and retired Vice Admiral John R. Ryan. That was the same board committee that rejected the

Dolans' earlier buyout offer, and the family has a better sense this time of how to appease them. A Cablevision spokesman said yesterday the two directors were unavailable for comment.

Investor griping about buyouts has intensified this year after the sales of several publicly traded companies generated quick profits for buyers. Earlier this year, for example, Fairmont Hotels & Resorts Inc. was acquired for $3.3 billion by Colony Capital LLC, a Los Angeles investment firm, and Saudi Prince Alwaleed bin Talal's Kingdom Hotels International. Fairmont recently announced the sale of seven hotels, far less than half of its portfolio, to a pension fund for $1.5 billion.

In recent years, the antics of the Dolan family have drawn far more attention than Cablevision's performance. Cablevision Chairman Charles F. Dolan and his son, Chief Executive James L. Dolan, fought openly and bitterly over the fate of Voom, a satellite television unit that the senior Mr. Dolan supported but that his son helped kill. The family also tussled with New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg over a new stadium that was proposed for Manhattan, which would have competed with Cablevision's Madison Square Garden. Recently, the company was drawn into the federal investigation of options backdating, admitting that it gave backdated options to an executive after he died.

Along the way, Bethpage, N.Y.-based Cablevision quietly has become the envy of the cable industry, in part due to the efforts of Chief Operating Officer Thomas Rutledge. He has kept the company focused on the cutting edge of phone and video technology. That has helped Cablevision to add more than 60,000 subscribers, while many rival cable operators were losing subscribers to satellite-TV competitors. The company has signed up about one million Internet-phone-service customers since November 2003, making it the cable-industry leader in grabbing market share, according to analyst Aryeh Bourkoff of UBS AG.

"My clients would like to see the company stay public with Rutledge at the helm," says Mario Gabelli, chief executive of Gabelli Asset Management, one of Cablevision's largest shareholders. If that doesn't happen, he says, he would like other companies to be able to bid against the Dolans. Time Warner Inc.'s cable division, he says, has long been interested. Time Warner declined to comment on the matter.

Some investors think the offer will be accepted by the board committee, noting that it is higher than the buyout offer made by the family in June 2005, when adjusted for the $10-per-share dividend that Cablevision paid earlier this year.

Other investors don't like what they see. The offer, they note, values the company at $19 billion, including debt. The Knicks, the cable-TV networks and additional assets other than the main cable unit are worth as much as $5 billion, they contend. That doesn't include the potential profits from a plan to redevelop Madison Square Garden, which the company is pursuing with Vornado Realty Trust.

That leaves a valuation of about $14 billion for the cable unit, they say, which is less than nine times the unit's earnings before interest, taxes, depreciation, and amortization, or Ebitda, a common metric in the cable industry. By contrast, Comcast Corp., the country's largest cable operator, is trading at more than nine times Ebitda. Many cable analysts contend that Cablevision's systems are more valuable than Comcast's because their average subscribers spend more.

Shares of Cablevision rose sharply yesterday but remained below the offer price, a sign that some investors think the buyout offer will collapse. That's what happened to the family's buyout attempt 20 months ago, after a special committee of directors found the price inadequate.

Cablevision's prospects looked bleaker in the summer of 2002. It was facing a cash crunch stemming from the debt it took on to finance cable-network upgrades, a perennial burden for the cable industry. In a presentation to investors, James Dolan outlined his plan for dealing with the financial problems that some investors criticized as rambling and unconvincing. The stock was trading below $5 a share.

To deal with its liquidity problems, the company laid off thousands of workers and sold noncore assets such as its Bravo cable network. It increased cash flow by steadily adding cable and high-speed Internet subscribers. By mid-2003, Cablevision's stock was over $20 a share.

Mr. Rutledge was one of the architects of the turnaround. He had joined the company in early 2002 after losing out in a struggle over strategy at Time Warner's cable unit, where he was president. He had extensive experience with customer service, network construction and other operational basics.

Cable operators were losing hundreds of thousands of subscribers to satellite TV companies. Mr. Rutledge pushed Cablevision to upgrade its technology. The company stopped using an advanced yet expensive set-top box manufactured by Sony Corp., opting for a more widely used device made by Scientific Atlanta Inc., now a unit of Cisco Systems Inc.

Cablevision increased spending on expensive network upgrades necessary to offer customers digital cable and high-speed Internet connections. "I found it painful personally to lay people off," says Mr. Rutledge. "But we had to manage the capital expenses for upgrades and get new businesses rolled out rapidly."

Verizon Communications Inc. targeted Cablevision's affluent New York City region for its rollout of TV and ultra-high-speed Internet. Last year, after James Dolan got mail from Verizon advertising its broadband speeds, he demanded that Cablevision match it, which it did.

Mr. Rutledge became the face of Cablevision on trade-show panels and on analyst calls, where James Dolan mostly discussed Madison Square Garden. He meets with Mr. Dolan every Monday, he says, to discuss everything from new technology to trimming trees in ways that don't anger homeowners. Together, they devised the "triple play" marketing strategy for selling phone, TV and high-speed Internet service in one package, which has been mimicked by much of the cable industry.

The Dolans had decided in the late 1990s to concentrate on the New York City market and had sold off their systems outside of it. That made it less expensive for the company to introduce new technology because just three distribution points served all its customers. The concentration on one region also made it easier to roll out phone service. Mr. Rutledge says he and the Dolans planned to do this as early as 2002, but were delayed by the wait for advances in Internet technology. The company avoided using traditional circuit-switch technology, which is more expensive.

The new phone service and the triple-play pricing plan, which costs customers $89.95 a month, caught on with customers. More than 20% of the homes reached by Cablevision's networks now take phone service from the cable operator, and most of those take TV and Internet service as well. Marketing experts say it is more difficult for rivals like Verizon to poach subscribers to Cablevision's three-service package than it is for them to steal traditional cable customers.

Mr. Rutledge also helped devise Cablevision's strategy for offering customers a service for recording live TV for later viewing. Most cable companies offered customers devices for their homes. While Cablevision does too, it's been reluctant to embrace that route, because the devices can cost more than $350 each -- a cost that was passed on to customers in the form of monthly fees.

Earlier this year, Cablevision announced a plan to build a recording capability into its network. Households that signed up for the service would be able to record programs without adding any special equipment to their homes.

The strategy raised questions about whether Cablevision would violate copyrights of programmers. Major movie and TV producers have filed suit against Cablevision, which is holding up the launch of the technology.

Glaxo Agrees To Acquire CNS Inc. For $566 Million (Update4) (BLOOM)

By Andrea Gerlin

Bloomberg, October 10, 2006

Oct. 9 (Bloomberg) -- GlaxoSmithKline Plc, Europe's largest drugmaker, agreed to buy CNS Inc. for about $566 million to add Breathe Right nasal strips and FiberChoice dietary supplements to consumer health products including heart-burn reliever Tums.

Glaxo will pay $37.50 a share in cash for the Minneapolis- based company, or 31 percent more than the stock's closing price on Oct. 6, the London-based drugmaker said today in a Regulatory News Service statement. CNS shares jumped to their highest price in almost two decades.

The acquisition expands Glaxo's range of consumer health- care products, which already includes smoking cessation aids Nicoderm CQ and Commit, Panadol pain reliever, Abreva cold-sore treatment, and Aquafresh and Sensodyne toothpastes. Breathe Right products are sold in 27 countries, while FiberChoice supplements are available only in the U.S.

``This outstanding business provides a great global growth opportunity for GSK," John Clarke, president of GSK Consumer Healthcare, said in the statement. ``Its two major brands, Breathe Right and FiberChoice, fit with our growth strategy and are great additions to our portfolio."

Shares Rise

Shares of CNS rose $8.38, or 29 percent, to $36.94 at 12:42 p.m. New York time in Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading. That's the stock's biggest increase in five years and its highest value since 1987. Shares of Glaxo rose 9 pence, or 0.6 percent, to 1454 pence in London.

The acquisition sends a message about Glaxo's intentions, according to analyst Gbola Amusa of Sanford C. Bernstein Ltd. in London.

``There are some people in the market who would like to see Glaxo spin off its consumer health-care division," Amusa said in a telephone interview. ``The signal is that Glaxo is serious about staying in consumer health."

CNS's board began investigating selling the company at the end of last year when it undertook an annual review of strategic options, CNS Chief Executive Officer Marti Morfitt said on a conference call. The board unanimously agreed to recommend approving the transaction to shareholders, Morfitt said.

`Good for Business'

``We believe this merger is good for the business, our stockholders and our customers," Morfitt said. ``We believe this is an excellent opportunity to maximize value for CNS stockholders."

DOJ_NMG_0077050

The purchase is expected to be completed in early 2007, pending approval from CNS's shareholders and U.S. antitrust regulators, Glaxo said. The acquisition will have a neutral impact on earnings next year and a positive effect starting in 2008, Glaxo said.

Glaxo had sales of 21.66 billion pounds ($40.4 billion) in 2005, with almost $5 billion coming from consumer health-care products, according to the company's Web site. CNS had sales of $118.5 million in the 12 months ended June 30, an 18 percent increase from a year earlier, Glaxo said.

``It seems quite an expensive acquisition because they're paying $566 million for a business with sales of around $119 million," Max Herrmann, a health-care analyst at ING Financial Markets in London, said in a telephone interview. ``So they're paying quite a substantial multiple on sales."

GlaxoSmithKline Seeks Approval To Sell Cancer Drug (AP)

AP, October 10, 2006

GlaxoSmithKline PLC said Monday it is seeking regulatory approval to sell its breast cancer drug Tykerb - one of the most promising high earners in its pipeline of new medicines - in Europe.

Glaxo, Europe's largest drug maker, also revealed it has agreed to buy CNS Inc., the U.S.-based manufacturer of Breathe Right nasal strips and FiberChoice fiber supplements, for around $566 million. The company has dual U.S. headquarters in Research Triangle Park, N.C. and Philadelphia.

Glaxo has already lodged an application with the U.S. Food and Drug Administration to approve Tykerb. The FDA last month gave the drug so-called "fast track" status, which may lead to quicker approval.

Glaxo is applying to the European Medicines Agency to market the pill in Europe in combination with Roche Holding AG's chemotherapy treatment Xeloda, for the treatment of advanced breast cancer in women who have received other therapies.

The company said it hopes to launch Tykerb, also known as lapatinib ditosylate, in both markets next year, but declined to comment on its sales prospects. The drug is one of the most promising in Glaxo's pipeline - analysts say it could bring in revenue of more than $1 billion each year.

"A few people have been skeptical about Tykerb because they saw a limited market, but oncologists will vote with their prescribing pen when they see good data," said Mike Ward, an analyst at Nomura Code.

Ward added that the drug's use was likely to widen to earlier stages of breast cancer, increasing its sales prospects.

The findings of an international study on the drug presented earlier this year to the American Society of Clinical Oncology found that it delayed the growth of advanced breast cancer in women who had stopped responding to rival Roche Holding AG's drug Herceptin and were out of treatment options.

Patients who received Tykerb plus the chemotherapy drug Xeloda had no growth of their tumors for 8 1/2 months. That compares to 4 1/2 months for those given only Xeloda, according to the team led by Dr. Charles Geyer Jr. of Allegheny General Hospital in Pittsburgh.

Tykerb is a pill taken daily while Herceptin in given intravenously every month.

Glaxo said that there are more than 360,000 new cases of breast cancer diagnosed every year in Europe.

"We hope that lapatinib (Tykerb) will offer these patients a much needed effective alternative treatment," Paolo Paoletti, senior vice president of Glaxo's oncology medicine development center, said in a statement.

Glaxo said it aims to have filed for approval to sell Tykerb in Australia, Canada and a number of countries in Asia, Latin America and the Middle East by the end of the year.

In a separate announcement on CNS, Glaxo said it will pay $37.50 per share in cash for the company - a premium of 31 percent on CNS' stock price at the close of trade on Friday.

CNS President and Chief Executive Marti Morfitt said Monday the company picked Glaxo after reviewing multiple offers.

"We are a company that's been growing, with a good pipeline of future growth, two strong brands, and I think it is a great fit for what they're doing and what they're building," Morfitt said.

"Their scale and their resources really do create greater opportunity there," Morfitt said.

CNS reported sales of $118.5 million in the 12 months to June 2006, an 18 percent rise over the previous 12 months. About 85 percent of the company's current sales are in the U.S. The company has wanted to expand its sales outside the U.S., and that can happen faster through Glaxo.

Breathe Right-branded products are marketed in 27 countries. FiberChoice fiber supplements are marketed solely in the United States.

Morfitt said it's not yet clear where Minneapolis-based CNS will be based or who the management team will be after the acquisition. CNS employs about 70 people, most of them in Minnesota. The Breathe Right strips are made by a separate company in Tennessee.

DOJ_NMG_0077051

CNS has paid a licensing fee to the inventor of the Breathe Right strips, and that will continue after the sale, she said.

Glaxo said it expects to complete the purchase by early next year, dependent on shareholder approval and antitrust clearance.

"The opportunity for growth through geographic expansion and pipeline innovation make this acquisition an exciting prospect," said John Clarke, the president of GSK Consumer Healthcare.

Glaxo shares rose 1 percent to 14.60 pounds ($27.22) on the London Stock Exchange.

Citigroup Sets Sights On Overseas Banks (FT)

By David Wighton In New York And Peter Thal Larsen In London

Financial Times, October 9, 2006

Chuck Prince, chief executive of Citigroup, is targeting several banks outside the US for acquisitions as he speeds up his plan to reduce the world's biggest financial group's dependence on the slow-growing US market.

He wants to increase the proportion of Citigroup's earnings coming from outside the US from the current 45 per cent to 60 per cent in the next few years.

Citigroup has considered a number of potential deals in recent months, including banks in Taiwan, Turkey, Central America, China and western Europe, and Mr Prince said he was expecting progress before the end of the year.

"The pipeline is filling up nicely," he said in an interview with the Financial Times.

When he became chief executive three years ago, Mr Prince said he wanted to shift Citigroup from its historic reliance on acquisitions under his predecessor, Sandy Weill, to a balance between acquisitions and organic growth.

But a series of regulatory problems resulted in the US Federal Reserve banning the company from doing big deals until it improved its internal controls. That restriction was lifted six months ago.

The Fed ban left Mr Prince dependent on internal growth and he has come under increasing criticism for slower-than-expected returns from Citigroup's stepped-up investment in branch openings and for the relatively sluggish stock price.

Prince Alwaleed bin Talal, the Saudi prince who owns a 4.3 per cent stake in Citigroup worth $10bn, told the Financial Times in July that costs were out of control and called for "draconian" measures to curb expenses.

Sandy Weill, who constructed Citigroup through a series of acquisitions in the 1990s and stepped down as chairman in April, has told friends he agrees with Prince Alwaleed's criticisms. "He says the cost discipline has been lost," one said.

In an interview with the FT, Mr Weill said he had raised concerns about costs with Mr Prince. "I think Chuck definitely feels the need to rein in costs as well as invest for the future."

But Mr Prince insisted he would not cut back on investment. "We are on the cusp of organic growth showing through."

Some large investors say Mr Prince will need to show better progress in the third-quarter results, announced next Thursday, and for the rest of the year or the board will come under pressure to make changes.

Executives have become frustrated with the bank's share price, which has placed a limit on its ability to pay for large deals with stock.

Hollywood Warned About Piracy (FT)

By Matthew Garrahan In Los Angeles

Financial Times, October 9, 2006

Hollywood studios must accelerate electronic distribution of their film content if they are to halt the rapid growth of digital piracy, which is projected to increase three-fold by 2015, Bain & Company has warned.

Digital film piracy currently costs Hollywood $2.3bn a year in lost revenues, equivalent to about 3 per cent of total international film industry revenues, according to Bain. However, the consultancy firm estimates digital piracy will represent at least 10 per cent of international film revenues by 2015, equivalent to almost $8bn a year if industry returns stay at existing levels.

David Sanderson, a partner in Bain's Los Angeles office and the head of the firm's global media and entertainment practice, said studios had to offer consumers the opportunity to buy their digital content legally if they were to stop piracy.

"The most important thing [the film industry] needs to do is give consumers a legal choice to buy content electronically," he said. "Studios have to keep looking at consumer needs to give them better alternatives [to buying illegal content]."

Failure to do this could lead to a repeat of the music industry's experience, when fast growth in illegal file sharing decimated record label returns, he added.

Mr Sanderson also indicated that release "windows" – the time between theatrical release, DVD and pay-TV sale – would have to be compressed if the studios were to beat digital pirates.

DOJ_NMG_0077052

The video-on-demand and DVD windows had already "collapsed", although making films available for digital download near, or shortly after, their theatrical release, "would have a big bearing on studio economics. Historically, windows have been a way to sell a piece of content as many times as you can."

One solution would be to sell a film digitally in a format that allowed the content to be played on multiple platforms, such as a PC, DVD player or hand-held device, and then charge consumers accordingly, he added.

"The studios have to figure out how the consumer is going to buy the content and move it around different devices."

The Bain warning comes amid a period of belt-tightening in Hollywood. Studios are increasingly bringing in financial partners, such as hedge funds and private equity firms to share the burden of escalating production costs.

Most studios have made their movies available for digital download on websites such as CinemaNow. However, these moves have had limited success. Walt Disney has enjoyed better results by making its content available on Apple's iTunes platform.

Rival studios are expected to follow next year, although concerns about the effect on DVD sales of downloading films continue to influence studios' thinking.

Danaher Is Close To Deal For Vision As Its Rivals Fade (WSJ)

By Dennis K. Berman

The Wall Street Journal, October 9, 2006

Industrial conglomerate Danaher Corp. late yesterday was on the verge of clinching a deal for Australian medical-technology concern Vision Systems Ltd. for about $595 million, or 3.75 Australian dollars ($2.79) a share, according to people familiar with the transaction.

Danaher's offer appears to trump rival bids from two other U.S. companies, Ventana Medical Systems Inc. and Cytyc Corp., which had in recent weeks been vying for Vision Systems. The board of the Melbourne, Australia, company was expected to recommend Danaher's proposal, which is expected to come in the form of a tender offer, people familiar with the matter said.

Danaher, Washington, D.C., is paying a full price for Vision, a maker of technical equipment and biological materials used in pathology laboratories. Vision is primarily engaged in the business of cancer detection, producing technical instruments and materials known as reagents used in tumor biopsies.

Ventana, for instance, had originally announced a deal two months ago that valued Vision at A$2.13 a share. Then Cytyc waded into the battle, eventually offering A$3.25 a share for the company, a price that seemed a knockout bid. But it turned out to be insufficient, given Danaher's offer and the company's overwhelming financial firepower against the smaller Cytyc.

Danaher is paying up for Vision, though, because it sees an opportunity in combining Vision with its Leica Microsystems Inc. business, whose lab equipment and high-powered microscopes are used in the same pathology labs as Vision's equipment. People familiar with the transaction said that Danaher will be able to sell laboratories a full grouping of the equipment, integrating it to improve the processing time for the biopsies and cell cultures that cycle through pathology labs.

The people close to the transaction say that the acquisition still fits into Danaher's overall acquisition framework, in which it aims to notch a double-digit return on invested capital within five years of the original purchase.

A Vision purchase would mark the latest in a long line of acquisitions for Danaher, which sports a $21 billion market capitalization. During 2005, the company reported revenue of $7.98 billion and net income of $907.7 million.

Company Searching For Recalled Lettuce (WP/AP)

By Juliana Barbassa

The Washington Post, October 10, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, Oct. 9 -- The company that recalled its lettuce after irrigation water tested positive for E. coli scrambled Monday to locate 250 remaining cartons of the greens, which could be scattered across seven Western states.

On Sunday, Nunes Co. recalled more than 8,500 cartons of green leaf lettuce grown on one farm in the Salinas Valley, the agricultural region at the center of the contaminated-spinach outbreak that killed three people and made 199 others sick.

By Monday morning, all but 250 cartons of the lettuce distributed under the Foxy brand between Oct. 3 and Oct. 6 had been located and were being destroyed, Nunes President Tom Nunes said.

The search continued for the remaining cartons, which Nunes said were believed to be in supermarkets or restaurants in Arizona, California, Nevada, Washington, Oregon, Idaho and Montana.

DOJ_NMG_0077053

"If we can get it all back, I'll be a happy camper," Nunes said, emphasizing that the recall was precautionary since there had been no evidence of E. coli on the lettuce, or any reports of illnesses.

The U.S. Food and Drug Administration commended the company for its action.

"Clearly, the company did the right thing in terms of taking the proper approach in not putting the public at risk and initiating a voluntary recall," said David Acheson, chief medical officer in the FDA's Center for Food Safety and Applied Nutrition.

Acheson said the lettuce recall does not appear to be related to the contaminated-spinach outbreak.

E. Coli Worry Spreads To Lettuce; California Grower Issues Recall (NYT/AP)

SAN FRANCISCO, Oct. 8 (AP) — Less than a week after the Food and Drug Administration lifted its warning on fresh spinach grown in the Salinas Valley in California, a popular brand of lettuce grown there was recalled on Sunday over concerns about E. coli contamination.

The lettuce does not appear to have caused any illnesses, said the president of the grower, the Nunes Company.

The recall comes amid warnings that some brands of spinach, bottled carrot juice and recent shipments of beef could cause health risks.

Executives ordered the recall after learning that irrigation water may have been contaminated with E. coli, said Tom Nunes Jr., president of the company. The company has not found E. coli bacteria in the lettuce itself, Mr. Nunes said.

“We’re just reacting to a water test only,” he said. “We know there’s generic E. coli on it, but we’re not sure what that means.”

The recall covers green leaf lettuce sold from Oct. 3 to Oct. 6 under the Foxy brand in grocery stores in Arizona, California, Idaho, Montana, Nevada, Oregon and Washington. It was also sold to distributors in those states who may have sold it to restaurants or institutions.

The lettuce was packaged as “Green Leaf 24 Count, waxed carton,” and “Green Leaf 18 Count, cellophane sleeve, returnable carton.” Packaging is stamped with the lot code 6SL0024.

Julie Zawisza, an F.D.A. spokeswoman, said the agency was aware of the voluntary recall but had no details. Mr. Nunes said the bacteria in the lettuce fields probably did not share the source of the E. coli found in spinach that has sickened nearly 200 people and has been linked to three deaths nationwide.

The recall at Nunes, a family-owned business with more than 20,000 acres of cropland in Arizona and California, comes days after federal agents searched two Salinas Valley produce companies connected to the nationwide spinach scare.

Epidemiologists also warned consumers last week to stay away from some bottled carrot juice after a Florida woman was paralyzed and three people in Georgia experienced respiratory failure, apparently from botulism poisoning.

On Friday, an Iowa company announced that it was recalling 5,200 pounds of ground beef suspected of having E. coli. The government said no illnesses had been reported from consumption of the beef.

The outbreaks have sparked demands to create a new federal agency in charge of food safety. Senators Charles E. Schumer and Hillary Rodham Clinton, both New York Democrats, are sponsoring legislation written by Senator Richard J. Durbin, Democrat of Illinois, to create a unified Food Safety Agency.

The outbreaks have devastated the economy of the Salinas Valley, where farmers in the area began plowing spinach crops under and laying off workers last month.

Calif. Lettuce Recalled Over E. Coli Concerns (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, October 9, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, Oct. 8 -- Less than a week after the Food and Drug Administration lifted its warning on fresh spinach grown in California's Salinas Valley, a popular brand of lettuce grown there has been recalled over concerns about E. coli contamination.

The lettuce does not appear to have caused any illnesses, the president of Salinas-based Nunes Co. said.

The lettuce scare follows other federal warnings that some brands of spinach, bottled carrot juice and recent shipments of beef could cause grave health risks -- including paralysis, respiratory failure and death.

Executives ordered the recall after learning that irrigation water may have been contaminated with E. coli, said Tom Nunes Jr., president of the company.

So far, company investigators have not found E. coli bacteria in the lettuce itself, Nunes stressed.

DOJ_NMG_0077054

"We're just reacting to a water test only. We know there's generic E. coli on it, but we're not sure what that means," he said. "We're being extra careful. This is precautionary."

The recall covers green leaf lettuce purchased in grocery stores Oct. 3-6 in Arizona, California, Nevada, Washington, Oregon, Idaho and Montana. It was also sold to distributors in those states who may have sold it to restaurants or institutions.

FDA spokeswoman Julie Zawisza said the agency is aware of the voluntary recall but had no details.

"As a standard course of action, we would expect the firm to identify the source of the contamination and take steps to . . . ensure that it doesn't happen again," Zawisza wrote in an e-mail.

It's unlikely, Nunes said, that the bacteria in the lettuce fields share the source of the E. coli found in spinach that has sickened nearly 200 people and has been linked to three deaths nationwide.

Pathogenic Escherichia coli bacteria, or E. coli, can proliferate in uncooked produce, raw milk, unpasteurized juice, contaminated water and meat. When consumed, it may cause diarrhea and bloody stools.

Although most healthy adults recover within a week without long-term side effects, some people may develop a form of kidney failure.

That illness is most likely to occur in young children, senior citizens and people with compromised immune systems. In extreme cases, it can lead to kidney damage or death.

Epidemiologists also warned consumers last week to avoid some bottled carrot juice after a Florida woman was paralyzed and three people in Georgia experienced respiratory failure, apparently because of botulism poisoning.

Also on Friday, an Iowa company announced that it was recalling 5,200 pounds of ground beef suspected of having E. coli. The government said no illnesses have been reported from consumption of the beef.

'Foxy' Brand Lettuce Recalled; E. Coli Feared (USAT)

By William M. Welch, Usa Today

USA Today, October 9, 2006

LOS ANGELES - A California company is voluntarily recalling its "Foxy" brand of lettuce because of fears of E. coli contamination in produce sold last week.

The move is the latest worry over tainted produce from the Salinas, Calif., area, coming less than a week after the Food and Drug Administration ended a national warning on spinach grown in the area.

FDA Assistant Commissioner Julie Zawisza said Sunday that the agency was aware of the lettuce recall, "and we are looking into it."

Green leaf lettuce sold to distributors in seven western states under the "Foxy" brand is being recalled, according to the producer, The Nunes Co.

The lettuce was distributed in Arizona, California, Nevada, Washington, Oregon, Idaho and Montana. No illnesses have been attributed to the lettuce thus far, said Tom Nunes Jr., president of the family-owned company.

All affected lettuce came from one farm and was shipped from the company's Salinas facilities Tuesday through Friday, he said.

Nunes called the recall a precaution ordered after the company discovered that water used to irrigate the lettuce crops had tested positive for E. coli bacteria in an initial test. "Samples of the recalled product are now being tested," he said.

E. coli can cause diarrheal illness and, in some patients, can lead to kidney damage and even death.

The lettuce was sold to stores and to distributors who may have resold it to restaurants. The produce were sold under lot code 6SL0024 and packaged as "Green Leaf 24 Count, waxed carton," and "Green Leaf 18 Count, cellophane sleeve, returnable carton."

Consumers who have purchased these products are urged to return it to the place of purchase for a full refund, said the company. Consumers with questions can reach the company at 1-800-695-5012.

Zawisza said the FDA was seeking to determine the scope of the problem.

"We would expect the firm to identify the source of the contamination and take steps to correct and prevent to ensure that it doesn't happen again," she said.

Outbreak Exposes Weakness In Food Chain (FWST)

By Libby Quaid

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram, October 10, 2006

WASHINGTON - The recent outbreak of E. coli in spinach from California exposed a weakness in the nation's food chain: A system that quickly delivers meat, fruits and vegetables to consumers just as easily can spread potentially deadly bacteria.

DOJ_NMG_0077055

Like most food, spinach travels from the field to a central facility where it mixes with spinach from other fields. If any is tainted, the threat to people is amplified as leaves are washed, dried, bagged and shipped throughout the country.

Within days of the first reported E. coli-related case on Aug. 30, illness from the tainted California spinach had spread to two dozen states. Nearly 200 people were sickened - one-third of them in the first 72 hours. Two elderly women and a 2-year-old boy died.

"When you open a bag of spinach, do you wonder how many different plants are in there, and how many different fields it came from?" said Dr. Robert Tauxe, chief of foodborne diseases at the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

"If something went wrong on any one of those fields ... one rotten apple spoils the whole barrel," Tauxe said.

It was the 20th time lettuce or spinach has been blamed for an outbreak of illness since 1995.

On Sunday, green leaf lettuce from the same growing area, California's Salinas Valley, was recalled in more than half a dozen states after Nunes Co. Inc. discovered possible E. coli contamination of irrigation water. The bacteria hasn't been found in the company's Foxy brand lettuce. No illnesses have been reported.

Food safety advocates are calling for stringent regulations, and they say a single agency should be in charge of making sure all food is safe.

"If you raise spinach in the Salinas Valley and it's in 40 states in a few days, you can't have a system that says we won't do anything until somebody gets sick," said Carol Tucker Foreman, director of food policy for Consumer Federation and a former USDA official.

"Because look how many people get sick before you can even know it," Foreman said.

The Food and Drug Administration has repeatedly told the entire industry to get the problem under control, but FDA does not have inspection or safety programs for produce like the Agriculture Department has for meat and poultry.

While the food system is vastly centralized, "what we don't have is a centralized agency that's really in charge of ensuring that the products are safe," said Caroline Smith DeWaal, director of food safety for the Center for Science in the Public Interest.

An E. coli outbreak in 1993 was a painful demonstration of weakness in the highly centralized beef supply chain. Hundreds of people got sick and four children died after eating undercooked hamburgers from Jack in the Box restaurants.

The outbreak prompted the Agriculture Department to tighten safety standards and expand government testing. And in 1996, it replaced its old visual inspection with one that requires a scientific look at vulnerable places in the production chain and constant monitoring of those points.

Today, illnesses from E. coli are down 29 percent from when the government tracking system began a decade ago, although illness rates inched up from 2004 to 2005.

"It took a few years, but I think we have a really good handle on how to control this organism," said Randy Huffman, vice president of science for the American Meat Institute, an industry group.

The company at the center of the spinach crisis, Natural Selection Foods, has begun sampling every lot of greens and holding shipments until test results come back.

"Even if we nail this particular problem down to a certain point, I think it's really important to have that firewall in place, so no matter where it might come from, we feel like we can catch it," company spokeswoman Samantha Cabaluna said.

With beef, an important step was figuring out just how contamination happened in the first place. Government scientists discovered the primary source entered the slaughterhouse on the hides of cattle, and that it could transfer directly to the surface of the meat.

Solving that mystery may be more critical for lettuce and spinach because - unlike beef - much of leafy produce is eaten raw and not cooked to temperatures that will kill E. coli.

So far, no one has determined the cause of nine outbreaks, including the one from late August, in lettuce and spinach grown in Salinas, Calif.

In the spinach case, the FBI has searched processing plants for evidence of problems and state investigators are looking into contamination from manure, irrigation water or even workers relieving themselves in fields.

In addition, it is unknown exactly where E. coli lurks in spinach and lettuce plants. Research suggests the bacteria can get inside the stems and leaves, Tauxe said, adding that more research is needed.

It's unlikely whether FDA will ever know if the E. coli bacteria was on the surface of the tainted spinach or inside the greens themselves, because it was ground up for testing, Dr. David Acheson, chief medical officer in the FDA's Center for Food Safety and Applied Nutrition, told reporters Monday.

Tauxe said: "It took the meat industry some years to get a grip on how contamination was occurring during slaughter, and it will take some time for the produce industry to get a better handle on this."

Voluntary Lettuce Recall Creates More Worry For Farmers (NYT)

By Jesse McKinley

The New York Times, October 10, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, Oct. 9 — It is, in scope and severity, a fairly minor recall: about 8,500 cartons of lettuce, which may or may not have come into contact with irrigation water contaminated with E. coli bacteria. No one has gotten sick, the lettuce company involved emphasized, adding that the move was precautionary.

But for farmers in the Salinas Valley of California, already reeling from last month's deadly E. coli outbreak in spinach, the timing could not have been worse.

"It clearly has the potential to set back our effort to regain consumer confidence," said Bob Perkins, the executive director of the farm bureau in Monterey County, one of three counties to which the contaminated spinach was linked. "Right now, I don't know how the story is playing out with the general public, whether it's an example of another problem with the industry or it's an example of how the system works."

The voluntary recall of the lettuce, announced Sunday by the Nunes Company, based in Salinas, involved about 8,500 cartons of green leaf lettuce sold under the Foxy label. Tom Nunes Jr., the company's president, said Monday that only 250 cartons could have reached consumers and that those were believed to be in one of seven Western states: Arizona, California, Idaho, Montana, Nevada, Oregon or Washington. Mr. Nunes said the other cartons had been found and were being destroyed.

The recall was decided on, Mr. Nunes said, after a test of reservoir water at a single Salinas Valley farm that supplies the Nunes Company found "a dangerous concentration of generic E. coli." But he said there was no evidence yet that it was the potentially lethal strain E. coli O157:H7, which contaminated spinach last month, causing three deaths and sickening nearly 200.

"We don't know what kind of E. coli it is," said Mr. Nunes, who added that further test results on the E. coli were expected back Tuesday. "But it was enough to get our attention."

Federal health authorities commended the recall and said Monday that no illnesses had been linked to the Nunes Company's products or to the irrigation water. Finding very low levels of E. coli in water is not unusual, said Dr. David Acheson, chief medical officer of the Center for Food Safety and Applied Nutrition at the Food and Drug Administration.

Whether that will reassure customers or result in lettuce wilting at the salad bar remains to be seen. In downtown San Francisco, some delis posted signs informing customers that the shops were not using Foxy lettuce alongside notices that their spinach was safe.

Tina Lopez, an office worker at Washington Mutual here, said she was not worried about the salad she had just bought for lunch. "I figured if they had it out, it was probably O.K.," Ms. Lopez said. "If anything it's probably safer because they're scrutinizing everything."

That was exactly the kind of reaction farmers' groups were hoping for. Tim Chelling, a spokesman for Western Growers, which represents 3,000 farmers and shippers in California and Arizona, said the response to the lettuce recall had been more forceful than the one to the spinach.

"I've been hearing from everybody and their brother," Mr. Chelling said. "Everybody is communicating, trading information. People aren't stumbling around in the fields in shock, but very quickly trying to organize themselves as professionally and diligently as possible."

The lettuce recall is the latest in a series of food scares, including a recent recall of carrot juice linked to an outbreak of botulism in Georgia and Florida, and an Iowa company's recall of 5,200 pounds of ground beef thought to have been contaminated with E. coli.

And though the nationwide spinach warning has been lifted, the investigation continues. Last week, officials from the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Office of Criminal Investigations at the F.D.A. searched two processing facilities in the Salinas Valley.

Even more than spinach, however, contaminated lettuce has long been a source of concern for health authorities. In August, the F.D.A. announced the Lettuce Safety Initiative, meant to address E. coli outbreaks in the past decade that had been linked to fields in the Salinas Valley, about 100 miles south of San Francisco.

Still, Dr. Acheson said that Americans safely consumed hundreds of thousands of pounds of leafy greens every year and that the recent outbreak tied to spinach was an agricultural anomaly.

"Every now and again something goes wrong," he said, "and the spinach example was one of the worst. Are we ever going to reach a point where we can say there is zero risk associated with fresh leafy greens? Probably not."

But food safety experts said the lettuce recall only affirmed the need for more governmental oversight of the fresh produce industry, and for the type of inspections that governed meat and poultry.

"There's no federal agency that deals with this," said Marion Nestle, a professor of nutrition, public health and food safety at New York University. "This falls through the cracks, and that needs to be fixed."

DOJ_NMG_0077057

That need is even more acute, Dr. Nestle said, because many vegetables are eaten raw. “You could cook spinach, but you don’t ever cook lettuce,” she said.

Dave Kranz, a spokesman for the California Farm Bureau Federation, said it was premature to estimate what kind of economic damage the lettuce recall might inflict on farmers already hit hard by the spinach scare. Although the government warning on that crop was lifted, Mr. Kranz said, many farmers are still on hold, “waiting to see how much demand there will be, and how soon.”

While the Salinas Valley has been the focus of the recent E. Coli investigations, the growing season is poised to shift south, and there, farmers are anxious.

“It’s a huge worry,” said Jack Vessey, a vegetable farmer in El Centro, about 500 miles south of Salinas. Mr. Vessey grows 20 winter crops at his 7,000-acre ranch and just seeded green leaf lettuce fields for the mid-November harvest. Now, however, he is having second thoughts.

“The consumer confidence has to come back,” Mr. Vessey said. “I’m putting seed in the ground. But I’m pretty much gambling on what I plant now.”

Renewable Energy Conference Will Revisit Bush's Energy Goals (KCS/AP)

By Cheryl Wittenauer, The Associated Press

The Kansas City Star, October 10, 2006

ST. LOUIS - A national renewable energy conference this week in St. Louis will revisit energy goals and strategies President Bush set out in his State of the Union address in January, when he proclaimed America "addicted to oil."

Bush is scheduled to address the conference, which starts Tuesday, just before the three-day conference at America's Center winds down Thursday.

"Advancing Renewable Energy: An American Rural Renaissance" is co-hosted by the U.S. departments of energy and agriculture.

The conference is billed as an opportunity to join the public and private sectors in accelerating the commercialization of renewable energy, while creating wealth opportunities for rural communities.

Bush's Advanced Energy Initiative, outlined in his State of the Union address, set a national goal of replacing 75 percent of U.S. oil imports from the Mideast by 2025.

He emphasized the need for more clean-energy research at the Energy Department to fast-track breakthroughs in how autos, homes and businesses are powered. The plan also called for additional funding to make "cellulosic ethanol" - a fuel made from agricultural waste products such as wood chips, stalks or weeds - cost-competitive by 2012.

Bush also called for investing more in zero-emission coal-fired plants, solar and wind technologies and clean, safe nuclear energy, and better batteries for hybrid and electric cars and hydrogen vehicles.

Speakers at the conference will include representatives of government - Department of Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns and Department of Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman; renewable energy sources such as corn, soybeans and wind; financial investment in renewable energy; and environmental concerns.

On the sidelines of the conference Tuesday, DaimlerChrysler and the National Biodiesel Board will discuss new programs to promote clean diesel vehicles and the benefits of renewable biodiesel fuel.

Suspicion Surrounds Retreat In Gas Prices, Poll Finds (WP)

By Steven Mufson

The Washington Post, October 10, 2006

Gasoline prices are down about 75 cents in two months, but whether motorists will see further declines at the pump depends in part on whether the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries can agree to cut production.

Members of the oil cartel have been negotiating to cut the group's output by 1 million barrels a day -- a move that could drive up oil prices and reverse the trend at the pumps. But most oil traders and experts doubt OPEC can achieve more than half the proposed reduction. A failure to cut output could keep supplies strong and oil and gas prices soft.

Pump prices -- now at a national average of $2.28 a gallon for regular unleaded -- already have fallen because of a slowdown in U.S. demand, a buildup in crude oil and gasoline inventories, the end of the summer driving season, a collapse in profit margins at oil refineries and a $17-a-barrel drop in crude oil prices since August.

"The supply was coming back, and I think consumers cut back on use," said Philip K. Verleger, an oil consultant. "The question is how far down it goes."

Though half a dozen countries have talked about production cuts, highly populated countries such as Iran, Nigeria and Venezuela are already producing well below capacity and their old quota levels, and face pressure to produce more because of heavy domestic-spending demands. Kuwait has not cut production since 1998. Saudi Arabia is reluctant to play the role of sole swing producer and has already trimmed output.

"We do not expect any significant production cuts by OPEC at prices above $45 a barrel, the new target price," Fadel Gheit, oil analyst at Oppenheimer & Co., said in a report to investors. Oil markets seemed to agree. The price of crude oil on the New York Mercantile Exchange closed yesterday at $59.96, up 20 cents.

While motorists have welcomed the drop in gasoline prices, a Washington Post-ABC News poll released yesterday showed that many Americans remain suspicious about the reasons for the recent decline and skeptical about whether it will last.

Three out of 10 Americans think the recent fall in gasoline prices is a result of domestic political factors, including White House and Republican Party efforts to influence the November elections. That's nearly as many as the 35 percent who attribute the recent price decline to market forces or supply and demand, according to the poll of 1,204 adults conducted from Thursday to Sunday.

The survey also showed that suspicions about the steep drop in gasoline prices over the past two months aren't limited to the nation's liberal strongholds. Sixteen percent of people who identified themselves as conservative Republicans, 26 percent of white evangelical Protestants and 29 percent of Southern residents think the plunge in prices is linked to the coming election or other political reasons.

Those beliefs may be blunting the positive impact President Bush and the GOP hoped to get from falling fuel prices. "I think the president's party is lowering the gas prices until the people think the economy is settling down, and then they will raise the price again, blaming it on the Arabs for raising the price on barrels of oil," one respondent said.

"As you may know, gasoline prices have fallen recently in many parts of the country," the survey said before asking: "What do you think is the main reason gas prices have gone down?" The top four answers: increased supply, Bush/GOP efforts to affect the November election, the "upcoming election" and "market forces."

A large number of people interviewed pointed to the absence of disruptive hurricanes or simply "supply and demand," while one respondent said prices were falling "because the gasoline companies got what they wanted, the big bucks; and if they continue there will probably be an investigation."

Gasoline experts said there were some signs that prices were stabilizing. The pace of declines in the prices charged by wholesalers was slowing, and there were some tiny wholesale price increases late last week in the Gulf of Mexico region, said Trilby Lundberg, editor of the Lundberg Survey.

Lundberg warned that the sharp drop in prices could spur a resumption of increases in U.S. gasoline consumption. She also said that the closure of refineries for maintenance, not unusual at this time of year, could lead to a decline in inventories.

"Some analysts expect to see a fairly large amount of refinery maintenance this month, which could lead to product inventories being drawn down a little bit more than normal," said last week's report by the Energy Department's Energy Information Administration. "Large volumes of product inventories are one of the many reasons cited for declining prices in recent weeks, and should they begin to be drawn down significantly, this could stop prices from falling further."

But Verleger said he expected prices to remain weak through Thanksgiving or longer. He said that much of the increase in gasoline prices this year was the result of logistical problems oil companies encountered in adapting new government regulations. The companies have had to reduce sulfur content in diesel fuels and begin to mix gasoline with ethanol instead of methyl tertiary butyl ether, an additive that once made up about 3 percent of the content of gasoline.

Illegal Dumps Alter Western Landscapes (USAT)

By Benjamin Spillman, Usa Today

USA Today, October 9, 2006

States' costs mount as trash mounds grow

They rise from the Western landscape, but they're not purple mountains.

They're heaping mounds of car parts, furniture, appliances and household trash dumped illegally onto public land in deserts, mountain ranges and streambeds.

The Bureau of Land Management (BLM) reports they're especially piling up across the American West, where burgeoning cities from Palm Springs, Calif., to Boise are spilling into once pristine landscapes.

“There is hardly a city in the West right now that isn't experiencing significant growth,” Felicia Probert, chief ranger of the BLM, said. “Typically, we haven't had the appropriation, the budget strength, to add rangers as these issues grow in the expanding West.”

Steve Kilpatrick, a BLM ranger in Las Vegas, one of the nation's fastest growing cities, said, “People are just going out to the desert and dumping stuff. I could take you in an area where there are boats, concrete … household trash.”

DOJ_NMG_0077059

In the 2005-06 fiscal year, the cost of cleaning up illegal dumps in the Las Vegas area has added up to $2.8 million, the agency reports.

In April, BLM used front-end loaders, dump trucks and volunteers to haul tons of trash from public land in Payette, Jerome, Ada and Madison counties in Idaho.

Karl Gebhardt, BLM environmental engineer, said a single incident of potentially hazardous material, such as an unidentified drum of liquid, can cost up to $10,000.

Gebhardt said the BLM in Idaho relies heavily on the public to report illegal dumping.

"This is their land. And people are trashing it," he said.

The agency has reported 6,482 illegal dumpsites since 2000, plus another 607 hazardous material cleanups. Most of those have been in the West.

Celia Boddington, spokeswoman for the agency, says it is difficult to come up with a comprehensive estimate of the cleanup cost because of differences in accounting procedures.

The agency figures don't include illegal dumping on private land, which also can cost taxpayers money.

In California alone, illegal dumping on private and public land costs at least $87 million annually, according to an ongoing survey of local governments. The estimate is based on the 61 of 415 city and county governments that have responded to the survey.

"People are really starting to realize what it means in California," said Ken Stuart, who is conducting the survey for the California Integrated Waste Management Board.

In addition to the cleanup cost, there is the threat to public health.

Illegal dumps support rodents and can catch fire and spew toxic smoke.

"Catching people with illegal dumping is just as good as catching people with drugs because of the community impact," said Sgt. George Lee of the Riverside County (Calif.) Sheriff's Department.

Cornering dumpers is difficult because dumping generally happens in remote areas, and proving guilt can require catching the culprit in the act.

In rural areas southeast of Palm Springs, two sheriff's deputies and a support staffer consider illegal dumping a big part of their beat.

On a recent day, the deputies pointed out illegal dumps that were among 20 the team had identified in a region known more for lush golf resorts than environmental hazards.

"There are obviously no residents, no reason to be back here," said Deputy Sean Dusek, at one site where piles of furniture, car parts and yard waste lined both sides of a dirt road.

"You can see the tire tracks. This is a hot dumpsite," Dusek said.

The deputies have experimented with hidden cameras, and they sift through trash piles for clues about the source.

They pick through household trash, construction debris, car batteries, appliances, furniture and landscaping waste for receipts, mail or anything else with a name.

If they identify a name, they find the person, sometimes write them a ticket and tell them to clean up the mess. A county ordinance also allows them to impound a suspect's car for 30 days.

In 2004, California passed a law that increased fines for commercial illegal dumping from $500 to a range between $1,000 and $3,000 for a first offense.

Dusek's partner, Deputy J.C. Garcia, looks at one of the dumpsites and suggests the punishment is justified.

"People come out here for the view. Then they have to look at this," he said.

Land Use Tops State Ballot Issues (WT)

By Joyce Howard Price

The Washington Times, October 10, 2006

State ballot measures to limit use of eminent domain, to bar same-sex "marriage" and to decide the fate of legislation passed in South Dakota outlawing nearly all abortions will be among those facing voters on Election Day, Nov. 7.

"The biggest issue this year is definitely property rights and land use," and voters in at least 11 states will consider measures that would bar governments from taking private property for another private use, said Jennie Drage Bowser, a policy analyst for the National Conference of State Legislatures (NCSL), which tracks ballot questions across the country.

The 11 states where voters will decide on property-rights measures are Arizona, California, Florida, Georgia, Idaho, Michigan, Nevada, New Hampshire, North Dakota, Oregon and South Carolina, said Larry Morandi, NCSL's group director for environment, energy and transportation.

In a primary election Sept. 30, voters in a 12th state, Louisiana, approved a change in the state constitution that prohibits government from expanding eminent-domain power for economic development.

Mr. Morandi said four other states are seeking to prevent governments from engaging in a practice known as "regulatory taking," which restricts a landowner's ability to develop his property. The measures would require compensation for the loss of property value caused by such restrictions.

Mr. Morandi said three states -- Arizona, California and Idaho -- are seeking to combine limitations on regulatory taking with those on eminent domain. A measure in Washington state seeks only to restrict use of regulatory taking of property. Mr. Morandi said such cases typically involve land that adjoins wetlands or other environmentally sensitive tracts, and governments have a history of not paying when they seek to prevent development of property.

These ballot measures are repercussions from the U.S. Supreme Court's June 2005 ruling that governments' taking of private property for private economic-development projects qualifies as a "public use" under the Constitution. That ruling also said that states could set their own restrictions on using the power of eminent domain, and many have followed suit.

In the 2004 general election, ballot measures were dominated by efforts to prohibit same-sex "marriage." Twenty states have approved constitutional amendments banning such "marriages," and voters in eight more states -- Arizona, Colorado, Idaho, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Virginia and Wisconsin -- will consider them on Nov. 7.

Colorado voters also will consider a rival ballot measure that would legalize "domestic partnerships" or civil unions between same-sex couples, even if the marriage amendment passes.

Amendment 44 on the Colorado ballot would legalize the possession and use of up to 1 ounce of marijuana by people 21 or older, as long as it does not occur in public. Question 7 on the Nevada ballot would allow people 21 or older to purchase, possess, use and transport up to 1 ounce of marijuana.

Among proposals to be considered on Election Day:

·A Colorado measure would set term limits for state Supreme Court justices and state appellate court judges.

·An initiative in Oregon would limit terms of state representatives to six years and of state senators to eight years and cut off legislative service after 14 years.

·Proposition 103 on the Arizona ballot would make English that state's official language.

·Three states -- Maine, Nebraska and Oregon -- will have ballot measures that would cap how much revenue the state is allowed to keep. The Maine proposal, for instance, would limit growth in state spending to increases in population and inflation and would require that 80 percent of the excess paid to the General Fund and Highway Fund budgets go toward a tax-relief fund.

·A measure on the Florida ballot would require 60 percent voter support for passage of state constitutional amendments. Currently, amendments can pass with simple majorities, Ms. Bowser said.

At least 204 measures will be on the ballots of 39 states, Ms. Bowser said, making this a "gigantic" year in terms of ballot measures.

A Multipronged Tussle Over The Fate Of Herds Living In An Island Park (NYT)

By Felicity Barringer

The New York Times, October 9, 2006

SANTA ROSA ISLAND, Calif., Oct. 3 — There are hunters who dream about places like this.

The game — unusually large Kaibab deer, Roosevelt elk that lope like thoroughbreds along the wind-scoured ridgelines — are trophy quality. All it takes to bag one is a 30-mile trip across the Santa Barbara Channel, a rifle, good aim, a minimum fee of about $8,000 and the existing agreement by the National Park Service to close 45,000 acres of parkland to the public, August through December.

Close a public park to make way for a private hunt? That is not the Park Service's preference. When it acquired Santa Rosa Island at the time the Channel Islands National Park was formed in 1986, it accepted a 25-year transition period during which the hunting would continue. It wants the animals off the island. The 1,150 deer and elk, park officials say, compromise the native ecosystem — by munching on seedlings of the rare island oaks, for instance.

An advocacy group, the National Parks Conservation Association, is also arguing against continuing to open parkland to private pursuits. Its late 1990's lawsuit ensured that the herd's 100-year history on the island would end. Starting in 2008, the herd was to be whittled down, either shipped out or shot. By 2011, it would be gone.

That was the deal until Representative Duncan Hunter came along. A powerful Congressional committee chairman who seems named, if not born, for this dispute, Mr. Hunter, Republican of California, believes the island's hunt must go on. But the Interior Department is not in his purview. The Defense Department is.

First, Mr. Hunter, the chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, suggested that military personnel and their guests should enjoy the hunt. Then he said it should continue for disabled veterans.

DOJ_NMG_0077061

Neither of these proposals went over. But last week the huge military authorization bill emerged from a House-Senate conference committee with a vestige of the chairman's original proposal, as inscrutable as the Cheshire cat's smile. No disabled veterans were mentioned. Not even the word "hunt."

But by forbidding the park service to "exterminate or nearly exterminate" the animals, Mr. Hunter ensured that, unless someone shipped them out, the deer and elk would remain.

At whose expense? Presumably the Park Service's, since the families that sold the island ranch to the government will have no more presence here after the transition period ends in 2011.

For whose benefit? That remains unclear. Mr. Hunter's office is circulating an approving letter from a three-year-old Nebraska group called the Wounded Warriors Project. (A more established group, the Paralyzed Veterans of America, declined after their representative reported that the island's steep hills and angular drainages were not wheelchair accessible.)

What is clear is who is pleased with the turn of events: largely the descendants of the Vail family, who are heirs to the assets of the Vail & Vickers ranching company, which sold the land to the Park Service. Tim Vail, one of three cousins who played host to a gathering of California ranchers on the island last week, said, "We would not like to see the slaughter of those animals."

Asked to describe the difference between the Park Service's elimination of the herd and the private hunting, which benefits his family, Mr. Vail said: "Slaughter is removing all the animals. Hunting is maintaining their health as a herd."

It is also clear who is deeply disappointed: the Park Service, the conservation association and Representative Lois Capps, a Democrat who represents Santa Barbara and Channel Islands National Park. For them, preserving the park means restoring the landscape that existed before sheep, cattle, deer and elk were introduced.

"Now, nonnative species have priority over native species that are going to go extinct," said Russell Gallipeau, the park's superintendent.

Yvonne Menard, the park's chief of interpretation, argues that the park's mission is to restore the island's original landscape. Ms. Menard recounts with zest the news that, for the first time in decades, a bald eagle hatched on Santa Rosa. Moments later, she bends down sadly over a well-nibbled island oak shoot.

The bones of a pygmy mammoth and Arlington Man — at 13,000 years the oldest human skeleton found in North America — are part of the island's history. The ranching and hunting legacy of the past 170 years is also uniquely valuable, she said, but not as current practice.

Under the new legislation, managing the deer and elk may well be part of the Park Service's job in five years. Practically, Mr. Gallipeau said, that means managing a hunt or paying the considerable costs of shipborne removal and taking on the burden of managing the skittish animals on the sometimes rough two-hour channel crossing.

The simplest management technique, shooting the animals en masse from helicopters, is forbidden by Mr. Hunter's legislation. The only simple alternative is some kind of traditional hunt — maybe something like the hunt now run by Vail & Vickers, although the Park Service has no budget for such activity.

Mr. Hunter said in an interview that, given that only 30,000 people a year visit any of the five islands in the park, accommodating some disabled veterans and their families a few weeks a year was not unreasonable. "We did this as a first step," he said.

Then, he said, he wants the Wounded Warriors group to put together a plan of use to suit their members. "You've got my commitment: I will never hunt there," Mr. Hunter said. "I only want disabled people who served their country in war. That won't ruin the day of these environmentalists whose freedom is guaranteed by their service."

The herds, he said, could be managed by the game management personnel at nearby mainland military bases.

Ms. Capps, who debated sharply with Mr. Hunter on the House floor the day the military authorization bill passed, said the chairman was showing "the arrogance of power" by including an amendment that could not be voted on in its own right.

"This is about what the park means to this country in terms of its values," she said, adding, "What if there were a hunting operation like this in Yosemite? The Grand Canyon?"

In the next Congress, Ms. Capps said, she plans to introduce legislation to undo Mr. Hunter's, assuming, as all parties do, that the Senate will follow the House and approve the military authorization bill when Congress reconvenes after the November election. Likewise, Mr. Hunter plans a follow-up to his bill.

The Vail descendants — the first cousins Tim Vail, Nita Vail and Will Woolley — say they believe that the Park Service goal of returning the island to its natural state is hopelessly utopian.

"They're trying to get it back to a period that never existed," Mr. Woolley said. Nita Vail added, "The reality is, any kind of ecosystem evolves."

October 8, 2006, 1:30 pm Go Ahead and Talk

Former Secretary of State James Baker nudges the Bush administration to talk directly with North Korea, joining a growing chorus calling for reopening diplomatic ties with Iran or engaging in high-level talks with Syria. "You don't give away anything, but, in my view, it's not appeasement to talk to your enemies," Mr. Baker said on ABC's "This Week" television show.

Scholars at the conservative Hoover Institution at Stanford University recently issued a detailed paper urging the administration to offer full diplomatic relations with Iran as part of a bid to get Tehran to give up parts of its nuclear program. The U.S. cut off diplomatic ties with Iran 26 years ago, while the Bush administration has refused to engage in bilateral talks with North Korea, saying that all negotiations should occur within the setting of the six-country talks, which also include Russia, China, Japan and South Korea.

North Korea has long held out for bilateral talks with Washington, portraying its pursuit of nuclear weapons as a means of defense against what it sees as U.S. threats.

"I don't think you restrict your conversations to your friends. At the same time, it's got to be hard-nosed. It's got to be determined," said Mr. Baker, who was former President George H. W. Bush's top diplomat in the early 1990s. – Neil King Jr.

October 7, 2006, 1:06 pm A Convoy in Indiana

In his fight to wrest a congressional seat from House Veterans Affairs Committee Chairman Stephen Buyer (R., Ind.), Democratic challenger David Sanders has found support from a small army of veterans. First, a number of local vets fell in behind him, and he won the backing of former Sen. Max Cleland, a Georgia Democrat and a disabled Vietnam vet, who recently joined Sanders on the campaign trail.

Now, he has the support of a convoy. On Monday, Sanders is accompanying a day-long road trip around Indiana organized by No Vets Left Behind to protest cuts in veterans' benefits, from higher health-care copays to reduced eligibility to redefining post traumatic stress.

Still, the odds are long for the Purdue University scientist. Buyer, running for his eighth term, picked up 70% of the vote in 2004 – when he also faced Sanders. –Mary Lu Carnevale

Peggy Noonan writes in today's Journal: Thirty-two years into his career as a writer of books, Bob Woodward has won a reputation as slipshod ("Wired"), slippery ("All the President's Men," "The Final Days"), opportunistic ("Veil"; everything) and generally unaware of the implications even of those facts he's offered that have gone unchallenged. … Mr. Woodward has been that amazing thing, the boring fabulist.

The Bush White House has spent the past five years thinking they could manage him. Talk about a state of denial.

Now he has thwarted me. I bought "State of Denial" thinking I might have a merry time bashing it and a satisfying time defending the innocent injured.

But it is a good book. It may be a great one. It is serious, densely, even exhaustively, reported, and a real contribution to history in that it gives history what it most requires, first-person testimony. (It is well documented, with copious notes.) What is most striking is that Mr. Woodward seems to try very hard to be fair, not in a phony "Armitage, however, denies it" way, but in a way that — it will seem too much to say this — reminded me of Jean Renoir: "The real hell of life is that everyone has his reasons." FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

F.B.I. Struggling To Reinvent Itself To Fight Terror (NYT)

By Scott Shane And Lowell Bergman

The New York Times, October 10, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 9 — Last February, top F.B.I. officers from across the nation gathered in a high-security auditorium for the latest plan to reinvent the crime-fighting agency to take on terrorism.

Philip Mudd, who had just joined the bureau from the rival Central Intelligence Agency, was pitching a program called Domain Management, designed to get agents to move beyond chasing criminal cases and start gathering intelligence.

Drawing on things like commercial marketing software and the National Security Agency's eavesdropping without warrants, the program is supposed to identify threats. Mr. Mudd displayed a map of the San Francisco area, pocked with data showing where Iranian immigrants were clustered — and where, he said, an F.B.I. squad was "hunting."

Some F.B.I. officials found Mr. Mudd's concept vague and the implied ethnic targeting troubling. How were they supposed to go "hunting" without colliding with the Constitution? Would the C.I.A. man, whom some mocked privately as Rasputin, take the bureau back to the domestic spying scandals of the 1960's? And why neglect promising cases to, in Mr. Mudd's words, "search for the unknown"?

The skepticism is just one sign of unfinished business at the bureau. Five years after the Sept. 11 attacks spurred a new mission, F.B.I. culture still respects door-kicking investigators more than deskbound analysts sifting through tidbits of data. The uneasy transition into a spy organization has prompted criticism from those who believe that the bureau cannot competently gather domestic intelligence, and others, including some insiders, who fear that it can.

Eight months after his talk, Mr. Mudd admits that some in the bureau do not accept his guiding premise: that arresting bad guys is sometimes less important than collecting intelligence to uncover the next terrorist plot.

"There's 31,000 employees in this organization and we're undergoing a sea-change," he said in an interview. "It's going to take a while for what is a high-end national security program to sink down to every officer."

The top counterterrorism job has turned over repeatedly — seven people in five years — filled mostly by veterans with little expertise on Islamist movements and terrorist networks. Many counterterrorism agents have minimal specialized training. A National Security Agency executive brought in to reshape the bureau's intelligence capabilities, Maureen Baginski, departed after clashing with F.B.I. old-timers. The intelligence units Ms. Baginski created in the 56 field offices lack clear instructions and some are "struggling," a recent Congressional study found.

And some bureau traditionalists believe that Mr. Mudd, too, will move on from his job as second in command of the bureau's new National Security Branch. "They'll just wait him out," a counterterrorism official said.

After interviewing more than 60 intelligence officials for a new book on counterterrorism, Amy Zegart, of the University of California, Los Angeles, reached a dismal verdict on the F.B.I.

"If you look at, for example, the four key ingredients for counterterrorism success — agents, analysts, managers and computers — the F.B.I. is struggling to get the basics right on all of them," Ms. Zegart said. "New agents still get more time for vacation than they do for counterterrorism training. Analysts are still treated as glorified secretaries."

In interviews by The New York Times and the Public Broadcasting System documentary series "Frontline," even critics acknowledged the sweeping structural changes at the bureau under Robert S. Mueller III, who took over as director a week before the Sept. 11 attacks.

The number of Joint Terrorism Task Forces, in which F.B.I. agents collaborate with state and local agencies, has ballooned to 101, from 35. The number of intelligence analysts has doubled to 2,161, and the number of linguists has doubled to 1,371. And the F.B.I. points out that there has been no new terrorist attack.

Mr. Mudd said agents were encouraged to postpone the arrest of a terrorism suspect until his ties to other operatives, financial supporters and foreign networks were fully understood.

"I don't want to take him down too quickly," he said. "I want to understand what we know and what we don't know. If we're focused solely on cases, I can't have confidence that we know what's going on."

But the drive to bring criminal charges often eclipses the intelligence imperative. In cases from Lodi, Calif., where a 23-year-old man was convicted this year of training in a terrorist camp in Pakistan, to Miami, where seven Haitian men are charged with waging war against the United States government, defendants who seemed nowhere near ready to mount an attack were arrested with a news media splash rather than quietly kept under surveillance.

Christopher D. Hamilton, who retired last year after 22 years at the F.B.I., half of it working on counterterrorism, said agents still believed that their careers would rise or fall on the cases they brought.

"Supervisors will say, 'Why don't you have any cases?' " said Mr. Hamilton, now at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy. "Cases are good for getting resources, good for publicity and good for morale."

Even a Los Angeles case that federal officials describe as the most operationally advanced of post-2001 plots uncovered in the United States appears to show a gap between public relations and reality.

In that case, three men are charged with committing robberies to raise money for jihadist attacks on synagogues and military recruiting stations, in what Director Mueller has described as a bid to create "Al Qaeda in California." Their actions are said to have been directed by Kevin James, who headed a Muslim group behind bars.

But agents checked on more than 100 prisoners with links to Mr. James and charged none. And though Mr. James has been portrayed as the mastermind, reporters for The New York Times and "Frontline" were repeatedly able to visit him in jail in Santa Ana, Calif. Such access is almost never granted to people accused of terrorism because the authorities fear that they could direct a plot from prison.

But if making arrests is no longer the top priority, many agents fear that an ill-defined quest for domestic intelligence is likely to lead to political trouble, as the hunt for Communists in the 1960's led to surveillance on the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. and John Lennon. Michael Rolince, a veteran F.B.I. counterterrorism official who retired last year, said the attorney general's investigative guidelines, first imposed as a reform in 1976, "are absolutely necessary to keep F.B.I. agents out of trouble."

But the guidelines, largely classified, have been loosened repeatedly in the last 30 years, most recently in 2003 to permit "threat assessments" without evidence of a crime. Officials say uncertainty in field offices about how the rules apply today has slowed the move to intelligence. They plan to issue new instructions to top agents from each field office this month.

Mr. Mudd said he knew that concern about civil liberties was "in the DNA" at the F.B.I., and he recently read a biography of J. Edgar Hoover, whose long tenure as director was marred by abuses, to recall the dangers of uncontrolled domestic spying.

Still, he said, "I do bristle a bit at people saying, 'You want to just go back to the 60's and 70's.' "

Intelligence on the terrorist threat involves not just spying, Mr. Mudd said, but also building a close relationship with leaders in Muslim communities.

To help agents and analysts distinguish genuine threats from routine Islamist rhetoric, the bureau has just doubled its basic training on counterterrorism to about 80 hours. Skeptics note, however, that more time is devoted to firearms training.

"The F.B.I. needs to follow the lead of the small group of agents who've made themselves experts," said Evan F. Kohlmann, a consultant to the bureau and Scotland Yard and author of a book and Web site devoted to Al Qaeda.

Mr. Kohlmann said the dozen agents who knew international terror networks best were rarely brought in on local cases.

Knowledgeable employees say Muslim agents number no more than a dozen of the bureau's 12,664 agents. (The bureau says it does not track employees by religion.) And an F.B.I. tradition that values leadership and personal connections more than specialized knowledge has resulted in counterterrorism bosses with minimal background.

"You need leadership. You don't need subject-matter expertise," said Gary M. Bald, whom Mr. Mueller named last year as the first head of the National Security Branch, admitting in a 2005 deposition that he knew little about Islam. Mr. Bald has since left for a security job with a cruise line.

The awkward tension between intelligence and prosecution was on vivid display in the Lodi case. The investigation began in late 2001 as an intelligence operation to size up two imams from Pakistan whom the authorities believed had ties to extremists.

After four years of surveillance, agents had found no evidence of terrorism-related crimes by the imams, who were deported to Pakistan. Instead, the government prosecuted Hamid Hayat, 23, who faces a maximum sentence of 39 years in prison for attending a terrorist training camp in Pakistan. His father, Umer Hayat, 48, is free after a mistrial and a guilty plea to making a false statement.

The Lodi case produced worldwide headlines about an "Al Qaeda cell" in California, and John D. Negroponte, the director of national intelligence, called it the prime example of a "homegrown jihadist cell" in Congressional testimony. But critics of the case, including several former agents, say it has serious and revealing shortcomings.

The informant in the case, a convenience store clerk who was paid more than $200,000 over four years in salary and expenses, could be heard on tape angrily ordering Hamid Hayat to seek terrorist training. His claim that he saw Ayman al-Zawahri, Al Qaeda's second in command, at the Lodi mosque in 1998 or 1999 was admitted by the government to be inaccurate.

The video of Hamid Hayat's confession showed agents prompting his answers and sometimes insisting on their own version. And his account of the camp bore no resemblance to that of his father, who said it was an underground facility where would-be terrorists dressed as "Ninja turtles" and practiced pole-vaulting.

The interrogation tapes so outraged James J. Wedick, who retired in 2004 after 35 years as an F.B.I. agent, that he worked for the defense without charge. "It's shameful, because I've never seen the department do this before," Mr. Wedick said.

The Hayats, he concluded, were saying whatever they thought the agents wanted to hear, and little effort was made to corroborate their confessions.

The case also raised questions about agents' familiarity with Islam, as some scholars say agents misinterpreted a scrap of paper with a Muslim prayer as a jihadist vow.

Finally, several other Pakistani Americans whom the Hayats said had visited terrorist camps have not been charged, suggesting that the F.B.I. does not believe at least some parts of the Hayats' confessions. The management of the case appears at odds with the new philosophy of following up all leads before any public charges are brought.

A lingering question in the Lodi case is the effect on Pakistanis in the area. Some mosque leaders who saw the Pakistani imams as militant interlopers are glad they are gone. But few believe that the Hayats ever posed a threat.

Taj Khan, a retired engineer and leader among the Pakistanis in Lodi, said the Hayats' experience had made residents more reluctant to cooperate with the F.B.I.

"Everybody's clear that as soon as they talk to the F.B.I.," Mr. Khan said, "they might be, you know, put in the slammer."

There is, he added, "not much trust at all."

Drew S. Parenti, the special agent in charge of the Sacramento office of the F.B.I., defended the case, saying, "Everything we did in this case was lawful, ethical, proper, was reviewed by a judge and was determined by a jury of peers to be sufficient evidence to sustain conviction."

DOJ_NMG_0077065

But Mr. Scott, the United States attorney, now says it was a mistake to label the case as a Qaeda plot.

"We probably, at the end of the day, should not have used that term," he said. "One of the biggest mistakes that we can make is to overhype these cases on the front end. And if it is a widely held perception out there that we did that in this case, then I regret that, because that was never our intent."

An Attorney's 23-Year Quest For An Ex-Beatle (LAW)

By Leigh Jones, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, October 10, 2006

Three years after John Lennon was assassinated, Morrison & Foerster partner Dan Marmalefsky launched a lawsuit against the Federal Bureau of Investigation to uncover the Nixon administration's plan to deport the famous Beatle.

Twenty-three years later, he's still digging.

A white-collar defense attorney in Los Angeles, Marmalefsky leads a team of three lawyers, pro bono, that represents a University of California, Irvine history professor, who, since 1983, has sought the release of FBI documents related to its surveillance of Lennon in the early 1970s.

What started out as a compelling freedom-of-information challenge for a young Yale Law School graduate more than two decades ago has become a career-spanning endeavor.

The case has outlived four presidential administrations, dozens of court appearances and, apparently, a film about the famous rock star, "The U.S. vs. John Lennon," in current release. His client, Jonathan Wiener, has chronicled the 23-year battle in the book "Gimme Some Truth: The John Lennon FBI Files," and was a consultant for the film, in which he appears.

A CAUTIONARY TALE

Marmalefsky, now 50, said that he and two other attorneys have spent thousands of hours on the ongoing case, which he asserts goes to the heart of governmental intrusion.

"It cautions us against the risk of allowing the government, without any checks and balances, to place ordinary people under surveillance," he said.

Much of Wiener v. FBI, No. CV-83-1720 (C.D. Calif.), settled in 1997 during the Clinton administration.

In 1991, the issue of whether the FBI had sufficiently detailed its reasons for nondisclosure went up to the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. In that decision, Wiener v. FBI, 943 F.2d 972 (1991), the appeals court reversed the lower court and determined that the FBI's degree of specificity was not adequate.

Today, the parties continue to spar over a handful of remaining documents that U.S. District Judge Robert Takasugi in 2004 said the FBI must release. Government attorneys argue that releasing them could jeopardize the national security of an unnamed foreign government. Lennon was a British citizen.

Although attorneys for the U.S. Department of Justice have filed a notice of an appeal to Takasugi's decision, it remains uncertain whether the U.S. Office of the Solicitor General, which must authorize the government's pursuit of an appeal, will do so.

A spokesman for the Office of Solicitor General said that, so far, no authorization had been granted. He declined to comment further.

A GRASSROOTS THREAT

Lennon drew the Nixon administration's scrutiny because of his protests over the Vietnam war. Lennon's ability to rally grassroots support for his views prompted FBI agents to document his whereabouts and monitor his appearances.

Lennon, 40, was assassinated in 1980 in New York by Mark David Chapman.

Other attorneys representing Wiener are Mark Rosenbaum and Peter Eliasberg, with the American Civil Liberties Union in Los Angeles.

Since the case originally was filed, Marmalefsky has married and has a grown son. When he brought the suit in 1983, he was an associate at Hufstedler Miller Carlson & Beardsley in Los Angeles. Most of its attorneys, including Marmalefsky, joined Morrison & Foerster in 1995.

American University Washington College of Law professor Robert Vaughn, whose scholarship focuses on freedom-of-information issues, said that freedom-of-information disputes that go to litigation usually drag on a year or two.

"Twenty-three years is a very long time," he said.

Big Drug Smuggling Ring Busted (NADH)

Netherlands Antilles Daily Herald, October 10, 2006

56 indicted, 28 arrested, two here

DOJ_NMG_0077066

PHILIPSBURG--Twenty-eight persons, including a man from Holland and one from the Dominican Republic who resided here in St. Maarten, were arrested over the weekend in connection with a multimillion-dollar international drug-smuggling and money-laundering operation.

Prosecutor Johan de Vrieze said Sunday the drug-smuggling and money-laundering operation spanned seven countries, including St. Maarten, the United States and Puerto Rico.

De Vrieze also disclosed that detectives of the Kingdom Detective Cooperation Team RST had played a vital role in exposing the mastermind behind the operation, as a result of which some 56 indictments have been issued for persons involved, 28 of whom have already been arrested.

The Dutch national De G. was the first of the two persons arrested here. He was held Friday afternoon and the second suspect M.V. was held on Saturday as he was attempting to leave the island for Puerto Rico.

According to De Vrieze these two coordinated the transhipment of drugs through St. Maarten in collaboration with their Colombian counterparts who organised the delivery using six speedboats that have been confiscated.

Millions of dollars identified by the authorities as being laundered and drug money have also been confiscated from several US and offshore bank accounts.

In addition, the authorities have confiscated about 1,900 kilos of cocaine so far.

De Vrieze explained that RST detectives had stumbled on some information earlier this year that they had followed. The information led them to several groups that appeared at first to be independent operations, but which they later learnt were linked.

The authorities were also able to get detailed information through wire taps that allowed US Drug Enforcement Agency (DEA) officers to infiltrate the organisation and identify key role-players, including one Lewis Penia Pereira who was also charged with kidnapping.

Pereira is believed to have orchestrated the kidnapping of a US citizen for whose release he demanded US $5 million in ransom. The victim managed to escape unharmed.

Giving additional details about the busted operation, De Vrieze explained that millions of dollars in drugs had been shipped from South America to Santo Domingo and then to the United States using St. Maarten as a transhipment island.

It seems that the cartel used a method called “the black market peso exchange” to “wash” their ill-gotten gains. They would exchange the money, or make investments with very little if any profit margins, as their prime concern was the return of funds through a legal channel.

The countries involved in the illegal operation were the USA, Puerto Rico, Colombia, St. Maarten, the United States Virgin Islands, the British Virgin Islands, and the Dominican Republic.

Arrests Made In Colombia Drug Case (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, The Associated Press

AP, October 10, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Twenty-seven people were arrested Friday on drug smuggling and money laundering charges linked to a Colombian cocaine operation that kidnapped an undercover U.S. agent last year.

The arrests in New York, New Jersey, Puerto Rico, Colombia, St. Maarten and the Dominican Republic are among 56 indicted as part of international anti-drug investigations called "Operation Green Traketon" and "Operation Watusi."

An undercover agent for U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, whose identify has not been disclosed, was kidnapped and held for a half-day, at times with a gun stuck in his mouth, authorities said.

The drug ring's leaders initially demanded a $2 million ransom but then chose to release him after they realized he was a U.S. government agent.

The Dec. 14 kidnapping had not been previously disclosed. It was announced by the Justice Department on Friday.

"We will leave no stone unturned in hunting down those that kidnap and threaten undercover ICE agents," said Julie Myers, the assistant secretary at the Homeland Security Department. "In this case, our agent was fortunate to escape with his life," said Myers, who heads Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

Twenty-nine suspects were still at large late Friday. Among them is Luis Alberto Pena-Pena, a leader of the drug operation who ordered the agent's kidnapping from his hotel in Medellin, Colombia.

The agent had infiltrated the drug ring, which was smuggling cocaine from Colombia through Caribbean islands and Puerto Rico to the United States. Authorities said he was kidnapped, handcuffed and threatened with murder the morning after a conversation with Pena-Pena.

DOJ_NMG_0077067

Authorities said Pena-Pena blamed the agent for the loss of 200 kilograms of cocaine that law enforcement officers in Puerto Rico had seized in July 2005. Pena-Pena also berated the agent, who had been taken to a ranch in Medellin, over several money seizures in Puerto Rico, officials said.

Meanwhile, immigration agents in Puerto Rico learned their colleague had been kidnapped and that Pena-Pena's organization was demanding $2 million for his release. That touched off frantic plans to rescue the agent, involving the FBI, the DEA and the U.S. Embassy in Bogota.

Before a rescue could be attempted, one of Pena-Pena's lieutenants found the agent's U.S. law enforcement credentials and badge in his abandoned hotel room and alerted the drug ring leader, officials said.

The agent was released shortly afterward, presumably because Pena-Pena and his confederates believed "killing a U.S. federal agent would've brought more attention to them than they wanted," said Immigration and Customs Enforcement spokesman Dean Boyd.

The indictments announced Friday were part of an ongoing investigation of drug and money laundering trafficking between Colombia and the United States.

So far, the investigation has resulted in the seizure of numerous foreign and domestic bank accounts with values totaling $3.1 million and an estimated 1,900 kilograms of cocaine.

U.S. Indicts 56 On Drug, Laundering Charges (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 7, 2006

Federal authorities yesterday announced the indictment of 56 persons on drug-smuggling and money-laundering charges, 27 of whom were arrested for their purported links to international drug cartels.

The arrests were part of "Operation Watusi," coordinated by U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) and the Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA), along with the FBI's "Operation Green Traketon" -- operating under the Organized Crime Drug Enforcement Task Force.

The investigations focused on drug cartels that operated in Puerto Rico, Colombia, St. Martin, Netherlands Antilles, the U.S. Virgin Islands, the British Virgin Islands and the Dominican Republic.

ICE spokesman Dean Boyd said simultaneous arrests took place in several countries. Numerous foreign and domestic bank accounts were seized, along with $3.1 million cash, about 4,000 pounds of cocaine and six boats.

According to one of the indictments, a purported leader of one of the organizations, Luis Pena-Pena, coordinated the kidnapping of an undercover ICE agent in Medellin, Colombia, in December. The indictment also said a ransom of $2 million was requested for the release of the undercover agent.

The purported drug traffickers, who thought they were dealing with a drug smuggler, later discovered the kidnapped man was a U.S. drug agent and he was released.

"We will leave no stone unturned in hunting down those that kidnap and threaten undercover ICE agents. In this case, our agent was fortunate to escape with his life," said Homeland Security Assistant Secretary Julie B. Myers, who heads ICE.

Two of eight indictments in the probe said the cartel members and their co-conspirators coordinated the transportation of multimillion-dollar shipments of cocaine from South America to Puerto Rico via boat. Seven of the eight indictments accused cartel members of laundering the narcotics proceeds through various financial transactions.

Mr. Boyd said the cash was laundered through a complex money-laundering scheme known as the "Black Market Peso Exchange."

During the investigation, Mr. Boyd said federal agents were able to infiltrate money-laundering and drug-trafficking organizations, identifying the source of the drugs, the foreign and domestic drug transporters, a distributor and money launderers. As a result of the simultaneous arrests, he said, federal agents dismantled several drug-trafficking and money-laundering organizations.

Arrest 3 Dominicans In Breakup Of A Major Drug Ring (DOMT)

Dominican Today, October 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0077068

SANTO DOMINGO. - The National Drugs Control Agency (DNCD) assisted by authorities in 6 countries captured three Dominicans implicated in a powerful international network that introduced large shipments of cocaine to the United States, and which used Puerto Rico as springboard for its operations.

The international operation leading to the arrests included the U.S., Colombia, Saint Martin and Dominican Republic, helped by the DEA, to end the illicit maneuvers capturing 33 of 56 narcotics traffickers, including the Dominican-born Ramirez Santana Leon, Toribio Jiménez and Woady Audry Lopez.

DNCD president Rafael Ramirez made the announcement this morning. "The arrest of those individuals was possible because of follow-up given for more than one year, jointly with the DEA (the U.S. Drugs Enforcement Administration) on these for being linked to the network that introduced thousands of kilos of cocaine to the United States," through Puerto Rico, he said

He said that for 6 months simultaneous operations were conducted in the U.S. Virgin Islands, Puerto Rico, Saint Martin and Dominican Republic, as well as in British possessions in the Caribbean, with the arrests of more than 50 narcotics traffickers, which used speedboats to take drug shipments to the neighboring island, from were they were sent to different points of the American territory.

From the members of the international ring were seized 1,900 kilos of cocaine, US$3 million, 6 boats and 131 large bank accounts with high sums in dollars were frozen, in just one operation. They will face charges of conspiracy, drugs distribution and import, in addition to money laundering.

The Dominican detainees, who in the next hours will be given in extradition, were part of that band which directed and controlled the transport of cocaine to the U.S., coming from Colombia, task in which also used light boats, according to the investigation that culminated in the arrest of the fugitives. They face several charges in a San Juan Federal Court.

DNCD spokesman Roberto Lebrón said that from the exchange of information "we are convinced that those three individuals are the ringleaders in the country of that network of narcotics traffickers," which are being held in the DNCD compound. The arrests took place simultaneously in La Romana, Santiago and Puerto Plata, cities where the Agency's special units went to capture them.

Lopez, detained in Santiago, had in his possession 8 cellphones, a pistol, two luxury SUVs, and several deeds of properties worth millions, whereas Jiménez was arrested in his vehicle in La Romana, and was carrying a pistol. In his house there were two nautical charts and several rental contracts of buildings located in the Bayahibe resort area.

For his part, Santana de Leon, arrested in front of a restaurant in Puerto Plata's Malecon, had a pistol, among other personal documents.

"These three people will be extradited to the U.S.A. so that they face charges of drug shipments occupied in that country," Lebron said.

A federal Prosecutor in Puerto Rico, Rosa Emilia Rodriguez, and the Police confirmed that the ring was directed in Colombia by Gregorio González (El Flaco), who is under arrest in Bogota and would be extradited to the U.S.A.

Another ringleader is also the Colombian Luis Peña Peña.

Of the arrests 18 were conducted in San Juan, Puerto Rico, where the network had its operations center and 3 in Santo Domingo.

Up In Smoke (TRACYP)

By Written By Phil Hayworth

Tracy Press, October 10, 2006

Tracy joins the rank of NorCal towns with major marijuana busts, as four men are arrested for turning local houses into high-end pot farms.

Gutierrez/Tracy Press - CAUGHT:Three people were arrested at this house on Deer Run Lane this week for allegedly growing marijuana inside the house. Two other houses were also targeted by law enforcement for illegal drug activity.

Tracy police busted three sophisticated indoor marijuana growing operations this week, complete with grow lights, automatic watering systems, climate controls and ventilation systems.

The homes were nestled among some of Tracy's priciest and newest homes — and just yards from playgrounds packed with children.

"And at this point, we suspect there are more in Tracy," said Sgt. Mark Duxbury of the Tracy Police Department's Street Crimes Unit.

Investigators think the pot houses could be linked to a regional, organized pot-growing syndicate stretching from Sacramento to Tracy.

DOJ_NMG_0077069

At dusk Tuesday and Wednesday, detectives from the Tracy Police Department's Street Crimes Unit swooped in on three homes in the neighborhoods of Glenbriar Circle, Whispering Wind Drive and Deer Run Lane, netting 666 marijuana plants and thousands of dollars in loose cash.

Four men were arrested and booked into the San Joaquin County Jail in French Camp for conspiracy, cultivation of marijuana and possession of marijuana for sale.

"Just based on the plants' sizes, they were growing for at least two months," Duxbury said. "The quality of the plant was very impressive, actually — well-groomed, well-maintained, to the point where they had maximum buds."

He said many of the plants were only weeks from harvest.

County officials generally estimate that a single pot plant can be worth up to $6,000 in harvested marijuana. That puts the haul from the Tracy busts at just under $4 million.

Sold on the street, potent pot can bring anywhere from $650 to $900 an ounce, Duxbury said.

Tracy police are investigating whether the Tracy operations are connected to 41 other home-based pot operations busted from late June through late September in Sacramento, Elk Grove and Stockton.

"It was so obvious," said a Deer Run neighbor. "The windows were all blacked out and they had water hoses coming out their front doors out onto the lawn."

The neighbor, who wished to remain anonymous, said that Tracy police knew about the pot operation and figured police were biding their time until they could make physical arrests, not just seizing plants.

The first house hit by police Tuesday evening was a new house in the 1600 block of Whispering Wind, where 260 plants were recovered and a 2006 Chevrolet panel van was seized.

The second search warrant, executed on the 400 block of Glenbriar Circle, turned up 249 plants and about $1,000 in cash. A 2004 Audi was also seized. Wathanack Suon, 23, of Tracy, was arrested there and booked into county jail for the cultivation of marijuana, possession of marijuana for sale, and theft of utilities.

The third search warrant was executed on the 1500 block of Deer Run Lane where 157 plants were recovered and a Honda Civic was seized. Tung Nguyen, 30, of San Jose, was arrested inside of the residence; Christopher Truong, 18, of Sunnyvale and Hiep Tran, 19, of San Jose, were arrested after they fled the residence on foot and were located while hiding in nearby yards.

Nguyen, Truong and Tran were booked into San Joaquin County Jail for conspiracy, cultivation of marijuana and possession of marijuana for sale. Nguyen was also charged with violation of parole.

Tracy detectives are working with investigators from neighboring jurisdictions and agents from the Drug Enforcement Agency. A DEA agent from Sacramento told local media last month that recent growing operations were the most organized crime syndicate ever investigated in this area.

The past two months, eight people have been arrested and more than a thousand pounds of marijuana have been seized from the houses in Stockton, Elk Grove and the Natomas area of Sacramento.

Meth arrest

In a separate incident, Street Crimes detectives arrested 45-year-old Alfred Santana on Sept. 29 for possession of a half-pound of methamphetamine at his home in the 300 block of Yosemite. Street value of the drug was about $10,000, Duxbury said.

Detectives also seized $2,655 in cash and Santana's methamphetamine price sheet. Santana was booked into county jail for possession of a controlled substance for sale and for committing a felony while out of custody on a pending felony matter. He is being held on $1 million bail.

It was the third time in a year that Street Crimes detectives arrested Santana while possessing more than a half-pound of methamphetamine during each incident.

Medical Pot Has Cities In A Bind (RPE)

By Paige Austin, The Press-Enterprise

Riverside (CA) Press-Enterprise, October 10, 2006

As Norco Mayor Pro Tem Harvey Sullivan voted for a 45-day moratorium on medical-marijuana dispensaries this month, it was with mixed emotions.

Sullivan is battling prostate cancer. More than ever, he understands the pain that drives patients to cannabis for relief. At the same time, he leads a city battling to deal with the drug and alcohol abuse that has led to an increase in traffic fatalities -- particularly among youths. Conflicting state and federal laws on the legality of medical-marijuana use further complicate the matter for city leaders.

"I'm not sure what to think," he said. "I could go either way."

DOJ_NMG_0077070

His dilemma is not unique. It's playing out throughout the region and the state.

Last week, Riverside County supervisors imposed a ban on marijuana dispensaries in unincorporated areas and joined other counties such as San Bernardino, Merced and San Diego in a court challenge of state medical-marijuana laws. California voters approved marijuana use for medical purposes in 1996, but it is still illegal at the federal level. The federal government has not determined that marijuana serves a medical purpose and views it as a "gateway drug," enticing users to harder drugs.

District Attorney Grover Trask has said he won't prosecute patients who use marijuana in accordance with state laws. A handful of Inland cities, including Palm Desert and Palm Springs, are considering ordinances to restrict or regulate cannabis distribution. Other cities such as Corona have already enacted moratoriums and have gone so far as to seek a restraining order against a dispensary within the city.

"The state has mandated cities and counties to find a way for it to be distributed without having illegal drug houses," Sullivan said. "The people voted on it. Now we need to find the right way for it to be dispensed under a doctor's supervision. I'd rather see it sold somewhere like Sav-on than some tattoo parlor on the corner."

No one has currently sought a business license for a dispensary or cannabis co-op in Norco, but city officials hope to establish guidelines before one tries to come in.

Cities were looking to the county to establish regulations they could also adopt, but now that the county is challenging the state, the cities are left on their own to figure it out, said Ryan Michaels, of Inland Empire Patient Advocates. The group has worked with several Inland cities on ordinances that regulate while protecting patient rights.

Michaels is also the director of Healing Nations Collective, a Corona medical-marijuana dispensary fighting the city in court to stay open.

A lot of cities don't even know it's legal for patients with a medical-marijuana prescription to grow their own cannabis, he said. Michaels wants cities to encourage open communication between law enforcement and dispensaries. He advocates requiring business licenses for co-ops with seven or more members.

However, city leaders fear that such places attract crime, are difficult to regulate and are vulnerable to abuse.

Last week local authorities working with the federal Drug Enforcement Administration raided a medical-marijuana dispensary and seized drugs and cash as part of an investigation into illegal distribution linked to Palm Springs Caregivers.

Norco resident Pat Overstreet said she has trouble accepting the idea of medicinal-marijuana distribution because of the potential for abuse.

"As a (registered nurse), I know there are some situations where marijuana will help people with acute pain and nausea," she said. "But the potential for abuse is truly what's so scary about this."

$58,000 A Quarter For Electricity? (TIMESO)

By LA Notebook By Chris Ayres

Times Online, October 10, 2006

Stone me, now I remember why . . .

THE SMELL was musty and sour, enough to make your eyes water. “I think there might be a skunk in here,” I said, trying not to breathe.

“Not quite,” coughed the owner of the office building in which I was considering renting a cubicle. “We have the other kind of skunk here: marijuana. The medical stuff.” There was a long, pungent silence. Before I could ask for urgent clarification, my future landlord cut me off: “There’s a licensed dispensary on the floor below. Don’t worry: it’s completely legal. You might enjoy the odour after a while.” I took the cubicle.

And so, for a few relaxed, hungry, and generally unproductive months, my workspace was directly above one of LA’s hundred or so medical marijuana dispensaries, also known as clinics or “clubs”.

It has been exactly ten years since California made it legal for individuals to grow and use marijuana for medicinal purposes, thus creating the dubious legal no man’s land in which the dispensaries are tolerated. Owners of these outlets argue that growing pot plants (not to be confused with potted plants) is a difficult business, and that their 150,000 or so customers, many of them with terminal cancer, have little energy for horticulture.

Nevertheless, they’ve demonstrated considerable savvy in their marketing of the weed, such as marijuana-laced snacks and drinks with strangely familiar brand names: Pot Tarts, Munchy Way, Toka-Cola, Stoney Rancher. Not everyone believes they are in it entirely to help the infirm.

The problem, of course, is that while California might be all funky and liberal on this issue (Governor Arnold Schwarzenegger used to smoke marijuana openly before going to the gym) the Feds are not. This has created a tricky state-federal stand-off in which the Drug Enforcement Administration has raided five dispensaries in the past fortnight, bringing the total number of busts this year to more than thirty. In an uncanny parallel with the popular TV sitcom Weeds (the protagonist is a dazed suburban mum who sells pot to maintain her Land Rover lifestyle), one of these raids took place at a house in the posh San Francisco suburb of Elk Grove.

Outside, the house looked like any other suburban box. Inside, it had been gutted to make way for an indoor pot farm: the skunk odour was vented and filtered in the attic, while electricity for the grow-lights was tapped illegally from the grid. The latter strategy was necessary because the Feds are often made suspicious by humungous electricity bills (another growhouse was raided last week after a quarterly meter reading showed that $58,000 was due).

It's tempting to see all this as a typical case of the Bush Administration versus the Left Coast. But predictions of a culture war are probably overdone. California's pot clubs have resulted in virtually zero extra demand overall for the drug. According to the Government's 2005 national survey on drug use and health, about 8 per cent of Americans aged 12 or older use illegal drugs, a figure that has remained unchanged over recent years. Meanwhile, the use of marijuana among kids between 12 and 17 is actually falling. Sociologists need only watch Weeds to see why: pot smokers are middle-aged; sometimes beyond middle-aged. Stoners are the new real ale bores. Marijuana is so inoffensive, you can find copies of High Times magazine in your dentist's waiting room.

Here's my theory: even conservatives now accept the theory that brain chemistry can be altered by just about anything, from a three-mile run to a slice of chocolate cake. And as the wealth, leisure time and age of the US population grows, so too does the desire to tinker with that chemistry, especially if it can make life more pleasant.

Aldous Huxley predicted all this in Brave New World, in which it was "soma" that kept everyone feeling hunky-dory. So why the raids by the Feds, or the lawsuits by certain counties to overturn California's liberal policy? The former is a case of going after the most obnoxious profiteers (one dispensary was making $2 million a year). The latter is usually a simple case of Not In My Back Yard.

Which brings me back to that cubicle I rented. I've never found much appeal in marijuana, so the novelty of the stink wore off quickly. I didn't stay long. Does that make me a Nimby? I like to think not. The People of California can get as baked as they want in my back yard.

But please, not under my desk.

Med Marijuana Moratorium Will Stay In Palm Springs, Dispensary Open (PSDS)

The Desert Sun, October 10, 2006

Springs Caregivers, the medical marijuana dispensary located next to Toucan's in North Palm Springs, is back open today after being closed by a Drug Enforcement Administration raid earlier this week.

About 30 medical marijuana activists and patients attended a Medical Marijuana Task Force meeting this evening at city hall to voice their support for continued access to the drug legalized for medical use in California in 1996 by Proposition 215.

Palm Springs Caregivers reopened today about 11 a.m. DEA agents had served a search warrant on the dispensary after someone they say is connected to the dispensary left a "tip" of a marijuana edible for a worker at the Spa Resort Casino in downtown Palm Springs.

The Palm Springs Medical Marijuana Task Force is meeting to consider the city's approach to an ordinance regarding the drug. Currently, a moratorium in effect until March prohibits any new dispensaries from opening but "grandfathers in" the two existing Palm Springs sites, one on North Palm Canyon and one, Collective Apothocary of Palm Springs (CAPS) closer to the heart of downtown at 333 Palm Canyon Drive.

Inside The Beltway (WT)

By John McCaslin

The Washington Times, October 10, 2006

A battle for the title of the finest neighborhood is brewing -- historic Georgetown versus suburban McLean -- although it's starting to smell of politics.

We turn to the current issue of the Georgetowner, a local newspaper that didn't take kindly to the New Republic's recent magazine headline: "So long, Georgetown. McLean is the new home of America's ruling class."

Wouldn't you know The Washington Post next ran with the story "and all but declared it official," the Georgetowner notes in an editorial.

Not to be outdone, the editors of the local paper are offering their own partisan perspective on the two diverse communities, stating in part: "When you enter McLean, Va., ... one of the first things you see is a huge green sign declaring, 'George Bush Center for Intelligence.' This is your clue to turn around and go no further. ...

DOJ_NMG_0077072

"When you grocery shop at the McLean Safeway, you run into Newt Gingrich, Ken Starr and Bill Kristol. When you shop at the Georgetown Safeway, you run into the likes of George Stephanopoulos, Elizabeth Taylor, Kitty Kelley, and Madeleine Albright. Now, I ask you, whom would you rather say hello to?"

The editors go on to recall that John F. Kennedy once lived in Georgetown, while "Dick Cheney and his wife lived in McLean when he was a top official at Halliburton. Colin Powell, secretary of state under George W. Bush, lives in McLean. Madeleine Albright, secretary of state under Bill Clinton, lives in Georgetown."

Finally, nobody should be surprised to read that Georgetown has a population of 14,000, 12,000 of whom are Democrats.

US Worries Opium From Afghanistan Will Enter US Market (VOA)

By Stephanie Ho

Voice of America, October 10, 2006

A top U.S. counter-narcotics official says U.S. drug agencies are working with other international drug enforcement agencies to try to prevent heroin from Afghanistan from reaching drug users in the United States.

Afghan boys tend a poppy field while their father supervises on the outskirts of LashkargahThe figures speak for themselves. In the past few years, as opium poppy eradication efforts in other countries have met with a measure of success, post-Taleban Afghanistan has emerged as the world's leading, and nearly only, supplier of heroin.

The U.N. Office on Drugs and Crime published a survey in September on opium poppy cultivation in Afghanistan, which it said has risen 59 percent since 2005. The report called the 6,100 tons of opium harvested in Afghanistan this year "unprecedented," and said revenue from the harvest will exceed $3 billion.

Opium is used to make the drug heroin. The White House drug control policy director, John Walters, said opium poppy eradication efforts have been fruitful in Mexico and South America, the main sources for heroin in the United States. But he added that U.S. agencies, such as the Drug Enforcement Administration, are worried that those suppliers could replaced by Afghanistan.

"It is a danger," said John Walters. "It is a danger we have not seen in large amount recently. In the past, Southwest Asia has been a source of heroin in the United States. And, there are world markets. So, we are trying to work carefully, DEA [Drug Enforcement Administration] and other international enforcement agencies, in watching this."

He spoke in an interview shown Sunday on C-SPAN, a private, non-profit network that broadcasts Congressional proceedings and other Washington political events on cable television.

Walters said the United States has a two-pronged approach in dealing with heroin from Afghanistan.

"What we are trying to do is both be vigilant to cut off efforts to move it here, but, over time, if we are not successful in reducing supply, you would expect there would be some increased flow here - and there can be some flow here - but we are going to both try to cut off that flow and, of course, first and foremost, cut off that production source," he said.

Shortly after the U.N. report was released, the State Department's Thomas Schweich told reporters in Brussels that U.S. officials believe aggressive eradication of opium poppies in Afghanistan is crucial. He added that "it is very difficult to interdict heroin and opium paste," which he described as "hidden cargo" that moves through "porous borders" and through "rough, desolate terrain."

U.S. officials say the Taleban is encouraging opium growing in the southern Helmand Province, where American and NATO troops are battling a persistent insurgency.

The assistant secretary of state for narcotics and law enforcement, Anne Patterson, told Congress last month that the Taleban is also protecting drug routes and traffickers. She said, whether the Taleban is getting revenue from the drug trade, or just encouraging an anti-government statement is not clear.

Meanwhile, the White House's John Walters says the good news is that, as global eradication and interdiction efforts have been successful, the purity of heroin available worldwide has gone down. At the same time, another factor he pointed to as a positive sign is that prices for opium actually have gone up, suggesting diminished supply. E-mail This Article

IMMIGRATION:

Court Tests Await Cities' Laws On Immigrants (USAT)

By Laura Parker, Usa Today

USA Today, October 9, 2006

Cities and towns that have passed local laws aimed at driving out illegal immigrants are gearing up for court fights over whether they will be allowed to enforce them.

DOJ_NMG_0077073

The key battles are being waged in Hazelton, Pa., Riverside, N.J. and Valley Park, Mo. Civil rights and business groups sued after each of those cities made it illegal to employ or rent housing to illegal immigrants. The lawsuits say the ordinances are discriminatory.

The court action has put the small communities at the forefront of a national debate over what to do about the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants in the USA at a time when Congress is considering a range of border security initiatives. If Hazelton, Riverside and Valley Park prevail in court, dozens of communities from Massachusetts to California are poised to follow their lead with similar ordinances.

More than 30 city councils have passed or are considering local measures aimed at curbing illegal immigrants' access to housing, voting and jobs. At the state level, lawmakers in 33 states have passed 78 bills, most of them imposing restrictions similar to the city measures, the National Conference of State Legislatures says.

The laws challenge a principle established by the U.S. Supreme Court, which has long held that immigration policies fall under the authority of the federal government, not that of cities, counties or states. Local and state officials have pushed these measures because, they say, illegal immigrants are straining the budgets of local schools, hospitals and police.

"I am prepared to fight this to the highest court in the country if we have to," says Hazelton Mayor Lou Barletta.

He says he gets calls every day from officials in other cities who want a copy of Hazleton's new law. "It's a good ordinance that other cities can model themselves after. The message is: Illegal aliens are not welcome here."

Barletta says he proposed Hazelton's new ordinance after a series of crimes allegedly involving illegal immigrants. "Our police department is stretched beyond its limits. I've had enough."

The ordinance penalizes business owners and landlords — not the immigrants they employ or rent to — by revoking their licenses to do business.

To defend Hazleton's law, Barletta put together a legal team that includes a Philadelphia law firm and lawyers from conservative groups such as the Mountain States Legal Foundation and the Federation for American Immigration Reform.

Michael Hethmon, a lawyer for the Immigration Reform Institute in Washington, D.C., helped Hazelton rewrite the ordinance that was passed in July to give it a better chance of surviving in court. Valley Park has since adopted the Hazelton model, and Riverside is considering whether to do so.

Hethmon says he thinks the revised ordinance will pass muster in court because it "respects the powers and authorities" of local and federal governments.

The original law was vague about how a resident's immigration status would be determined. Under the revised law, the city would determine immigration status by submitting information to the federal government for verification. The revised ordinance also gives landlords and business owners three to five days to correct violations before fines and other penalties are imposed.

Some legal experts say the cities face an uphill fight.

"The line of cases stretches back 150 years in a range of situations that are analogous to what is happening now," says Michael Wishnie, a Yale Law School professor who specializes in immigration law. The Supreme Court "has made it very clear that the regulation of immigration is exclusively a federal function."

N. Korea: Nuclear Test Was Success (USAT)

From Staff And Wire Reports

USA Today, October 9, 2006

Nearby nations denounce action

North Korea said today that it had successfully conducted its first nuclear weapons test, an underground explosion that, while unconfirmed, sent neighboring countries scrambling into emergency meetings.

U.S. and South Korean intelligence detected a seismic event at a suspected nuclear test site in North Korea, White House spokesman Tony Snow said just before 2 a.m. ET today.

Snow declined to speculate on a possible U.S. response to a North Korean nuclear test.

"At this point we are not confirming a nuclear test. At this point we're still assessing the data and trying to figure out what happened," Snow said.

"We expect the U.N. Security Council to take immediate actions to respond to this unprovoked act," Snow said. "The United States is closely monitoring the situation and reaffirms its commitment to protect and defend our allies in the region."

The U.S. Geological Survey detected a magnitude-4.2 tremor late Sunday in the country's northeast region, about 240 miles from Pyongyang, the capital, according to the USGS website.

South Korea's Defense Ministry raised the alert level for its military upon hearing the news. South Korean stocks plunged following the announcement.

DOJ_NMG_0077074

North Korea's official state-run Korean Central News Agency called the test "a stirring time when all the people of the country are making a great leap forward in the building of a great, prosperous, powerful socialist nation."

"It marks a historic event as it greatly encouraged and pleased the … people that have wished to have powerful, self-reliant defense capability," it said.

The report of the test came as Japan's new prime minister, Shinzo Abe, was in China to discuss security issues. Japan said today that it would push for a tough resolution at the U.N. Security Council to force North Korea to end its nuclear program.

"If it is proven, it will be a grave threat to stability in northeast Asia, and we will file a strong protest," Chief Cabinet Secretary Yasuhisa Shiozaki said.

China said today that it firmly opposed North Korea's test, denounced it as "brazen" and demanded that the government in Pyongyang stop any action that would worsen the situation.

North Korea "has ignored the widespread opposition of the international community," China's Foreign Ministry said on its website.

Several countries have been holding talks to get the North to end its nuclear ambitions. The United States, South Korea, Japan, Russia and China had been urging North Korea to return to the six-nation talks it abandoned a year ago. The Security Council last week urged North Korea not to carry out a test.

The country pulled out of the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty in 2003 after U.S. officials accused it of a secret nuclear program, violating an earlier nuclear pact between Washington and Pyongyang.

Looking Over The Wall (NYT)

The New York Times, October 9, 2006

Congress has adjourned to plead for its re-election, having bequeathed to the nation a giant fence-building project as its official strategy for fixing the immigration problem. No doubt some voters will be reassured by the idea that covering 700 miles of the 2,000-mile southwestern border with razor wire and floodlights will solve this thing once and for all. But many others will continue to suspect that it is more complicated than that.

With a better start, this election year could have featured a rational debate about immigration policy that went beyond xenophobia and the fear of disorder caused by the presence of immigrant day laborers on suburban street corners. Americans — particularly those struggling to find decent jobs themselves — have a reasonable concern about what effect the presence of so many unplanned-for workers has had on the economy. They deserved to hear that talked about in a realistic way.

Last month the Center for Immigration Studies, a group that wants to reduce immigration, released a study that found that a sharp immigration increase in the last five years corresponded with a steep decline in the employment of young native-born Americans, particularly black men without high school diplomas. Last week in The Times, Rachel Swarns reported on the ways the booming population of Latinos in the Deep South — particularly Georgia — had left many black Americans resentful of the immigrants' comparative success.

But there is compelling evidence that instead of harming the economy, unskilled immigrants prop it up, filling jobs that better-educated Americans do not want and giving everyone access to cheaper goods and services. The case made by the Center for Immigration Studies is rebutted by other studies that have found that there is no nationwide pattern of job displacement by illegal immigrants, and that immigration has broadly been a net plus to the nation. In Georgia, immigrant labor has kept textile mills, farms and service industries humming.

Right now across America, fruit is rotting on the ground because the crackdown along the border has created a shortage of immigrant workers needed for the harvest. Nevertheless, it is impossible to ignore stories of poor American workers who believe that their livelihoods were undermined by immigrants willing to work for below-subsistence wages, and of honest employers who could not compete with unscrupulous competitors using undocumented workers.

These serious problems will not be solved at the border with Mexico. Setting things right means adopting policies that fence-obsessed members of Congress have not exactly championed, like raising the minimum wage, improving public education, having a progressive income tax and making sure that workers' rights are protected.

These are only a few reasonable solutions. A host of others is offered in a new report by the Migration Policy Institute, in which Lee Hamilton, the former congressman, and Spencer Abraham, the former senator and energy secretary, argue that immigration needs to be seen as an integral element of a national economic policy. It is a resource to be embraced and managed, with a lawful, orderly flow of workers governed by flexible quotas set by a national commission advising Congress.

It's a comprehensive approach and then some. It offers a new way of framing a stalled debate. The wall builders have made their point, and it's a lousy one. Now it is time for those who want serious immigration reform to look beyond them.

Study: South Texas Leads In Taking Violators To Trial, But Hasn't Always (MON)

DOJ_NMG_0077075

Monitor, October 10, 2006

McALLEN — Federal prosecutors in South Texas are taking immigration violators to court more often than prosecutors in any other part of the country, according to a recent study.

The next closest numbers come from California's Southern District, which covers San Diego, the busiest port of entry in the United States. That district had 112 immigration prosecutions in June, compared with 155 for the Southern District of Texas.

The majority of the local cases come from Department of Homeland Security agencies, such as the U.S. Border Patrol and U.S. Customs and Border Protection, for people apprehended on charges like illegally re-entering the country, impersonating a U.S. citizen and human smuggling.

In fact, Texas' Southern District, based in Houston, has led the country in the number of immigration prosecutions for five years, according to the study from the Transactional Records Clearing House.

TRAC, a research center that focuses on how government operates, specifically agencies like the FBI, Drug Enforcement Administration and the Department of Homeland Security, regularly looks at immigration data it requests from the government and analyzes it for patterns.

The latest numbers available are for June 2006.

The number of immigration cases taken to court could be even higher by next year.

President Bush recently approved $2 million to hire up to 25 new federal prosecutors who would exclusively deal with immigration violations in border districts.

The Southern District has about 150 assistant U.S. attorneys who at any given moment manage as many as 100 cases.

When and how many will be added to Texas' Southern District is unclear, according to its spokesman, John Yembrick.

He referred all calls about immigration statistics to the Department of Justice.

But a high number of immigration convictions has not always been the case in South Texas.

According to TRAC, fiscal year 2004 proved to be a turning point for the district. The number of convictions in the district that were tied to immigration violations went from 304 in fiscal year 2003 to 13,778 in fiscal year 2004.

The majority of immigration cases originated with the DHS. As other federal agencies contribute fewer cases that lead to prosecution and conviction, DHS is contributing a growing number of cases, according to TRAC.

DHS referred 18,092 cases to federal prosecutors in South Texas — four times as many as Texas' Western District, which had the next largest number.

Mexico May Take Fence Dispute To U.N. (AP-Y)

By Jenny Barchfield, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 10, 2006

Mexico's foreign secretary said Monday the country may take a dispute over U.S. plans to build a fence on the Mexican border to the United Nations.

Luis Ernesto Derbez told reporters in Paris, his first stop on a European tour, that a legal investigation was under way to determine whether Mexico has a case.

The Mexican government last week sent a diplomatic note to Washington criticizing the plan for 700 miles of new fencing along the border. President-elect Felipe Calderon also denounced the plan, but said it was a bilateral issue that should not be put before the international community.

Derbez said Monday after meeting with French Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazy that it was a "shame" U.S. immigration policy had been used for what he claimed was a short-term political gain in the lead-up to midterm elections in the U.S. in November.

He said he discussed the issue with Douste-Blazy, and planned to bring it up in meetings with his Spanish and Italian counterparts during visits to Madrid and Rome. He vowed to work on the case until the "very last day" of President Vicente Fox's term, which ends Dec. 1.

The U.S. Senate approved the border fence bill last month and President Bush has said he will sign it into law — despite last-minute pleas from the Mexican government for a veto.

"What should be constructed is a bridge in relations between the two countries," Derbez said.

A Public Frustrated With Judges Who Use Their Benches As Thrones (WSJ)

WSJ, October 10, 2006

If "the breadth and intensity of rage currently being leveled at the judiciary" is "unmatched in American history," there is more than likely a reason, and that reason is more than likely expressed by Sandra Day O'Connor's praise for judicial minimalism in "The Threat to Judicial Independence" (editorial page, Sept. 27). Surely the judiciary's mission is broader than "checking the other two branches and protecting minority rights"; but from the perspective of heartland America, the courts have long abandoned that broader mission to engage in partisan advocacy against the majority's interests. It is simply disingenuous to argue that anger against judges is being stirred up by fanatics and opportunists while dismissing the judiciary's persistent undermining of fundamental constitutional protections, such as the right to life in Roe or private property rights in Kelo, as mere "erroneous decisions."

Justice O'Connor's argument ultimately rests on the false assumption that only the executive branch, legislature or public might pose a threat to "the complete independence of the courts." A more reasonable reading of Hamilton is that the responsibility for maintaining the distinction between the judiciary and the two other branches rests at least equally upon the judiciary. That has certainly been the opinion of the Supreme Court itself at least since Jefferson requested its advice on foreign policy and the court demurred, explaining to President Washington that there is a constitutional prohibition against such advisory opinions because they usurp legislative and executive powers.

Such reticence is hardly to be found in the commerce clause, religion clause, abortion rights or eminent domain doctrine of liberals on the current Supreme Court, or that of their most dependable ally, Sandra Day O'Connor. The result has too often been opinions like Kelo in which the rights of minorities or special interests are held to be pre-emptive and the usurpation of legislative and executive powers by the judiciary the means to a socially desirable end. Perhaps the public's anger toward the bench is simply a reasonable response to decades of unprincipled jurisprudence.

Edward H. Stewart Jr.

Austin, Texas

Justice O'Connor sets up a straw-man argument when she decries the intimidation of judges and quotes federal appeals-court judge David B. Sentelle as saying that "'Judges must be free to make judicial decisions without the fear of physical harm to themselves or to members of their families.'" Of course. Only those beyond the pale of reason would disagree.

But there is a deeper issue embedded in her recognition that there is an all-too-pervasive lack of trust in judges -- both state and federal. All too many judges have lost sight of their responsibility of interpreting law, not making it. And, all too often, the appointing powers -- presidents, governors, and, in many states, the electorate -- select judges precisely because they expect those judges will "make law" favorable to appointing powers' political agendas.

True, it is frequently a fine line between improperly making law and interpreting it, especially when legislative dictates are purposely vague (so legislators can be all things to all people), or when judges fulfill their rightful responsibility of developing the common law, which, as the name denotes, grew out of what the community believed were proper rules for society.

While I join Justice O'Connor's decrying of threats to judges, I also recognize that many of those threats are largely -- and irrationally -- born of a frustration with judges who use their benches as thrones from which to impose their own social, religious or economic views.

I am a retired U.S. Bankruptcy Court judge. What has set this country apart from many other less free countries in the world, and has given us an unparalleled measure of prosperity, is the fact that we have a judicial system that has protected personal and property rights and enforced contractual obligations. I heard a former Nobel laureate in economics state that he declined to further consult in Russia because of that country's lack of a judicial system to enforce property and contract rights, calling Russia a "kleptocracy." In the U.S., groups such as the one discussed by Justice O'Connor in her commentary -- JAIL 4 Judges -- and members of Congress who seek to upset the delicate balance forged by our founding fathers attack the very thing which has set us apart from less successful societies. This proposed "cure" is much more dangerous than the imagined "malady".

Judge William T. Bodoh

Justice O'Connor sounds a trenchant alarm about modern threats to judicial independence, a bulwark of American democracy. She accurately admonishes that when judicial independence is compromised so is our system of government. One major threat in the federal system comes from the coordinate legislative and executive branches, a phenomenon witnessed by frayed relations between the courts and Congress. On Sept. 19, the judiciary took important steps to improve those relations. The Judicial Conference, the courts' policymaking arm, issued rules on "judicial junkets" and on computerized conflict of interest checks. The Breyer Committee simultaneously issued a thorough report on the judicial misconduct and discipline system, which included constructive suggestions for improvement. The judiciary must continue to institute measures for policing itself. If judges do not undertake self-regulation, Congress will enter the breach and legislate in ways that could jeopardize judicial independence.

The reality is that plenty of judges have taken on a lawmaking duties to shape the world to conform to their beliefs, opinions, and values. Ms. O'Connor fails to describe that the founders did not intend this, nor did they write it into the constitution. The activities of JAIL 4 Judges seem like a natural reaction to judges gone wild.

Justice O'Connor cites Federalist No. 78 and Alexander Hamilton for the proposition that the Framers intended an independent judiciary. Maybe so, but I defy her to find in the Constitution a provision that states that the Supreme Court has the final say on what is constitutional. That power was arrogated to the Supreme Court by the legerdemain of John Marshall in McCullough v. Maryland. That was the first hole in the dike.

Ms. O'Connor finds it particularly troubling that other judges are critical of the Supreme Court. When the Supreme Court allows the use of race to achieve balance in an otherwise color blind society (University of Michigan case), and when the court cites foreign law for the proposition that it is uncivilized to execute a person under age 18 (Roper v. Simmons), the justices are not making judicial decisions but rather legislative ones.

Build a Wall Big Enough to Keep the Illegals Out

In your Sept. 21 editorial "The Great Wall of America" you opposed my proposal for a wall on our southern border stating, "Nor will a wall deter illegal workers, who are drawn here by the powerful magnetic pull of economic opportunity and plentiful jobs." How do you know that? We have never tried to build an effective barrier across the border that is difficult to tunnel under or scale.

The way the system works now, various federal agencies must sort the needles called terrorists and violent criminals from the massive haystack of illegal humanity. The system doesn't work. The fact remains that four million people a year illegally cross our southern border.

The U.S. has no shortage of labor and would not have one if all illegals went home. Department of Labor statistics show that there are 69 million Americans between the ages of 16-74, who are simply not in the workforce. They represent 10 Americans for each illegal worker.

According to a research report compiled by the Pew Hispanic Center last March, the illegal workforce numbers 6.9 million. Illegals, then, represent 4.9% of our workforce of 141 million people, according to Labor. Because of lack of education and low skills, only 2.2% of our GDP is produced by illegal labor.

You took issue with my statement that we should install wire on top of the wall and electrify it as a deterrent because I said, "We do this with livestock all of the time." You contend I've equated "people with cattle." No, I've equated an effective fence with an effective wall. We already do this with livestock and people. There are installations of electric wire on fences and walls all across America -- water treatment plants, salvage yards and car dealerships, to name a few. If electric wire is an acceptable deterrent to American citizens, then it's acceptable as a deterrent to those who would steal the benefits of American citizenship.

Congress Accomplished More Than You Realize

Your Oct. 2 editorial "The GOP Record" says the 109th Congress didn't get much done. But from the business community's perspective, it was one of the most productive sessions in recent memory. Consider: transportation reauthorization directed much-needed resources to the nation's infrastructure; the Class Action Fairness Act discouraged frivolous lawsuits; the Dominican Republic-Central American Free Trade Agreement lowered trade barriers for U.S. companies; and legislation was passed that increased small business expensing, strengthened the pension system, stiffened anti-counterfeiting laws and reformed the bankruptcy code.

While achieving a great deal, this Congress did leave a lot on the table, including comprehensive immigration reform, extension of vital tax cuts and implementation of a national energy strategy. But on the whole, it was more "can do" than "do nothing."

Group Formed to Stop Politicization of Science

Your Oct. 6 editorial "Under the Microscope" (Taste page, Weekend Journal) regarding Scientists and Engineers for America (SEA), a new 527 organization committed to restoring integrity to science policy, confuses nonpartisan with bipartisan -- SEA is a bipartisan group. The central thesis of the organization is that science has an established method of determining fact through an open process of debate and that no fact or theory is unassailable.

We agree that the best science flows from questioning. Yet your editorial suggests that SEA's real mission is to close debate on science when the truth is exactly the opposite. That is why SEA's membership soared to more than 1,000 members in the first 24 hours of the group's launch. You are also dismissive of allegations that members of the White House and Congress are guilty of unscientific, special interest-driven policymaking on global warming, stem cell research and the "Plan B" morning-after pill. It complains that scientists have become political in their effort to stop the assault on fact-based decision-making at all of levels of government.

SEA was formed to stop the politicization of science and ensure that the scientific voice is heard in policy debates and not marginalized, misstated or censured.

College Fracas Over Minuteman; Questions About Paying For Wall (WSJ)

By Jennifer Johnson And Aaron Rutkoff

The Wall Street Journal, October 10, 2006

Border Lines is a regular look at the best writing on the immigration debate from around the Web. (Some links may require registration or subscription.) * * *

BAD EDUCATION: The appearance of Minuteman Project founder Jim Gilchrist was met with violence last week at Columbia University when the pro-enforcement hardliner attempted to address a Republican student group. The melee began just minutes after Mr. Gilchrist rose to speak, according to Columbia Spectator reporter Laura Brunts1. "Two students in the International Socialist Organization unfurled a yellow banner reading, 'No human being is illegal!'" she reports -- which in turn prompted other protestors and Minuteman supporters to rush the stage. (See video of the event here2.)

Mr. Gilchrist was ushered off before he could finish his speech, but he did manage to taunt the hostile audience before the riot began. "Who's a racist now?" he asked, while hugging an African-American Minuteman member. "I love the first amendment!"

After the riot, one unnamed protestor told Ms. Brunts that the disruption was planned: "I don't feel like we need to apologize or anything. It was fundamentally a part of free speech.... The Minutemen are not a legitimate part of the debate on immigration." Subsequently, as the student newspaper also reported, Columbia officials said they were using postings on the social-networking site Facebook.com as part of their investigation3.

New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg chastised Columbia President Lee Bollinger, a lawyer and free-speech scholar, for failing to provide an open atmosphere on campus. "Bollinger's just got to get his hands around this," Mr. Bloomberg said on his weekly radio show4. "There's just too many incidents at the same school where people get censored." (Previously, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad was forced to cancel a speech at Columbia when school officials said they couldn't coordinate his security.)

In a statement released5 by the Minutemen afterwards, Mr. Gilchrist described the incident as "yet another indication that those who support illegal immigration are happy to use communist tactics in their intolerant determination" to deny his group their First Amendment rights. * * *

BARRIER BAIT-AND-SWITCH? Opponents of the proposal for a fence on the U.S.-Mexico border widely predicted that the initiative would not see full funding. Now, according to a report in the Arizona Republic6, Sen. John Cornyn (R., Texas) believes those critics were right. "It's one thing to authorize," he said. "It's another thing to actually appropriate the money and do it." Instead, Mr. Cornyn speculated, the fence legislation would probably be used to create a "virtual fence" comprised of increased border patrols and high-tech sensors. Why the switch? The senator explained "that 700 miles of fencing would not solve the problem of illegal immigration because it would still leave about 1,300 miles of unfenced border," according to reporter Eunice Moscoso.

In the Washington Post, staff writer Spencer S. Hsu provides details on the gaping loopholes7 surrounding the $1.2 billion set aside for border security by the new law. "[T]he House and Senate gave the Bush administration leeway to distribute the money to a combination of projects -- not just the physical barrier along the southern border. The funds may also be spent on roads, technology and 'tactical infrastructure' to support the Department of Homeland Security's preferred option of a 'virtual fence.'" To win over some Republican votes for the bill, Mr. Hsu also reports, "congressional leaders pledged in writing that Native American tribes, members of Congress, governors and local leaders would get a say in 'the exact placement' of any structure."

Mr. Bush, for his part, made no reference8 to anything like a 700-mile fence while signing the Department of Homeland Security Appropriations Act in Scottsdale, Ariz.

What's going on here? Fence supporter Mickey Kaus thinks he sees a pocket veto coming9. An Associated Press report flagged on Mr. Kaus's blog makes it clear that a second bill, the Secure Fence Act, which categorically calls for 700 miles of double-layered fencing, has not yet received Mr. Bush's signature10. * * *

OLD TOWN, NEW RULES: An influx of moneyed Northern Virginia residents are moving into the once small town of Culpeper, Va. But Steve Jenkins, a longtime Culpeper man, is more concerned about illegal immigrants. "For me, it's been like a three-year root canal -- really horrible," says Mr. Jenkins in a Washington Post piece11 by Metro columnist Marc Fisher. "I'm just an old country boy who really liked going into the grocery and knowing who was who. Not like now, when the illegals are off to themselves."

The growing population is creating more traffic and luring big-box retailers such as Target and Lowe's to the countryside. "Those who've moved here from Northern Virginia -- to them, this immigration thing isn't something of great significance," Mr. Jenkins says. "They're not concerned about the urbanization of Culpeper, but for those of us who've been here a long time, well, it's driving people away..." While Mr. Jenkins knows he can't get rid of his new neighbors from the north, he does believe something can be done about those from the south. "It's a much easier issue, because it's black and white," he says. "You're either legal, or you're not. We need to help them be legal. I'm not for anything harsh. If they're willing to come forward and go through a process, we have an obligation to assist them in every way. But I'm about rules." * * *

MIXED FEELINGS IN MEXICO: South of the border, despite the common perception in the U.S., Mexicans are ambivalent about the northward migration of their fellow countrymen -- and, as a result, have mixed feelings about plans for a U.S. border fence. "Mexicans feel helpless before the migrant exodus, and talk about it the same way they talk about the weather," reports L.A. Times staff writer Héctor Tobar12. "Everyone complains about it, but there's not much you can do about it." Some took the 700-mile fence authorized by the U.S. Congress as a "slap in the face that highlighted the failure of their country's leaders," Mr. Tobar reports.

There is also a widespread view that the fence initiative represents a rejection of Mexican cultural contributions to life in the U.S. And, as Mexican historian Lorenzo Meyer tells Mr. Tobar, some believe the plan runs counter the spirit of North American Free Trade agreement: "We see now that the idea of a united North America is fiction," Mr. Meyer says. "The reality is the wall."

Others, however, have expressed a more positive response to the fence plan. Guillermo Ortiz, the head of Mexico's central bank, made front-page news in his country after telling the editorial board of the Dallas Morning News13 that a fence "would not be altogether bad. It would certainly be better over the long run." The economist added: "I think Mexico needs its people." * * *

THE 'MUCHAS' MEME: Republicans have found a novel way to try to stick it to their Democratic rivals: thanking them in Spanish. Mac Collins displayed his sarcastic bilingual gratitude for incumbent Rep. Jim Marshall (D., Ga.) in this television ad14. Mr. Marshall, the ad's female announcer observes, "voted to waste our tax dollars printing election ballots in Spanish." Then, an accented male voice intones: "Muchas gracias Señor Jim Marshall."

The National Republican Senatorial Committee took the "gracias" gimmick one step further by creating an entire Web site15 devoted to thanking incumbent Sen. Debbie Stabenow (D., Mich.) in Spanish. Visitors to MuchasGraciasDebbie.com see Ms. Stabenow, decked out in a cartoon sombrero, respond to this profusion of Spanish praise with a "no problema" speech bubble. What's more, the NRSC's facetious Spanish-language Stabenow tribute site includes links to French16 and Chinese17 versions, each taking issue with different dimensions of the senator's purported voting record. * * *

CASELOAD CRUNCH: As the nation's immigration judges struggle to manage an ever-growing caseload, some judges are facing criticism over how they manage their crowded dockets. Studies highlight stark disparities in judgment, like 90% of asylum cases granted by one judge and 9% down the hall, writes New York Times reporter18 Nina Bernstein. One judge, Sandy K. Hom, is so quick and predictable in his denials of asylum that lawyers regularly advise people assigned to him to move to another state, the article says.

"In asylum cases, the wrong decision can be a death sentence. In others, banishment hangs in the balance, with the prospect of families split up or swept into harm's way," Ms. Bernstein writes.

"But before they can consider the merits of a case, judges must cope with an intricate web of laws, changing conditions in distant lands, and a mix of false and truthful testimony in 227 tongues vulnerable to an interpreter's mistake..."

The nation's 218 immigration judges face 350,000 cases a year, with New York's 27 judges taking on about 20,000, the article says.

SOUND BITES

President Bush at a White House celebration of Hispanic Heritage Month on Friday: "We must understand that you can't kick 12 million people out of your country -- that we must figure out a way to say to those that if you're lawful and if you've contributed to the United States of America, there is a way for you to eventually earn citizenship."

Enrique Morones, president of immigrant rights group Border Angels, on Arnold Schwarzenegger's immigration stance: "We always have to remember that he's an actor and ... without a doubt he is putting on an Academy Award-winning performance that he cares about the Latino community, when we know he does not."

Good Fences And Such (USNEWS)

By Angie C. Marek

U.S. News and World Report, October 9, 2006

It was a telling moment. Last week when Speaker of the House Dennis Hastert faced a battering of press questions about the congressional page scandal, he reached for a life raft: President George W. Bush's promise to sign a bill that would create 700 miles of metal fencing on the U.S.-Mexico border. "A lot of people wanted us to address the issue about the border," he told reporters, "and we did exactly that."

Really? As is so often the case in Washington, the reality wasn't as tidy as the rhetoric. Congress passed the Secure Fence Act, requiring the Department of Homeland Security to build 700 miles of steel fencing, but critics say backdoor deals have denied the project the necessary funding. In fact, the bill's fine print-and a flurry of last-minute compromises that paved the way for its passage-raise questions about what, if anything, will eventually be built. "This isn't the answer to our problems," says Angela Kelley of the National Immigration Forum. "It's empty symbolism."

On the face of it, the fence bill looks like an aggressive response. The measure adds 700 miles of fencing-split into five segments-to the roughly 75 miles of solid metal border walls already lining parts of the 1,951-mile U.S.-Mexico border. A 390-mile segment would stretch from mid-California across most of Arizona. Other chunks would block a cocaine-trafficking route near Laredo, Texas, and close a path through the Lower Rio Grande Valley once popular with Brazilian migrants. The fence is modeled on a stretch of 15-foot-high double fences-with a high-speed-access road running between them-that Rep. Duncan Hunter says slashed the number of attempted border crossings in his San Diego district after they were built in the mid-1990s. The number of arrests dropped there by almost two thirds.

Details. But what happens now isn't entirely clear. Although the Congressional Budget Office estimates it will cost $3.2 million a mile, Congress voted to hand DHS just $1.2 billion in fiscal year 2007 for construction; that would cover the cost of about 370 miles of fence, not 700. What's more, a congressional deal gives DHS the flexibility to use money for other purposes besides the wall itself, most notably technology and roadways. Some of the money could go to a project DHS was already working on: a plan to dot the border with up to 1,800 massive observation towers equipped with cameras. Michael Jackson, the No. 2 official at DHS, says the department plans "to refine and assess how much [steel fencing] we need with the new technology tool kit." DHS, he adds, will most likely build "somewhere in the ballpark" of 370 miles of San Diego-style fence.

The bill offers DHS other kinds of wiggle room on the fence as well. In a last-minute effort to appease two Republican holdouts-including Texas Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, who had concerns about local input on the location of fencing - congressional leaders committed in writing to changing some specific aspects of the legislation after the November elections. Those changes will ensure that local governments and American Indian tribes will be consulted "regarding the exact placement of the fence," according to a letter signed by Hastert and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist. The letter also says DHS will have the "flexibility to use alternative physical infrastructure and technology when fencing is ineffective or impractical." Some say that means large portions of the fence bill are basically moot. Others disagree. "A letter is just a letter," says Carolyn Weyforth, Frist's press secretary. "What comes to the floor and passes is what matters."

TAX:

As Religious Programs Expand, Disputes Rise Over Tax Breaks (NYT)

By Diana B. Henriques

The New York Times, October 10, 2006

The similarities between Holy Cross Village at Notre Dame, on the north side of South Bend, Ind., and Hermitage Estates, south of town, are almost disorienting. The two retirement communities have the same simple gabled ranch houses, with the same touches of brick and stone, clustered around a pond with the same fountain funneling spray into the air and ducks waddling down the grassy bank.

DOJ_NMG_0077081

But the retired residents of Hermitage Estates pay an average of about $2,300 per unit in property taxes. The management of Holy Cross Village, the Brothers of Holy Cross, says that development should be exempt from property taxes, and it has taken that argument to court.

As the Brothers of Holy Cross, a Roman Catholic religious order, sees it, providing the elderly with the amenities of the village — a sense of security, social opportunities and various services to make independent living easier — is a charitable activity rooted in its pastoral mission to serve others.

Members of the St. Joseph County Property Tax Assessment Board of Appeals, all but one of them lifelong Catholics, see it differently. To them, a charitable ministry does not consist of providing lovely retirement living to affluent people. The current residents of Holy Cross Village have an average net worth of $1 million. Those with deposits on the units under construction are even better off, averaging $1.6 million.

If Holy Cross Village is not taxed, members of the assessment board point out, a heavier burden will fall on the working families in the county that are struggling to pay the taxes on their small homes in careworn communities like the west side of South Bend.

"I was educated by the Brothers of Holy Cross" at St. Joseph's High School, "and I have a great deal of respect, love and affection for them," said Dennis J. Dillman, a longtime board member. "But I think what they're doing is just not right. And that is based on the values they taught me at their schools."

The conflict in South Bend echoes disputes from Alaska to Florida that raise the following issue: As religious organizations of all faiths stretch their concept of mission far beyond traditional worship, should their traditional tax exemptions expand as well? Increasingly, government at all levels is answering yes.

The property tax exemption is one of the oldest tax breaks granted to religious organizations, but it is not the only one. Lawmakers and judges have also approved what amounts to special tax treatment for religious organizations and some of their employees, including exemptions on personal-income and payroll taxes, and have made it easier for them to get tax-exempt construction loans for purely religious projects.

Like the exemptions from federal and state regulations that have proliferated for religious groups in recent years, these tax breaks are widely defended both as an acknowledgment of religion's contributions to society and as a barrier to unjustified government limitations on the liberty that religious organizations enjoy under the First Amendment.

But in some communities like South Bend, tolerance of religious tax breaks is fraying as local governments struggle to provide basic services with limited resources.

There are no national figures on how much money these tax breaks save religious organizations and on how much extra cost is shifted to other citizens. But a typical state, Colorado, reported that religious real estate valued at more than $1.1 billion was exempt from local property taxes there last year. Nationally, tax-exempt financing for religious organizations totaled at least $20 billion during the decade that ended last year.

Congressional budget records show that just the income tax breaks uniquely available for ministers, rabbis and other clergy members cost taxpayers just under $500 million a year.

And the price is almost certainly increasing, experts on taxation and congregational growth agreed, because today's larger congregations need more land, employ more clergy members and pay them more money. Moreover, the definition of a religious mission is expanding beyond schools and hospitals to include operations as obscure as a biblical theme park in Florida and as upscale as a retirement community at Notre Dame.

Every state affords some type of property-tax exemption to churches, synagogues, mosques and other religious landowners, typically through statutes that also cover charities, libraries, museums, private schools and other secular nonprofit groups. Indeed, when the Supreme Court ruled on the constitutionality of this tax break in 1970 it noted approvingly that the benefits did not fall exclusively on churches.

But those venerable tax statutes did not envision the reality of modern congregations that operate athletic programs in their own gymnasiums or fitness centers, as well as bookstores, music and video production units, coffee shops, counseling services, ice cream parlors, child care programs and multimedia ministries that beam their messages from satellite dishes or television transmission towers.

Leonard A. Wychocki, president and chief executive of the Franciscan Sisters of Chicago Service Corporation, a Catholic organization hired to manage Holy Cross Village, says religious groups should not have to defend property tax exemptions. "When there were old people on the streets of New York City and Chicago, our sisters took them in," he said. The exemption recognizes "the service such groups provide to society."

No residents of Holy Cross Village will be coming in off the streets, of course. "People pay a lot of money to live in these places," Mr. Wychocki acknowledged. "But they have a need beyond just a place to live. It's around that need that we catalyze our services."

DOJ_NMG_0077082

Financial projections show that the project, if managed well, could eventually generate a surplus. That money, the project's executives said, could help support other mission work of the Brothers of Holy Cross, including a ministry in Africa.

"If the county wants to argue that those dollars should go to west South Bend rather than West Africa, I can see their point," Mr. Wychocki said. "You may agree or disagree — but then it's your judgment, as opposed to the brothers' judgment."

He added, after an emphatic pause: "This is probably where religious freedom kicks in."

Breaks on Property Taxes

Neat homes in landscaped clusters make up the first phase of what will be 256 units at Holy Cross Village at Notre Dame. Among the new units will be additional assisted-living and skilled-nursing units to expand the existing "continuum of care," its management said. Three adjacent colleges, the University of Notre Dame among them, expand the cultural opportunities.

In style and luxury, the project compares favorably with competing retirement communities built by national developers nationwide. But there is a difference: Holy Cross Village describes itself as "a ministry of Brothers of Holy Cross." As such, it is seeking a property tax exemption from the Property Tax Assessment Board of Appeals for St. Joseph County.

That rankles Ralph J. Wolfe, an assessment board member who is a resident of Hermitage Estates, a 49-unit neighborhood of retirees whose homeowners association provides services including maintenance and lawn care.

Mr. Wolfe, 77, is a retired tax assessor and a longtime veteran of the close-knit appeals board. He said his community, like Holy Cross Village, offers its retirees some amenities. "So maybe we should get ourselves a property tax exemption."

He seemed to be teasing Terrance F. Wozniak, the deputy county attorney for St. Joseph County, who was listening. One of Mr. Wozniak's biggest worries about losing the pending battle with Holy Cross is the ripple effects on the retirement communities in the county that do pay taxes.

The Indiana courts recognize a broad definition of charity, and exemptions already have been granted to a few much smaller religious-affiliated projects that care primarily for less healthy people, Mr. Wozniak said. But this case is different, he said: "It's a case of escalation." An exemption for the charitable care of needy older citizens is being stretched to cover "more and more luxurious facilities for people who, by and large, can pay their fair share."

Each case lowers the hurdle for what constitutes a tax-exempt retirement community, he said.

The management of Holy Cross Village thinks the project's mission fits well within both the Indiana definition of a "charitable purpose" and the federal standards for tax-exempt housing providers. The federal test requires, in part, that the project "be committed by established policy" to maintaining people as residents even if they become unable to pay, as the project's investment documents explain.

There is nothing in writing that guarantees the project will keep indigent residents in place, said Lori McLaughlin, general counsel for the Franciscan Sisters management group. "It becomes a case of those guarantees bankrupting you," she said.

But in lieu of a guarantee, the management has "nuns or brothers on the board saying, 'We insist you provide care,' " Mr. Wychocki said. "It would be very rare for anybody to be asked to leave."

Holy Cross Village initially paid the taxes the county demanded, but subsequently got court permission to hold off on future payments while its appeals go forward, according to Kevin Rose, a spokesman for the project's management.

When the Brothers of Holy Cross appealed the county's ruling to the Indiana Board of Tax Review last year, it lost. "A charitable purpose involves something beyond merely successfully marketing one's services to seniors," the review board said. "It implies some level of sacrifice on the part of the entity providing those services. It is this sacrifice that separates an 'obviously charitable act' from the everyday purposes and activities of man in general."

The fight has now moved to the courts, where the project's management hopes to fare better. "We thought we were within the orbit of what was considered to merit that exemption," Mr. Wychocki said. "Now we just stand and shake our heads."

While local tax authorities have been inconsistent in their rulings, many untraditional uses of land by disparate religious organizations of many faiths have already qualified for property tax exemptions somewhere in the country.

In June, for example, the Florida Legislature passed, and Gov. Jeb Bush signed, a law that ended a five-year effort by Orange County tax authorities in Orlando to collect about $300,000 a year in property taxes from Holy Land Experience, a biblical museum and theme park that had sought exemption as a religious ministry but had been repeatedly turned down by the county.

The park, where a pass good for a week costs $35 for adults and $23 for school-age children, advertises itself as a place that "brings the world of the Bible alive." Its features include replicas of Calvary, the tomb of Jesus and the caves where the Dead Sea Scrolls were found. It also includes a period re-creation of a Jerusalem street market, with actors in costume as the merchants and buyers; and the KidVenture area, with a wilderness rock-climbing wall, a "misting station" and toy and gift shops. A cafe and two snack bars serve "real Middle Eastern fare" from couscous and falafel to Goliath Burgers.

The county property appraiser's office had insisted that the park, despite its biblical motif, was taxable, just like Disney World. The park's founder, the Rev. Marvin J. Rosenthal, argued that it was a religious mission from start to finish, aiming to introduce religion to people in an entertaining and enlightening way.

In July 2005, a local judge ruled against the county, saying the biblical park's intent was to "spread what it considers to be God's word," while the intent of Disney World "is indisputably to make money." When the county decided to appeal that decision, the ministry that operates the park lobbied successfully for relief in Tallahassee.

A spokeswoman for Governor Bush said he signed the bill "merely to prevent future legal action and provide clarification of the law" on exemptions for religious property.

In 2003, the Minnesota Tax Court granted an exemption to an elaborate fitness center owned by the Country Bible Church in Ashby, explaining that the center — which included a weight room, tanning bed, video arcade and bookstore, as well as a small auditorium and prayer room — was used to attract new church members.

The church, with about 250 members, has a broad range of programs for children and teenagers, including a day school and toddler program. But it decided in 1996 that its rural location simply did not offer enough for young people, and it conceived the Destiny Center as a place where young people could form healthy habits and "strong, godly friendships," according to its pastor.

"We've spent close to $1 million, including the building and staff, and we've never broken even," said the Rev. Steven R. Quernemoen, who founded the church 25 years ago. "But the goal is not to run a for-profit business. The goal was to open a facility that is a safe environment for young kids and families."

The two-story center, with a center gable soaring high over the entrance, opened in October 2000 a few miles from the church. Besides its fitness facilities, it has a gymnasium that offers room for rock concerts and for family events like wedding receptions, reunions or birthday parties. A day pass costs $4.69, including shower privileges. An annual family membership costs $500, but the elderly pay about half that. It is open most mornings and after school through the week, but is closed all day on Sunday.

Similarly, in 2002, the Washington State courts granted a tax exemption for the site of a religious broadcaster's transmission tower. And in January the Pennsylvania Supreme Court reversed a 1959 decision that had denied tax exemptions to parking lots that serve houses of worship.

Legislative Success

Some religious organizations have had equal success with state legislators.

The Anchorage Baptist Temple, which has grown to 4,500 members during the 35-year tenure of the Rev. Dr. Jerry Prevo, is a big, muscular church on a 20-acre campus in eastern Anchorage. Its complex includes a 2,100-seat auditorium, several gymnasiums, a television station and the Anchorage Christian Schools, which serve about 750 students from preschool to 12th grade. The church also owns an assortment of individual properties, 10 of them tax-exempt.

In April 2004, city tax assessors revoked the exemption for four church-owned homes they said did not qualify as "parsonages" because they housed church day-school teachers, not the pastors or other "spiritual leaders" specified by law.

"We are a high-profile church," said Pastor Prevo. "We were being picked on to make a public statement against tax exemptions generally."

Any group as large as Anchorage Baptist Temple would probably have no trouble getting help from state lawmakers, even if its pastor did not have his own television show and even if one of the 16 men on its pastoral staff were not treasurer of the state Republican Party. Last May, after vigorous lobbying by the congregation, the Republican-controlled Alaska Legislature passed and Gov. Frank H. Murkowski signed a bill that extends the parsonage exemption to church-owned residential property occupied by educators at private religious or parochial schools.

The exemption, which does not cover faculty housing at secular schools, has been challenged in court by the local American Civil Liberties Union.

It is a tough fight, a lawyer for several big churches said, because a legislature that can constitutionally exempt a parsonage from the tax rolls can surely extend that exemption to homes a church provides to its schoolteachers.

And back in St. Joseph County, Ind., the Granger Community Church, a large United Methodist group, took exception to the county's enforcement in 2001 of a long-overlooked law that limited the amount of tax-exempt acreage around a church to 15 acres — which left the church with 14.54 acres still on the tax rolls.

It lost in the courts but carried its fight to Indianapolis, and helped push through changes that eliminated the 15-acre cap.

Breaks on Borrowing

The Rev. Russell Lievers of the First Southern Baptist Church in Clarksville, Ind., a town of 22,000 across the Ohio River from Louisville, Ky., is understandably excited about the new fellowship hall his church is building.

DOJ_NMG_0077084

At a price of roughly $2.5 million, the facility will contain a "middle-school-sized" gymnasium, he said, as well as a kitchen, meeting areas and classroom space. It will ease crowding at the 57-year-old church and open possibilities for new athletic ministries and outreach, he added.

Pastor Lievers is not familiar with the details for financing the new facility — but he knows the church has received a good interest rate on some of the money it is borrowing. That's important, he said, because "our people are giving sacrificially" to support the new facility.

"There are people who are delaying their retirement for a few years to help us build this," he continued. "Others are postponing purchases so they can give more."

The explanation for the church's low-cost financing is simple. It is relying on $1 million in tax-exempt revenue bonds sold on its behalf by the town of Clarksville, through its economic development commission.

"It is the first time we've had a church apply," said Samuel K. Gwin, the town attorney. "But most of us here on the town council and economic development commission were familiar with the church, and the folks in the church. It's a small town."

The church bond issue is structured like any economic development deal: the town sells tax-exempt bonds to an investor — in this case, a local bank — willing to accept a lower yield because the interest is tax-free. The town lends the lower-cost money to the church. The bank gets tax-free interest income, the church gets a lower-cost loan and the town gets — well, at the least, a new gymnasium the community can use when the church's calendar permits.

"That will be good," Mr. Gwin said. "Even the Y is pretty crowded."

In the evolving view of the courts, tax-exempt bonds for churches and other religious organizations do not involve any public money or government subsidy and do not run afoul of the First Amendment ban on government-sponsored religion.

But in fact, the subsidy provided by all tax-exempt bonds, while indirect, is real: buyers of the bonds do not have to pay income taxes on the interest they earn, which shifts some of the overall tax burden to other taxpayers. And the final beneficiary of the bond issue — in this case, the church — can hold on to money it would otherwise have paid in interest.

Of all the tools that an accommodating government can use to make life easier for religious organizations, perhaps none has changed more and been noticed less than tax-exempt bond financing.

State and local governments have long used tax-exempt bonds to finance public works like bridges and schools, pledging future tax income to repay the debt. In the 1970's, they began to rely heavily on revenue bonds, debt backed not by taxes but by the future revenues of the projects they were sold to finance, which ranged from airports to stadiums. Through economic development agencies, revenue bonds also were sold for the benefit of private businesses to finance factories or office buildings that would foster economic development.

In 1973, near the high-water mark of the doctrine of strict church-state separation that dominated the postwar decades, the United States Supreme Court gave its limited blessing to public revenue bond deals to benefit private religious colleges — so long as they were not "pervasively sectarian" and regarded education, not the promulgation of religion, as their primary purpose.

In a landmark case called Hunt v. McNair, the court reasoned that "aid normally may be thought to have a primary effect of advancing religion" — which would be unconstitutional — if it went to "an institution in which religion is so pervasive that a substantial portion of its functions are subsumed in the religious mission, or when it funds a specifically religious activity in an otherwise substantially secular setting."

As recently as 1991, the Virginia Supreme Court refused to approve tax-exempt financing for Liberty University in Lynchburg, Va., founded and run by the Rev. Jerry Falwell, because of its overarching religious purposes.

Then, over the next eight years, judicial and government policy made a U-turn.

Gradually, state bond statutes became less restrictive toward religious institutions and federal and state appeals courts started to permit tax-free financing at unabashedly religious universities — and later, religious high schools — so long as the money was used for firmly secular projects, like dormitories and dining halls. (California courts have held on to the "pervasively sectarian" standard, but three religious schools are currently challenging that approach before the State Supreme Court.)

Does Financing Count as Aid?

And the courts began to widely question whether tax-exempt financing even counted as government aid to religion at all, because the schools themselves had to repay the bonds and no public money was involved.

In June 2000, Justice Clarence Thomas, writing for himself and three other justices, expressed second thoughts about denying tax-free financing to institutions based on how religious they were. "There was a period when this factor mattered, particularly if the pervasively sectarian school was a primary or secondary school," he conceded. "But that period is one that the court should regret, and it is thankfully long past."

A few months later, the Virginia Supreme Court reversed the position it had taken nine years earlier in the Liberty University case and approved tax-exempt bond financing for the construction of a campus for Regent University, a thoroughly sectarian institution founded by Pat Robertson, the religious broadcaster who also founded the Christian Coalition. The Virginia justices did balk at permitting Mr. Robertson to use public bond financing for his department of divinity; that would have to be financed in some other way, they said.

But that reluctance seems quaint these days. Early 2005 brought the sale of $28.5 million worth of tax-exempt bonds issued by Cook County, Ill., to finance the construction of an academic center for the Catholic Theological Union, the largest Catholic graduate school of theology in the United States.

The new building, which a seminary spokeswoman said would open this fall, includes space for the world-class Bechtold library of theology, spacious classrooms for religious study and "a worship area that has a sacred space for the entire community to gather," according to the news release about its grand opening.

According to Jeffrey O. Lewis, a lawyer with Ice Miller in Chicago and the seminary's bond counsel for that deal, "The 'pervasively sectarian' restriction began to fall apart in the late 1990's, and quite a few firms are very comfortable doing seminary financing now."

So it was perhaps inevitable that a local government would provide tax-exempt financing to an institution as indisputably sectarian and devoutly religious as the First Southern Baptist Church in Clarksville. "Nobody raised any questions about it at all," recalled Mr. Gwin, the town attorney.

A search of the Municipal Securities Rulemaking Board's database shows that more than $20 billion in tax-exempt bonds have been sold since the late 1980's on behalf of religious institutions or their affiliates, including deals benefiting a Jewish vocational workshop in Michigan, a Baptist retirement home in Arizona, a Presbyterian housing project in Missouri, Lutheran nursing homes and day care centers in Minnesota and Catholic schools in Rhode Island.

In one recent deal, the city of Olathe, Kan., agreed to sell more than $83.5 million in tax-free bonds to help an affiliate of the Archdiocese of Kansas City finance Santa Marta, described as a Catholic "continuing care retirement community" with 162 units for independent living, 32 assisted-living units, a 32-bed nursing home and a swimming pool.

Except for the swimming pool, Santa Marta sounds a lot like Holy Cross Village at Notre Dame, whose property tax status is being disputed by the tax assessment appeals board in St. Joseph County. They certainly have this in common: Most of the money needed to build Holy Cross Village has been borrowed at favorable interest rates through the sale of a $40 million tax-exempt bond — issued by the economic development commission of St. Joseph County.

A Tax Reprieve For Americans Working Abroad (WSJ)

By Tom Herman

The Wall Street Journal, October 10, 2006

NEW YORK -- Some Americans working in countries with high housing costs have won a partial reprieve from a recently enacted tax increase.

The Treasury Department issued a notice Friday that raises the amount of housing costs that some Americans working and living abroad may deduct or exclude when they are filing their U.S. income-tax returns. As a result, although numerous U.S. expatriates still face significantly higher taxes for this year, the increase won't be as steep as initially feared for workers in some places, such as Hong Kong and Singapore.

The new Treasury notice also included revised housing-cost numbers for many places in Europe. But these changes may be less significant for many U.S. workers there because of high taxes imposed by numerous European nations.

The housing-cost numbers, which are based on a complex formula, vary widely from place to place. For example, the maximum amount of housing costs that an American working in Hong Kong may exclude for this year works out to $101,116, according to one Washington tax specialist. Previously, American expats in all overseas locations were allowed to exclude just $11,536. The Treasury says its table will be updated annually.

The tax increase stems from a law enacted in May that is retroactive to the start of this year. That new law mainly hits high-income Americans working in countries with a combination of low taxes and high housing costs and whose companies don't help cover the additional tax costs of living abroad.

The impact can vary widely depending on where someone lives and the details of their pay package. It isn't known exactly how many U.S. citizens work abroad. The Senate Finance Committee has said Americans working abroad filed about 306,000 individual income-tax returns for 2003 claiming what is known as the foreign-earned income exclusion. Of those, about 126,000 returns had a U.S. tax liability.

A congressional committee has estimated the new law's changes affecting U.S. expatriates will raise an estimated $2.1 billion in revenue for the U.S. Treasury over the next 10 years.

Part of the new law slashes the maximum amount of housing costs that workers abroad could exclude or deduct when calculating their taxes. That new law also gave the U.S. Treasury Department authority to change those amounts for workers in nations with high housing costs.

DOJ_NMG_0077086

After lobbying by U.S. expatriate groups, Treasury officials issued "Notice 2006-87," which gives new housing-cost limits for U.S. expatriates in some nations, but not all.

Under the new law, Americans working abroad are eligible to exclude as much as $82,400 of their foreign-earned pay this year, plus certain foreign housing costs, when filing U.S. taxes. Income above that level now is subject to much higher tax rates under what is known as a "stacking" rule. That provision isn't affected by the new Treasury notice.

It's Taxing To Recruit Top Law Grads To IRS, But A New Push Betters Returns (WSJ)

By Robert Guy Matthews

The Wall Street Journal, October 10, 2006

NEW HAVEN, Conn. -- Donald Korb, chief counsel of the Internal Revenue Service, sits in a high-back chair in a meeting room lined with law books and prepares to talk to a small gathering of Yale Law School students about tax shelters.

But before delivering his lecture, he delivers a sales pitch -- for jobs at the IRS: Work a 40-hour week (more or less). Get into a courtroom within the first month. Choose the city where you work. "I can't say enough about the value to your career," he concludes, breathlessly. "And that's my commercial."

It isn't subtle, and it seems to work. A couple of students reach for the informational folders and CDs stacked on a coffee table.

For decades, the IRS, employer of 1,500 lawyers, failed to draw freshly scrubbed graduates from the country's top law schools. It recruited in the spring, instead of the preceding fall when the private firms did. "All the good ones were gone by then," Mr. Korb says. When it did find promising candidates, it left many of them in limbo for months; private firms usually respond within weeks. And then there's the pay: about $65,000 to $70,000, depending on location, for a first-year lawyer at the IRS. That's half the starting rate at private firms.

It's no wonder few of the smartest young minds in tax law considered starting their careers at the IRS. As a result, the IRS frequently finds itself out-manned and out-maneuvered by corporations or rich individuals, who hire pricey private lawyers to craft and defend sophisticated schemes to dodge taxes.

Mr. Korb -- J.D., Case Western Reserve University School of Law; LL.M., Georgetown University Law Center -- is out to change that. He says a few early years at the IRS is a big boost to a tax lawyer's career. His message seems to be sinking in. A wave of new graduates from law schools at Yale, New York University and the University of Southern California begin work next month, the first stream of new lawyers from those top-tier schools to join the IRS in years. In all, the IRS has 1,500 applicants so far for the 50 spots it wants to fill over the next 12 months.

Deborah Egurrola, 28 years old, who graduated from Yale Law School in June, says she turned down a $125,000- a-year offer from a Washington D.C. law firm, and a $105,000 offer from a Miami law firm, to take a $66,000 offer to work in the IRS's chief counsel's office.

"The IRS really throws you right into the thick of things," Ms. Egurrola says. "At a lot of law firms, you have to start with more behind-the-scenes work. Here you start interacting with attorneys from outside." She says she can afford to take the lower-paying job because her parents have agreed to help her pay back her $75,000 in student loans.

Nina Kang, 26, a third-year USC law student, decided to join the IRS's Los Angeles office after working there as a summer intern. "For me, I didn't think that it was worth it to suffer for two years at a private firm and never see the light of day," she says. "I have heard of some people billing 15 to 20 hours a day for weeks on end. I have outside interests instead of working non-stop."

Ms. King, who has $140,000 in student loans, says the IRS would have an easier time recruiting if it offered ways to help students pay their debts. Some law schools give graduates more time to pay back loans if they go to work for a nonprofit; some private firms, as part of hiring packages, help recruits pay their loans. The IRS can't afford such largesse.

Mr. Korb's campaign has a few kinks. Lindsay Clayton, 24, a third-year law student at Yale, says Mr. Korb interviewed her last fall and sparked her interest. But the private firms where she interviewed called her back within a week for subsequent interviews. It took the IRS five weeks, and even then the agency wanted her to go to further interviews for a job that wasn't the one Mr. Korb had described. She declined. Another division within the IRS called her a few weeks later offering interviews for another job. Again she declined.

Brian Jenn, 29, is a third-year Yale law student with a graduate degree in economics who did a stint working on tax policy on the staff of the White House Council of Economic Advisers. He says he applied for a job with the IRS Chief Counsel's Office two years ago. When he called to inquire about his application after a few weeks, he recalls, "I was told if anyone was interested that they would have contacted me." He refused to apply again when the new-and-improved IRS came calling. He plans to join the Washington office of Skadden Arps Slate Meagher & Flom when he graduates.

Mr. Korb says it is true that a tendency to bungle applications caused the IRS to lose many promising applicants. He says he has hired a full-time recruiter and has set up a hiring committee to make sure no one else falls through the cracks.

Mary Maher, associate director for the Masters of Law in Taxation program at Northwestern University Law School, says the IRS is turning around its image. Last year, three graduates of the program took IRS jobs. "I heard back...and they have no regrets," she says. "All the marketing is sort of paying off."

Mr. Korb is especially proud of the IRS's slick marketing campaign and recruiting material. The bright green-and-purple folders and CDs contain something only tax geeks may find appealing: A list of famous -- at least in tax circles -- IRS alumni, including Jerry Reinsdorf, owner of the Chicago White Sox and the Chicago Bulls; Pam Olson, a former Treasury Department official and now a partner at Skadden Arps; and Ronald Pearlman, a former Treasury Department and congressional tax official and now a Georgetown professor.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

'06 Federal Deficit Likely To Be Lower (WT)

By Stephen Dinan, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 9, 2006

The federal deficit is expected to be lower than projected for fiscal 2006 when official numbers are released this week, which likely will lead to finger-pointing about why earlier estimates were so off target.

Income and corporate taxes have surged so much that the Treasury Department is expected to announce that the federal deficit for the fiscal year, which ended Sept. 30, has declined to about $250 billion -- almost $175 billion less than the administration had predicted in February.

It also is about $68 billion less than the 2005 deficit, and although still the seventh highest annual shortfall in history, it gives the Bush administration and congressional incumbents something to talk about this campaign season.

"They overstated the deficit on the front end to claim success later in the year," Sen. Kent Conrad of North Dakota, the top Democrat on the Senate Budget Committee, said in July, according to McClatchy newspapers.

The projections put the administration close to meeting its goal of cutting the 2004 deficit in half, three years ahead of schedule.

"If you look at the numbers this year, they are already very close to the president's goal that he set out in 2004," Rob Portman, director of the Office of Management and Budget, told reporters Friday after the Congressional Budget Office gave its unofficial $250 billion estimate. The Treasury Department's figure, expected to be released this week, is considered the official tally.

Overall, spending increased by $185 billion, but revenue grew even faster -- by $253 billion, according to the CBO -- accounting for smaller deficit. That's a revenue increase of more than 11 percent over 2005.

The driving force has been a 27 percent increase in corporate income taxes, coupled with a 13 percent increase in individual income taxes.

"We've seen this recovery be characterized by corporate profitability that is very strong, so the economic forecast, I think, is hard to do, and the government analysts are not the only ones who didn't predict profitability staying this strong this long," said former CBO Director Douglas Holtz-Eakin, who is with the Council on Foreign Relations.

"The White House is often accused of starting with a big deficit and having it come down later," he said. "The reality is the CBO, which has no particular interest in highballing the deficit and then having it come down, has about the same difficulty in forecasting the deficit as the Treasury did."

In the past 25 years, the February estimates have been off by an average of nearly $70 billion, or 2.2 percent.

On four occasions in that period, the estimates were off by at least $100 billion. They were off by 15 percent or more for three straight years during the Reagan administration.

The errors aren't always good news -- the 1983 and 1985 estimates were more than $100 billion higher than actual revenues.

And although this year's smaller deficit may sound positive, Mr. Holtz-Eakin said the long-term budget problems -- a fix to the alternative minimum tax and Medicare doctor fees, the costs of the war in Iraq and the impending retirement of the baby boomers -- still remain.

"Nothing has changed on the fundamentals," he said.

Inside Politics (WT)

The Washington Times, October 10, 2006

Dean's mistake

"One-time 2004 presidential front-runner Howard Dean, now chairman of the Democratic National Committee, visited with us last week and made an unusual confession about why his White House bid soured: He failed to grow up during the campaign," Paul Bedard writes in the Washington Whispers column of U.S. News & World Report.

" 'My biggest mistake was something that Bill Clinton actually told me, but it was too late down the track to do it,' he says. 'That I had to make a conversion from an insurgent candidate to a candidate who acted like a president.

" 'People won't elect you president if they don't see you as a president. They saw me as an insurgent, they loved me, I was able to push the party into standing up for itself again, but I never made the conversion into what people expected of a president of the United States, and I needed to make that conversion around September [2003], and I didn't do it.

" 'Part of it was we were too successful too fast. I was leading the polls in September, so the argument was, well, you should continue to do what you're doing. But that wasn't sufficient.' "

Still smarting

Sen. John Kerry, Massachusetts Democrat, lashed out at a group that campaigned against him during his previous run for the White House.

Swift Boat Veterans for Truth, financed by Texas conservatives, ran commercials questioning his Vietnam record -- the centerpiece of his 2004 presidential campaign. Those conservatives have formed another group this year -- Economic Freedom Fund -- to campaign against Democrats across the country, the Associated Press reports.

"We're not going to give them an ounce of daylight," said Mr. Kerry, who was campaigning in Iowa and is considering a run for the Democratic presidential nomination in 2008.

The senator said his response to the commercials in 2004 was not strong enough.

"We thought the fact that the truth was out there was enough," he said. "Clearly it wasn't."

Jet-setting greens

"They sit in economy class occasionally wiping their clammy hands. Their eyes dart furtively about. They wonder whether the stewardess or passenger next to them might have become suspicious. Some even grow moustaches or beards -- to cover the 'giveaway' sweating top lip," Peter C. Glover writes at www.tcsdaily.com.

"But they are not terrorists. At least not in the modern sense of wanting to blow up the airplanes they travel in. Far from it, for they love nothing more [than] the sense of self-importance international jet-setting offers. Traveling that delivers them in far-flung destinations where they can evangelize their ascetic ordinances to thousands of fellow worshippers. But while travelling their chief fear is that they will be found out. Who they are, what they preach -- and expose their moralistic hypocritical behavior," Mr. Glover said.

"They are the Green Bigots, leading environmentalists, those at the vanguard of the fight to change our lifestyles, restrict our foreign flights, who insist we do our 'bit' to cut greenhouse gas emissions while they rack up thousands of airmiles on business and pleasure trips.

"As the UK's The Sunday Times has recently revealed, 'In the past year the directors and chief executives of groups such as WWF, Greenpeace, Friends of the Earth and the Soil Association have crisscrossed the globe, visiting the Falklands, Japan, Africa and Brazil.' The ST's environment editor points out, 'All are running high-profile campaigns to persuade people to change their lifestyles and cut emissions of carbon dioxide.'

"The article identifies a number of well-known examples. They included Bob Napier, chief executive of WWF, who through jetting to various destinations in Asia, the Americas and Europe helped generate more than 11 tons of carbon dioxide (CO_2) last year."

In trouble

Worried California Democrats said Sunday that Phil Angelides failed to achieve the breakthrough he needed in the sole gubernatorial debate and expressed fear that his campaign's trajectory threatened others on the statewide ticket, the Los Angeles Times reports.

Fellow Democrat John Garamendi, in a tight race for lieutenant governor against Republican state Sen. Tom McClintock, has started to distance himself from Mr. Angelides. Mr. Garamendi said in a television interview that aired Sunday that he disagreed with an Angelides plan to raise taxes on corporations and the well-to-do.

"I don't think it's necessary," the insurance commissioner said on KNBC's "News Conference."

Though few thought Mr. Angelides did poorly in the debate, there was wide agreement that Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, a Republican, benefited the most from Saturday night's allotted 55-minute session, largely because nothing occurred to change the essential dynamic of the race.

DOJ_NMG_0077089

Mr. Angelides, the state treasurer, entered the evening desperately needing to redefine a contest that by all measures -- polling, fundraising, party morale -- was going badly for him.

Turner's doubts

Former media mogul Ted Turner says he has a hard time deciding whether he is for or against the war on terrorism.

"There are a lot of things about this war that disturb me, and one of them is the attitude that was well-expressed by our president. He said it very clearly; he said, either you're with us or you're against us. And I had a problem with that because I really hadn't made my mind up yet," Mr. Turner said yesterday at the National Press Club.

"I mean, what if you haven't made your mind up? What if you're thinking about it, doing some studying, doing some reading? Because it's an important decision on whether to go to war or not to go to war. I mean, you're either with us or against us -- that's pretty black and white."

Blanco's plan

Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco, a Democrat, proposed a $1 billion plan yesterday to ease the post-hurricane insurance burden on Louisiana homeowners by sending them refund checks to cover recent rate increases.

Mrs. Blanco's plan requires legislative approval and a change in the state constitution, in part because some of the money would be raised by selling off what remains of Louisiana's share of a 1998 nationwide tobacco settlement.

The plan calls for the state to essentially refund the rate increases, averaging 15 percent, that private insurance companies imposed on Louisiana's 1 million policyholders after Hurricanes Katrina and Rita, the Associated Press reports.

Under Mrs. Blanco's plan, homeowners would be sent checks next year. A homeowner who pays $1,000 per year for property insurance would receive $100 to $150.

"We need insurance-rate relief, and we need it now," Mrs. Blanco said.

No Cabinet Member Left Behind In 'Jeopardy!' Challenge For Charity (USAT)

By Greg Toppo, Usa Today

USA Today, October 9, 2006

I'll take "Cabinet Members on Quiz Shows" for $200, Alex.

This U.S. Education secretary on Sunday became the first sitting Cabinet member to buzz in on an episode of Jeopardy!, taping a one-game appearance for charity.

Who is Margaret Spellings?

Spellings, 48, a former lobbyist and longtime education adviser to President Bush, is sworn to secrecy about how well she did — as are all contestants on the long-running syndicated game show, hosted by Alex Trebek.

She did say after the taping in New York: "I held my own … it wasn't a wipeout." The episode of Celebrity Jeopardy! on which she appears will air next month on ABC.

The Education secretary, who oversees the schooling of nearly 77 million U.S. students, went up against Hill Harper of CSI: NY, and actor/screenwriter Michael McKean, best known for his performances in the ensemble comedies This Is Spinal Tap, A Mighty Wind and Best in Show.

Unlike contestants on typical Jeopardy! episodes, celebrity contestants appear only once per tournament, and charities receive their winnings. Those charities selected by the runners-up receive $25,000 (or more if the players earn more); the winner's charity gets at least $50,000. Spellings' beneficiary: ProLiteracy Worldwide.

The invitation came after Spellings, in a May 2005 New York Times Magazine interview, said she was "a big Jeopardy! fan. Love it!" She added that she was annoyed that former Environmental Protection Agency administrator Christine Todd Whitman and former White House spokesman Ari Fleischer had appeared in a Power Players edition of the show.

A quiz show may be a walk in the park for Spellings, who, alongside the president, first lady Laura Bush and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, will preside Tuesday over a summit on school safety.

It takes place after three deadly school shootings in the past few weeks. And next year, Spellings gears up for congressional hearings on both the Higher Education Act and No Child Left Behind, Bush's signature elementary and secondary education law.

No inside information was available about Spellings' game show debut. Unlike in Washington, leaks are frowned upon in the Trebek administration.

Asked repeatedly for details about the taping, executive producer Harry Friedman on Sunday finally said, "I can tell you she did fine and I can tell you … no, I really have to stop there."

Added Spellings: "I'm glad I did it. … Now I need to get back to business."

OMB Paper Aims To Clear Up Bush's Management Agenda (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0077090

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, October 9, 2006

As federal employees understand all too well, it's sometimes hard to sort out myth and fact in Washington.

Last week, the White House budget office posted a paper on one of the Bush administration's Web sites (http://www.results.gov) that, from its perspective, tried to set the record straight on the president's management agenda for the government.

That agenda has been controversial since it began five years ago -- in part because it promotes contracting out federal work and more rigorous approaches to measuring the performance of employees and programs. It's safe to predict that a number of the "facts" in this new paper will be disputed by federal unions and in some quarters of Congress.

Federal employees also will bring their workplace experiences to bear when assessing the Office of Management and Budget's paper, which pulls together the administration's explanations on contentious sections of the agenda. Among the paper's points:

Â· Changes to the federal personnel systems are not intended to cut payroll expenses. "The amount of money spent overall on raises will not change, and employee benefits will not change," according to the paper. "If an employee is a good performer, he or she will attain higher pay levels faster."

Â· Additional money has been proposed for training and implementation of new personnel systems. (The paper does not stipulate how much, but officials said two departments -- Defense and Homeland Security -- plan to spend several million dollars.)

Â· Projected savings from job competitions between federal employees and contractors, often in dispute, will be tracked and verified. "Agencies are establishing internal processes to independently validate results from completed competitions," according to the paper.

Â· Program assessment ratings, conducted by the OMB, are not used to eliminate federal programs that are out of favor with the administration. Ineffective programs, the paper noted, "may well need more money."

Asked if the paper had been posted with an eye to the November congressional elections, Robert Shea at the OMB said no. The paper had been in the works for some time, said Shea, who serves as counselor to Clay Johnson III , deputy director for management at the OMB.

The management agenda was drawn up shortly after President Bush took office, when administration officials assumed they could count on widespread support in Congress. But a series of events, including questions about the government's sluggish response to Hurricane Katrina, have slowed the administration's ability to overhaul key systems.

Federal unions and the OMB have battled annually over outsourcing, with Congress sometimes supporting unions. A pending House appropriations bill would block some funding for the OMB program assessment ratings. Federal court rulings have blocked personnel system changes that would sharply limit union rights.

Johnson and OMB Director Rob Portman , speaking at a recent luncheon sponsored by the IBM Center for the Business of Government, said that they plan to pick up their efforts to sell Congress on the president's management agenda.

"One of the reasons we are focused on this, and Clay and I are working a little bit more deliberately with Congress and trying to institutionalize more of this, is that we know these committees, some of the staff, some of the members, are going to outlive this administration," Portman said.Buying and Spending

In responding to the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, the government has increasingly relied on contractors for support and solutions, the Government Accountability Office reported Friday.

From 2001 through 2005, federal acquisition spending increased more than 65 percent, to $388 billion in 2005, the GAO said.

But the government's acquisition workforce has remained steady, at about 106,000 employees. "Many have raised concerns that the increased workload has stretched this workforce to its limit," the GAO said.

The surge in spending also has renewed worries about contract abuse and mismanagement, and Charles Peters , the legendary editor of the Washington Monthly, has kicked off a debate on contracting issues at http://www.understandinggovernment.org . The Web site provides federal employees with a forum where they may remain anonymous.

Federal employees interested in government spending also might want to check out http://www.fedspending.org , sponsored by OMB Watch, an advocacy group founded in 1983 to promote increased government accountability. That site, which will contain data on $12 trillion in spending from 2000 to 2005, launches tomorrow.

Dr. Mark McClellan (CSM)

By David Cook

DOJ_NMG_0077091

The Christian Science Monitor, October 10, 2006

Dr. Mark McClellan, who will step down Saturday as administrator of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, met with reporters at a Monitor-sponsored breakfast on Friday.

As head of an organization that dispenses some $610 billion in healthcare payments, Dr. McClellan's vision and management savvy have gotten positive reviews from such dissimilar editorial pages as The New York Times and The Wall Street Journal.

The questioning began with the financial challenges an aging population poses for the healthcare system in general, and Medicare in particular.

McClellan said, "I want to distinguish steps to make our healthcare system work better at the lowest possible cost for aging Americans, and steps to make ... our Medicare and Medicaid sustainable. The aging of the baby boom is putting big pressure on both."

Turning first to the healthcare system as a whole, McClellan said, "the best thing that we can do is to take further steps to improve the efficiency in the way that it works, of getting more for the dollars that we spend. Steps like paying more for value, shifting benefits so that they are up to date and stay up to date, getting patients more involved because care is increasingly about prevention ... all of those steps can help us get the overall cost of care down...."

There is substantial waste in the healthcare system that can be eliminated, McClellan said. "Because of medical errors, misuse of treatments, overuse and underuse, by many estimates up to 30 percent or more of our healthcare spending is going for the wrong thing. We need to be making much more progress on getting that right."

McClellan, the older brother of former White House press secretary Scott McClellan, then turned to steps that could put the Medicare program on a sounder footing for the future. "Anything we do to avoid unnecessary spending, to get overall costs down, is going to help with sustainability," he said.

But McClellan said he favored "reduced subsidy levels" from Medicare "for wealthier Americans."

"I do think we need to continue to take a close look at what Medicare can support for the long term. In 2007 we are implementing an income-related premium in Medicare. What that means is that the wealthiest beneficiaries will still get a significant subsidy for their Medicare benefits. The overall Medicare subsidy next year is going to be worth more than $7,000 a person, and even the wealthiest beneficiaries will continue to get most of that subsidy. But steps toward having people with the most means use their own savings and their own resources to pay for part of their care, while keeping the whole Medicare program up to date, making sure it is available and providing effective coverage for everyone, can be a very important step toward making the program sustainable," he said.

The challenge of making Medicare sustainable was a key part of a speech last week by Federal Reserve Board Chairman Ben S. Bernanke. The Fed chairman stressed the country's need to boost saving to pay for the effects of an aging population. He noted that Medicare's cost is projected to rise from 3 percent of gross domestic product (GDP) today to 9 percent in 2050. That is more than the country now spends on both Social Security and Medicare.

Bernanke said the choices for dealing with the financial costs of an aging population are higher taxes, less non-entitlement spending, a reduction in outlays for government programs, a sharply higher budget deficit, or some mix of all these.

McClellan cited the recently enacted Medicare prescription drug benefit as an example of the gains that can come from competition and from consumers making frugal choices.

"The average costs that the [providers] say they need for 2007, or their bids for providing the drug coverage, turned out to be about 10 percent lower on average than had been the case for 2006. So drug costs to taxpayers will be on average about 10 percent lower in 2007 than in 2006," McClellan said.

"Another way to look at it is that the bids the plans made for 2007 are about one third lower than had been predicted a little bit over a year ago in the middle of 2005 because of ... very strong and aggressive competition and people choosing low-cost plans," McClellan said. He noted that, "something like 75 percent plus of our beneficiaries chose plans which cost less than the average."

McClellan brings a strong academic background to his work. He earned his bachelor's degree from the University of Texas, his master's degree from Harvard University, his medical degree from Harvard-MIT Division of Health Sciences and Technology, and his PhD from Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

Not surprisingly, McClellan is optimistic about the role medicine will play in the country's future. "If you look ahead in the 21st century, this really should be what many experts have called and the economists have called the biomedical century. Healthcare and biotechnology and innovation in medicine are areas where the United States can lead the way for the world in innovation, can lead the way for the world in helping people live much longer and much better lives," he said.

Defense Managers Give New Personnel System A Good Grade (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0077092

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, October 10, 2006

The Pentagon has rolled out the first phase of a new pay and personnel system to a dozen agencies in the Defense Department, and Donna Vaughn , a budget officer at Fort Belvoir, likes what she sees.

A year ago, she found it difficult to recruit employees for her staff at the Defense Threat Reduction Agency and had lost younger employees to consulting firms and contractors that paid more. But the new personnel system, which gives managers more discretion to set starting salaries, has made her office more attractive and more competitive in the job market, she said.

"We have been recruiting in the last six to nine months, and the quality of the individuals we are getting is much higher than a year ago because they are willing to apply to an agency that is pay banding," Vaughn said.

As part of its move to the new National Security Personnel System, Vaughn's agency adopted pay bands -- typically three broad salary scales for most occupations -- and tossed out the 15-grade, 10-step General Schedule, the decades-old system used across the government.

The shift to the NSPS, however, is about more than the mechanics of setting salaries.

The new system has emerged as the Bush administration's most promising effort to overhaul how civil service employees are paid, promoted and held accountable for their work. Rather than reward an employee's length of service, a feature of the General Schedule, the NSPS will reward superior job performance, according to Defense Department officials.

The NSPS calls on supervisors and employees to link their work to their agency's mission. At the DTRA, the goal is to safeguard the country from weapons of mass destruction. Employees and supervisors write up job objectives tied to the strategic plan of their agency, and employees are evaluated on how well they meet those objectives. The evaluations are turned into job ratings used to determine pay raises and bonuses.

Shari Durand , in charge of personnel policies and business-related activities at the DTRA, said the NSPS will help employees "get even more focused on specific outcomes. In the past, there wasn't a disciplined process to make that happen."

The first phase of the NSPS began in late April and covers 11,000 civil service employees in the Defense Department. The second wave of conversions, involving more than 66,000 employees, began this month and runs through January. Over time, the Pentagon hopes to move about 700,000 employees into the NSPS.

The new system has created some anxiety in the Defense workforce. The American Federation of Government Employees and other unions have questioned whether performance-based pay can be administered fairly and whether Congress will provide adequate funding for the NSPS.

The unions filed suit to stop implementation of some parts of the NSPS, including a provision that would limit contract negotiations, and won a court injunction. The Pentagon has filed an appeal and is converting only non-union employees to the NSPS until labor-management issues are clarified.

Like other agencies in the first wave, the DTRA held a practice run to help supervisors and employees understand the personnel system.

At the start of the dry run, supervisors and employees spent time together defining job objectives and expectations, Durand said. At the end, employees received information showing how they stacked up against co-workers for the rating cycle, she said.

"The mock has produced, I think, more realistic evaluations of employees and you see a better equity across the board," Durand said. "Dollar-wise for some folks, there could be a significant increase for them from what they got under the GS system."

The switch to a new system also has required several hours of training for supervisors and employees.

Mirna Flowers , a management analyst and aide to Vaughn, said the training was "overwhelming," adding that "I have to pull out my little reference book to make sense of it." She continued: "Just a lot of new language and terminology that we all have to get used to."

Still, Flowers called the NSPS "a good tool" and predicted that poor-performing employees will be held more accountable under the NSPS. "As harsh as it may sound, you have seen people get pay increases for just being in the system," she said. "And I think this system is going to allow us to be able to separate the performers from the non-performers."

An Inspector General? (WP)

The Washington Post, October 9, 2006

Rep. James Sensenbrenner's proposal to create a watchdog for the judiciary is a bad idea come too soon.

BEFORE LEAVING town for recess, the House Judiciary Committee reported out a bill to create an inspector general for the federal judiciary. The bill, given the nod in a 20 to 6 bipartisan vote, is both premature and ill-conceived.

Committee Chairman F. James Sensenbrenner Jr. (R-Wis.) is not wrong in believing that the system for investigating misconduct allegations against federal judges needs work. Just the other day the judiciary itself acknowledged as much; a commission led by Justice Stephen G. Breyer examined the recent history of judicial self-policing and found that the judiciary had mishandled a large percentage of high-profile misconduct cases. The Breyer commission made a series of recommendations for improving the management and investigation of such matters.

In addition, the administrative arm of the courts mandated the use of computer software to cross-check a judge's financial holdings to flag conflicts of interest. And it imposed new disclosure rules on judicial attendance at privately funded educational seminars. While we continue to think that the judiciary needs to do more, it makes no sense to create an institutional mechanism for investigating judicial misconduct before knowing how much of the problem these recommendations will fix.

This is particularly true because an inspector general is likely to be the wrong mechanism for the judiciary in any event. Under Mr. Sensenbrenner's proposal, the office would investigate "waste, fraud and abuse" -- though the judiciary has little of these. It would also look into misconduct charges against judges of lower federal courts and report to Congress on them. It would have the power to subpoena documents and testimony in conducting these probes. To avoid running afoul of the constitutional separation of powers, however, the inspector general would be removable from office by the chief justice. It could not investigate the merits of a judge's decision or initiate an investigation before the judiciary's normal misconduct procedures had run their course. The result would be an office at once intrusive and too weak to be of much use, more likely to impinge on the independence of the judiciary than ferret out misuse of funds or uncover misdeeds.

An institution that could serve to harass judges who issue politically unpopular opinions with subpoenas for document production and testimony would be problematic under any circumstances. Mr. Sensenbrenner's habit of using his committee's powers to investigate federal judges -- some of whom merely acted in ways he did not like -- creates a particularly troubling context. While the judiciary ought to take bolder steps to get its house in order, no pattern of judicial conduct justifies this experiment.

Good New Rules For Judges (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, October 9, 2006

Measures will increase impartiality and stave off congressional intrusion.

IN A VARIATION ON THE BIBLICAL exhortation "Physician, heal thyself," critics of ethical lapses in the federal judiciary have long been saying, "Judges, judge yourselves." The Judicial Conference of the United States has done just that with welcome new rules to raise ethical standards and make it easier for citizens to monitor judges' compliance with them.

Useful in themselves, the initiatives also should discourage critics of the federal judiciary in Congress from encroaching further on the independence of a co-equal branch of government that often antagonizes lawmakers with its rulings.

The first initiative is designed to make it harder for judges to inadvertently sit on cases in which their impartiality might be questioned. The conference will require federal courts to use computer software that sifts through cases in search of overlap between the parties and judges' financial holdings.

The second initiative addresses a malodorous practice in which federal judges attend seminars — some of them funded indirectly by corporate interests — at which they have the opportunity not only to bone up on trends in law and economics but also to swim, play golf, ride horses and otherwise frolic with captains of industries who have a lot at stake before courts. The Community Rights Counsel, an environmental watchdog group, has documented hundreds of such "judicial junkets."

New rules announced by the Judicial Conference will not do away with judges' participation in educational programs but will impose new disclosure requirements. Except for those offered by bar or judicial organizations, seminars that reimburse judges for more than $305 in expenses (greens fees included, presumably) must disclose sources of financial support. Information about which judges participated in which events will be available on the Internet.

Judges who take part in these programs are adamant that they aren't swayed in their rulings by the hosts' hospitality. But what matters is how the public might perceive the preferential access that flows from these junkets and the motivation — presumably not just charity — of those footing the bill.

Welcome as they are in themselves, the new rules should also temper a movement in Congress to create an inspector general for the judiciary, an innovation that would needlessly entangle the legislative branch in the supervision of judges. It's easier for the judiciary to fend off encroachments from other branches when it's willing to judge — and heal — itself.

Fed Official Sees Easing Inflation, But Concerns About Prices Remain (WSJ)

By Michael S. Derby

The Wall Street Journal, October 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0077094

NEW YORK -- Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco President Janet Yellen said Monday that while she remains concerned about the current level of inflation, she believes the present stance of monetary policy appears well suited to bring those pressures back in line over time.

"I do want to see inflation move down, but I believe policy may now be well-positioned to foster exactly such an outcome while also giving due consideration to the risks to economic activity," Ms. Yellen said in comments prepared for delivery before the California Independent Bankers 16th Annual Convention in Laguna Beach, Calif.

She noted that "monetary policy makers again are doing a balancing act, seeking the best way to temper inflationary pressures while not exposing the business cycle expansion to undue risk." And against those risks, "holding the stance of policy steady for a time makes sense to me," especially since "we appear to be within range of the moderately restrictive policy," she said.

Ms. Yellen is currently a voting member of the interest rate-setting Federal Open Market Committee. Economists and financial markets widely expect the Fed to hold what is currently a 5.25% overnight target rate steady through the remainder of the year, although markets generally believe the economy is poised to weaken enough for the Fed to start easing rates next year.

Ms. Yellen, who has been a frequent speaker on the economic outlook over recent weeks, offered views in her speech that were consistent with her past statements. Ms. Yellen's address Monday wasn't open to the press.

"Core consumer inflation has been uncomfortably high recently," she said. "I believe it is critical that inflation trend in a downward direction over the medium term" and "my expectation is that this is the most likely outcome," she said.

Ms. Yellen did acknowledge that she is "somewhat encouraged" by recent evidence of slowing price pressures. That said, "I am keenly aware that this pattern has yet to show up in the data on any sort of a sustained basis," she said.

And in a world where the outlook for price pressures is "highly uncertain," Ms. Yellen said that "until we actually see inflation begin to slow down, I will be focused on the upside risks in the outlook." Still, the official pointed to "well anchored" inflation expectations as a reason to be optimistic.

Ms. Yellen said that the Fed decided to hold rates steady in August in large part because of rising evidence that past rate increases were beginning to slow the economy. "Since then, there have been further signs of slowing," which allowed the Fed to again keep rates steady when it met in late September.

"The data we've been seeing in recent months point to a noticeable slowdown for this half of the year, with growth running at only a modest pace and clearly below the rate that is sustainable in the long run," Ms. Yellen said. Supporting the economy are a number of factors on the business side of the equation, while headwinds include energy prices and the cumulative impact of past interest-rate incresases, she said.

Ms. Yellen added to the list of factors weighing down growth the housing sector, where the pace of the slowdown there has been "a little surprising." She said "we have already seen that the pace of house-price appreciation has clearly moderated, and there are signs that it may continue." This will likely weigh on the consumer sector, Ms. Yellen said, as she warned that banks should be particularly wary of the impact of this shift on their industry.

Ms. Yellen also said "it has been something of a relief to see that oil prices have receded quite a bit in recent months," and if they stabilize, "the restraint we've felt this year should evaporate over 2007" and "would actually contribute to a pickup in growth next year."

Dow, Nasdaq Shrug Off North Korea, While Dollar Increases On The Yen (WSJ)

By Peter A. McKay

The Wall Street Journal, October 10, 2006

The U.S. stock market quickly learned to stop worrying about the nuclear bomb that North Korea said it tested, as major indexes edged higher to end a seesaw day of trading.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average gained 7.60 points, or 0.1%, to end at 11857.81, up 11% on the year, just shy of its recent record.

The modest rally represented a comeback from an initial move lower yesterday morning, prompted by North Korea's announcement, analysts said. The blue-chip Dow was off nearly 37 points at its intraday low around 10:30 a.m. EDT.

Other indicators also eked out small gains in light trading due to the observance of Columbus Day in the U.S. (The bond market was closed entirely.) The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 0.1%, or 1.08 points, to 1350.66, up 8.2% on the year. And the Nasdaq Composite Index rose 0.5%, or 11.78 points, to 2311.77, up 4.8% on the year.

Reacting to its neighbor's reported nuclear test, South Korea stocks dropped. The benchmark Kospi stock index tumbled 2.4%, or 32.60, to 1319.40, and is now off 4.4% on the year.

DOJ_NMG_0077095

The dollar rallied on the yen, as the nuclear test added to pressures on the Japanese currency. The Japanese stock market was closed.

Robert E. Weissenstein, managing director at Credit Suisse Securities LLC, said that geopolitical events -- even dire ones -- have had decreasing influence on U.S. shares lately. He likened yesterday's reaction to the North Korea news to the market's relatively subdued moves following last year's transit bombings in London and this summer's conflict between Israel and Hezbollah.

"Investors' focus is on, 'What direction is economic growth headed?' " said Mr. Weissenstein. "At the same time, the market is growing less reactive to some of the other event-driven 'noise' that's out there."

He added that stocks had one less catalyst to generate significant moves yesterday, with the bond market closed. As trading resumes today, the 10-year Treasury yield stands at 4.7%.

In recent weeks, many investing pros have commented on the interplay -- and apparent disagreement -- between the bond and stock markets. Bond prices have generally been low, a possible sign that investors are worried about recession, according to some analysts' reading of the market.

By contrast, the Dow rallied last week to records, and stock investors generally remain confident that the economy is vibrant enough to sustain a strong run of corporate profits.

That theory will be put to a test today when the aluminum maker Alcoa, one of the Dow's 30 component stocks, releases third-quarter earnings after the market close. The company's profit announcement traditionally kicks off the earnings season, with a flurry of companies following suit.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks rose; bonds were closed. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 1.98 billion shares, as 1,976 issues rose and 1,275 fell.

The dollar was mixed. Against the Japanese currency, the dollar rose to 119.12 yen, compared with 119.01. The euro rose against the dollar to $1.2601, compared with $1.2595.

Small Businesses Again Gain Ground In Overall U.S. Employment (USAT)

By Jim Hopkins, Usa Today

USA Today, October 9, 2006

Trend may mean more employees will lack insurance as a result

SAN FRANCISCO — Reversing a long-term trend, small businesses are taking a growing share of U.S. employment, with possibly negative consequences for health care coverage of millions of workers.

New government data show that small firms employed 50.9% of private-sector workers in 2004, up from 50.7% in 2003. It was the third-consecutive year of small firms gaining, and followed nearly uninterrupted annual increases by big employers since 1988, the Small Business Administration data show.

As more Americans work for small firms, however, they are less likely to get medical coverage and other benefits such as retirement plans, because small firms are less likely to offer those benefits.

For example, 60% of companies with three to 199 workers offered health benefits this year vs. 98% of those with 200 or more workers, the Kaiser Family Foundation said last month .

Driving the employment trend:

·Shifting cycles. Big companies — defined by the SBA as those with 500 or more employees — are more likely than small businesses to shed workers during recessions and slow-growth economies, says Mark Zandi, chief economist at Moody's Economy.com.

“Layoff announcements are large and numerous,” Zandi says, citing the period after 2001, when a short recession spurred many corporations to slash payrolls.

·Industry mix. Big corporations are more likely to be in manufacturing, a sector ripe for replacing workers with automation through investments in technology.

Small companies are often in service industries such as consulting and health care, fields that require workers rather than machinery, says Brian Headd, SBA's head of research.

In Omaha, Medical Solutions nearly doubled employment this year, to 250 workers, as more hospitals hired its registered nurses and other health care professionals. Started in 1997, the company now has contracts with 350 hospitals in 46 states, President Scott Anderson says.

·Outsourcing. As big companies downsize, they hand work to smaller outfits such as Total Asset Services in Tulsa. It installs voice and data cables, plus other equipment for big companies such as Capital One that are opening call centers in the Midwest, owner Sharon Marrs says.

The outlook for further shifts in employment is mixed. Zandi says big corporations may have taken the lead since 2004 as the economy started growing again after the recession.

Still, planned job cuts, especially in the automotive industry, soared 54%, to 100,315, last month from August, outplacement firm Challenger Gray & Christmas said last week.

Also, CEOs of Fortune 500 companies have grown more pessimistic about hiring, according to the Business Roundtable's most recent quarterly survey.

In that trade group survey, published last month, 32% of CEOs said they expected U.S. employment would be higher in the next six months, down from 41% in the previous survey.

The Worker Rally (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 9, 2006

The Labor Department released its September jobs report on Friday, and some wags are calling it the "whoops" report. The "whoops" is a reference to the upward revision of 810,000 previously undetected jobs that Labor now says were created in the U.S. economy in the 12 months through March 2006.

So instead of 5.8 million new jobs over the past three years, the U.S. economy has created 6.6 million. That's a lot more than a rounding error, more than the number of workers in the entire state of New Hampshire. What's going on here?

Our hypothesis has been that, due to the changing nature of the U.S. economy, the Labor Department's business establishment survey has been undercounting job creation from small businesses and self-employed entrepreneurs. That job growth has been better captured in Labor's companion household survey, which reported 271,000 new jobs in September after 250,000 new jobs in August, and a very healthy total of 2.54 million new jobs in the past year.

The household survey is what is used to determine the unemployment rate, which fell in September to 4.6%, the lowest level in five years. The establishment survey, meanwhile, is used to announce the monthly "new jobs" numbers. Every year the Labor Department revises its job estimates from the previous year, in essence reconciling the figures from the two surveys, and the missing 810,000 jobs was the result through March 2006.

Getting out of the statistical weeds, the news here is that the U.S. has a very tight labor market -- which is now translating into significant wage gains. Over the past 12 months wages have climbed by 4%, which is the biggest gain since 2001 and which economist Brian Wesbury points out is higher than the 3.3% average annual wage growth of the last 25 years.

Most of the media has ignored all this and instead focused on the disappointing 51,000 "new jobs" number from the establishment survey for September. But even in that survey, the jobs number for August was revised upward by 62,000 and the U.S. jobs machine continues to roll out an average of about 150,000 additional hires each month. Even the loss of residential construction jobs in September, due to the housing market slowdown, was nearly matched by payroll gains in commercial construction.

This boom in employment started in August of 2003, roughly coincident with the economy's growth acceleration in the wake of the Bush Administration's 2003 tax cuts on dividends, capital gains and in the top marginal income rate on the highest earners. Yet on the same day that the Labor Department discovered 810,000 new jobs, Nancy Pelosi promised that if she becomes Madam Speaker next year, within 100 hours of taking the gavel the House will vote to repeal those tax cuts and raise the minimum wage. Never underestimate the ways that Washington politicians can do economic harm.

As Price Slips, OPEC Moves Toward Production Cuts (NYT)

By Jad Mouawad

The New York Times, October 10, 2006

A consensus among OPEC members began to form over the weekend about cuts in oil production to help stem the recent decline in price, but the group's members have not yet agreed on how to share the reduced output.

While more of OPEC's members have lined up behind a proposal to pare the group's formal ceiling by one million barrels a day, significant hurdles remain before the cuts can be put in place. It would be the first time OPEC had cut its quotas in two years.

OPEC, which accounts for about 40 percent of the world's oil exports, may call an emergency meeting later this month to hammer out the deal, according to the oil ministers from Iran and Algeria. Nigeria, which holds the presidency this year, did not rule out an emergency meeting ahead of OPEC's next scheduled gathering on Dec. 14 in the Nigerian capital, Abuja.

The Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries has not formally reduced its output ceiling since the second quarter of 2004, and any talk of how to divide the lower production may lead to acrimonious negotiations as countries fight for their market share.

But concerns over slumping prices may force OPEC to act.

DOJ_NMG_0077097

Crude oil futures in New York are down 24 percent since touching a record trading price of $78.40 a barrel in mid-July. Last week, even as OPEC mulled reducing its output, prices fell 5 percent as traders doubted the cartel's resolve. Oil closed at $59.76 a barrel on Friday, near its lowest levels in seven months.

In recent days, Edmund Daukoru, OPEC's president and Nigeria's oil minister, has been making calls to all of the group's representatives to find a way to stem the slide and turn market sentiment around.

"I think there is more or less consensus for one million barrels a day," Mr. Daukoru told Reuters yesterday. He indicated that the cut would be made from OPEC's current quota of 28 million barrels a day.

Excluding Iraq, which does not have a production quota, OPEC produces about 27.5 million barrels a day, slightly less than its formal output ceiling.

Saudi Arabia, OPEC's most influential member, has not made any public comment in recent days, but is understood to back a production cut if other members reach a consensus to do so. The oil-rich kingdom has already pared its output to prop up prices.

In Algeria, the oil minister described the recent drop in oil prices as serious and warned that prices might fall another $25 if nothing was done. Chakib Khelil, the minister, told reporters there was agreement among the member countries to meet and decide on production cuts to face the "new market situation."

"What is important is that the market find the OPEC position credible," he said. "That is why it is necessary to have a meeting to make a decision on the cut and to act on it."

As Oil Ebbs (WP)

The Washington Post, October 9, 2006

The nation still needs a sane energy policy.

THE DECLINE in the price of oil from its July peak of $78 per barrel has prompted relieved sighs among policymakers. Just a few months ago there were fears that expensive oil could simultaneously slow growth and stoke inflation, resulting in the vexatious problem known as stagflation. Today, cheaper fuel is rescuing consumers from at least part of the impact of falling home prices. Oil at around $60 per barrel is one reason the Dow Jones industrial average recently broke its record.

The relief should not distract from the central policy fact about oil, which is that government must do more to discourage consumption. The past year or so has vividly demonstrated the connection between surging oil demand and high prices on the one hand and noxious political trends on the other. High energy prices pumped money into the coffers of oil exporters such as Venezuela, Iran and Russia, emboldening their leaders to challenge the interests and values of the rich oil-importing democracies. Back in the 1990s, Russia depended on Western capital and made progress in embracing Western democratic values. In this decade, by contrast, the boom in oil and natural gas prices has left Russia with a surplus of capital. Freed of any need to humor Western creditors, Russia's leaders have hobbled democratic institutions at home and bullied democratic neighbors abroad.

Deflating petro-bullies is one good reason for the United States to reduce oil consumption and so bring oil prices down. Another reason is to reduce global warming, the evidence for which continues to strengthen. Again, the past year or so has provided a revealing natural experiment: High prices began to curb sales of gas-guzzling sport-utility vehicles and generated a flood of venture capital investment into alternative fuels such as ethanol made out of agricultural waste or grass. But with oil prices now down a bit, the commercial momentum behind energy conservation and alternative fuels may dissipate.

The policy challenge can be summed up this way: How do you keep oil prices low so as to deflate petro-bullies but simultaneously high so as to stimulate alternative fuels? The answer is taxation, which could mean specific levies on gasoline and other products or a more general carbon tax. Taxation would prompt cuts in consumption, which would lower the pretax price at which petro-bullies sell crude oil. Taxation would simultaneously boost the incentive for carmakers and venture capitalists to pursue energy conservation and alternative fuels.

The chief objection to this policy is that a new tax would burden the economy. But any such burden could be offset by reducing some other tax. The secondary objection is that a carbon tax is politically unfeasible. But the defeat of President Bill Clinton's proposal for a BTU tax, commonly cited as proof that a carbon tax is unthinkable, took place more than a decade ago. That was before oil states' extremism emerged as a leading security threat. It was before the evidence on climate change became overwhelming. It's time for the nation's political leaders to get beyond the circular conviction that they can't propose a carbon tax because nobody is proposing a carbon tax. What sort of leadership is that?

Va. Parents Trying To Unadopt Troubled Boy (WP)

Mother Says Caseworkers Failed to Disclose Child's Stormy History

A talkative 9-year-old boy came to Helen Briggs on Valentine's Day 2000. She was a foster mother with years of tough love and scores of troubled kids behind her. But she grew to love this boy. Within the year, she'd talked her husband into adopting him.

Now, six years later, Briggs and her husband, James, a maintenance worker for the city of Alexandria, are taking the highly unusual step of trying to unadopt him.

In 2003, when the boy was 12, he sexually molested a 6-year-old boy and a 2-year-old girl still in diapers. She said it was only then, as she waited outside the courtroom for his sexual battery hearing and caseworkers handed her his psychological profile, that she found out just how damaged the boy had been when he came into her life.

The Washington Post generally does not name the subjects of juvenile court cases.

Briggs said she did not know he had lived in five foster homes since he was 16 months old. Nor that his alcohol- and drug-addicted biological parents had physically abused him, injuring his brain stem and impairing his ability to gauge the passage of time.

He'd been hospitalized seven times in psychiatric institutions and diagnosed as possibly psychotically bipolar. He'd thrown knives, kicked in walls, pulled out all his hair and threatened to kill himself. He'd heard voices telling him to do bad things. His confidential case file shows he most likely was sexually abused.

"I did not know any of that," Briggs said, though Virginia policy states that caseworkers should provide "full, factual information" about a child to adoptive parents. "They just told me he was hyperactive."

She said the state's failure to fully disclose the boy's background is tantamount to fraud.

State child welfare officials could not comment on the case because of confidentiality restrictions. But some caseworkers do not believe Briggs, records show. They think she wants to get out of paying child support.

Still, a Fairfax County court has granted Briggs's petition to relinquish custody. The boy, who has lived in institutions since his conviction, is now officially back in foster care. He asked to be put on suicide watch, records show, when the judge's decision came down.

Briggs hired an attorney to terminate her parental rights. But in Virginia, a child older than 14 must give consent. The boy, now nearing 16, wants Briggs to be his mother forever, according to the voluminous confidential case file and e-mail and phone records Briggs subpoenaed for her lawsuit and provided to The Post.

Briggs sought to file a "wrongful adoption" lawsuit. But under Virginia law, she needed to file within two years of discovering the boy's history. Instead, she wavered.

First, she wanted him home after he had completed his sex offender treatment. But then psychologists deemed him a "sexual predator." That meant Briggs could no longer be a foster parent, which she considers her job. Nor could she allow her three grandchildren in her house. Nor could she keep a little girl she had cared for since the day she was born.

She had to choose.

"You don't want to throw somebody away," she said. "But sometimes you have to."

Her choice has left her with none of the rights and many of the responsibilities of a parent. Caseworkers forbid her from contacting the child because he becomes so violent and angry when she does. Yet state law requires that she pay $427 a month in child support and cover court costs when he appears before judges who now decide what's best for him.

With no legal recourse, she is asking politicians to help her find a way out.

"At first blush, you think, 'What, you're trying to give up your kid? You're a jerk,' " said Virginia Del. David B. Albo (R-Fairfax). "Then you find this lady has received awards for all the foster work she's done. And that she never would have adopted the boy and put other children in danger if she had had the information that was withheld from her."

The technical term for what Briggs is trying to do is "dissolve" the adoption, as if all the bonds of love and hurt could simply vanish into thin air.A Hopeful Start

When Briggs, 57, went to visit the boy for the first time, she said she saw a cute, happy child. She recalls caseworkers telling her that he was in a psychiatric hospital because he was too much of a handful for his great-aunt.

They were nearing desperation before they found Briggs, records show. Nobody wanted him.

A no-nonsense, old-school "professional parent," Briggs figured she could handle him. When the boy acted out, she gave him limits. When he began pulling his hair out, she had it shaved. And when he kept running away from school and her Lorton townhouse, she turned him over to her husband for a whupping, just like she got as a child -- until caseworkers called Child Protective Services.

Nonetheless, caseworkers noted that the boy thrived in her care. "The Briggs foster home is the most constructive and potentially successful placement option that this child has," they wrote.

DOJ_NMG_0077099

Briggs hadn't planned on adopting anyone. There was just something special about this child. He was so thankful he had his own room, with the first bed he hadn't had to share in his whole life, she remembers him telling her.

If she got sick, he'd make her soup and rub her feet. At school, if he heard an ambulance, he'd be beside himself until school workers let him call home to make sure Briggs was okay. She understood, she said. So many people had abandoned the child.

As she was signing the adoption papers, she remembers nothing about a background briefing, as required by state policy. Only a caseworker asking skeptically, "Are you sure you want to do this?"

"Yes," she recalled answering. "I love him."

When the boy came to her, he was taking medications for mental illness, depression, delusions, seizures and attention-deficit hyperactivity disorder. He was considered a "therapeutic" foster child, one that comes with extra emotional, medical or behavioral baggage and a heftier monthly subsidy.

Some case workers think she must have known, records show. One wrote that Briggs wasn't being "entirely honest." However, nothing in the case file indicates she was given an oral briefing or a written summary of the boy's background, or access to his records. In some reports, details such as his psychiatric hospitalizations and sexual abuse are left out.

There are also notations of alarm when Briggs began taking the child off his medications, that perhaps she did not understand the gravity of his condition.

Briggs said she thought the medications were for hyperactivity. When the child began complaining of headaches, she took him to a psychiatrist caseworkers recommended. She asked if the boy needed all the pills. The psychiatrist, records show, said no.

"When he told me he was hearing voices, I told him it was just his conscience talking," she said.

Records show that caseworkers are vehemently against Briggs terminating her parental rights. "At least, if his parents win the lottery and die, he will inherit," one wrote in an e-mail. Some think she has rejected the boy because she needs the money she gets from foster children.

"That's a lie," Briggs said angrily.

A religious woman and active in her Sword of Spirit Deliverance Ministry Pentecostal Church, Briggs said being a foster mother is a calling. She's on disability, she explained, so it's one of the few things she can do to supplement her husband's blue-collar wage.

"The system needs to be revised. That's why I'm doing this," she said. "I should have known about the child. Because people get hurt."

And then there is another reason, one that woke up late one recent morning and, yawning, shuffled downstairs in fluffy white slippers with bells on the toes and nestled onto Briggs's ample lap: a little girl of 5, the child of a former foster daughter and Briggs's legal ward.

"I can't take him back," Briggs said, stroking the hair of the child she chose to keep.

Wrongful Adoption

If it is true what Briggs says, that she really didn't know the full extent of the boy's difficult young life, it would not be the first time.

The first "wrongful adoption" lawsuit was won in Ohio in 1986. Parents were told the 16-month-old they adopted was a healthy infant born to a teenage mother. When the child later developed a fatal disease and exhibited mental disorders, the parents discovered he was born to two middle-age mental patients.

Since then, states have enacted a patchwork of laws and written disclosure policies. Some states, such as Texas and Ohio, give adoptive parents access to a child's entire case file. In Maryland, social workers are required to prepare a written background summary and ask adoptive parents to sign it. Virginia's disclosure policy has no written requirement.

"I have seen so many adoptive parents come back and feel so angry and cheated that we didn't tell them about a child. And we did tell them," said Judith Schagrin, a Maryland social worker. "It's just that at the time, they were so hopeful and looking through a lens of love that they couldn't hear what we were saying."

But sometimes, because of the high turnover of case workers, information gets lost, assumptions get made, mistakes happen -- especially if the child is older. Especially if they've bounced around foster care for years. And especially, Schagrin said, if their sad and broken histories might scare away potential foster or adoptive families.

That pressure has intensified since 1997 because of a federal law that rewards states as much as $6,000 for every foster child adopted.

"I have seen caseworkers. They think, 'Oh, the family won't adopt the child if they know everything," Schagrin said.

Most adoptions take, especially for infants. But for children over 12, as many of 25 percent of the adoptions don't. They simply dissolve.Separate Paths

DOJ_NMG_0077100

Briggs has seen her adopted son four times since he left her home in 2003 -- three brief visits to his out-of-town institution before she decided to give him up and once in court this summer. The child, by turns angry and despondent, had smashed his hand through glass.

"He feels unloved," a counselor noted in his file. "That he doesn't belong in the world."

Caseworkers came to Fairfax juvenile court to ask a judge to send the boy to a secure facility in another state. Though she had no say in the matter, Briggs came to see him.

After the hearing, she asked him for a hug. "Well, I'm grown up now," she remembers him saying before he gave in.

"Do you miss me?" she remembers asking.

"Yes," he said.

Then she returned home, to her grandchildren, her small ward and the new foster daughter who sleeps in the boy's old room.

House Afire (USNEWS)

By Dan Gilgoff

U.S. News and World Report, October 9, 2006

Like the rest of their race, last week's debate between Connecticut Rep. Chris Shays and Democratic challenger Diane Farrell was supposed to be all about Iraq. Instead, the first question was about what should happen to the House Republican leadership in light of revelations of obscene electronic messages from ex-Rep. Mark Foley to teenage boys working as congressional pages. "This is one more illustration of what has been happening with the existing Republican leadership," said Farrell, who'd called for the resignation of House Speaker Dennis Hastert earlier in the day. "It has been one mistake or one scandal after another." Thrown on the defensive, Shays called Hastert a "very good and decent man" and argued that calls for his resignation were premature, since allegations that Hastert knew of Foley's lewd conduct for years had yet to be proven.

Then it was time to get back to Iraq. But the next questioner, a news anchor from New Haven, asked about the Foley scandal, saying, "I am not sure we have exhausted this topic." By the time the subject of Iraq surfaced, nearly a quarter of the hourlong debate was over.

That's bad news for Shays, and for Republican incumbents across the country who are trying to retain control of Congress in next month's midterm elections. As each day last week brought new questions about how the Republican leadership handled the Foley affair, the political implications came into sharper focus. An Associated Press-Ipsos Poll released late last week found that roughly half of likely voters said corruption and scandals in Congress would be very or extremely important in how they cast their ballots on November 7. The poll also found that voters trusted Democrats over Republicans to combat corruption by a margin of almost 2 to 1. Pollster John Zogby says his internal polls found a precipitous drop-off in Republican support. "When voters make a radical turnaround like this," Zogby says, "it could be the beginning of a free-fall."

"Tidal wave." Hastert stanched the bleeding at least temporarily with a press conference that managed to be both blunt and folksy. "The buck stops here," he vowed, and for the moment he seemed to get the benefit of the doubt (box). The House ethics committee quickly issued dozens of subpoenas for House members and personnel. But Republican concerns about what had already been a nasty election climate only continued to mount along with increasingly repellent disclosures of Foley's behavior toward the pages. "Our one advantage over the Democrats had been money, but just how much money does it take to overcome this tidal wave of media attention?" asked Republican pollster Tony Fabrizio. Coupled with growing voter unease about the U.S. involvement in Iraq, the Foley revelations appear to be accelerating possibly the two most important trends of this election cycle: the growing number of independent voters breaking for Democrats and the swelling ranks of conservatives who appear more inclined to stay home on Election Day than support the GOP. Some analysts said that the House might now be the Democrats' to lose and that the Senate now stands a chance of falling out of Republican control.

A Secret Life (NSWK)

By Evan Thomas, Newsweek

Newsweek, October 9, 2006

Mark Foley's explicit e-mails could bring down the GOP. His story, and the fallout.

In uptight, colorless Washington, Congressman Mark Foley, 52, Republican of Florida, was a bon vivant. He loved parties and making jokes; he did a wicked Bill Clinton imitation; he loved to talk about sex. He had to be a little bit careful, however. A gay man, he might bring a boyfriend to private parties, friends say, but when he appeared on the official cocktail circuit, he went alone or with a woman. He also hid, or tried to hide, his interest in younger men—much younger men, including the teenagers who can be seen scurrying around Capitol Hill toting the mail and taking in, at least in theory, a firsthand civics lesson. The House pages, the 70-or-so high-schoolers who spend up to a year in Washington running errands for congressmen, live in a squat red-brick dormitory at 501 First Street Southeast, less than five blocks from the Capitol. The building once housed Roman Catholic nuns who worked at a nearby hospital. The teenage pages are chaperoned by six staffers and are warned to stay away from drugs and alcohol. Only steps away from the pages' dorm is a bar called Bullfeathers, where lobbyists take Hill staffers to down martinis. Two blocks away is the Cannon House Office Building, where Congressman Foley had his office.

On one night in 2002 or 2003, an allegedly inebriated Foley showed up at the pages' dorm after a 10 p.m. curfew and tried to gain entry, according to an account provided by two congressional sources, who declined to be identified due to the sensitivity of the matter. Foley was turned away by a guard. It is not known if the pages were ever aware that Foley lurked outside their door, but word of the incident reached the House Clerk, who notified Foley's chief of staff, Kirk Fordham.

This was not the first time that Fordham had learned of his boss's behaving, in that modern all-purpose euphemism, "inappropriately." Fordham decided that it was time to go to a higher authority, so he went to see Scott Palmer, chief of staff to the Speaker of the House, Dennis Hastert. That, at least, is what Fordham is prepared to tell investigators, according to a knowledgeable source who requested anonymity in discussing the probe. Palmer has already accused Fordham of dissembling, and Washington is settling in for one of its periodic melodramas of moralizing and prurience.

The secret world of Mark Foley—and the denial and bumbling of the House leaders who possibly did not want to know too much about that world—is beginning to emerge in bits and pieces of lurid detail. What actually happened—from the moment that Hill staffers first became aware of Congressman Foley's unusual interest in teenage congressional pages—is the source of intrigue, finger-pointing, shock, fear and loathing on Capitol Hill and of endless fascination around the country. No wonder: the political fortunes of the Republican Party hang in the balance.

Voters may not understand the legalistic ins-and-outs of campaign-finance scandals or know much about an influence peddler like Jack Abramoff beyond his name. But they can follow the details of a sex scandal, especially one that they can imagine harming their own children. It was not necessary to read Foley's leering (and worse) e-mails and instant messages to former congressional pages—in one, he asks "Do I make you a little horny?"—to be disgusted by an obvious abuse of power and trust. If enough voters express their feelings about the scandal at the polls in November (or by just staying home), the Republicans could lose control of Congress.

It is too early to know exactly why the Republicans failed to heed the warning signs about Foley's interest in the pages. Staffers raised concerns, the Speaker's office was notified and Rep. John Shimkus, head of the House Page Board, was dispatched to caution Foley and warn him away from the pages. But nobody bothered to investigate further—a step that might have uncovered the broader pattern of predatory behavior now evident.

There are plenty of theories about why the leadership did not take the matter more seriously. In the Washington power culture, incumbents are generally protected from the consequences of their own actions. That's especially true in a Congress where one party has ruled both houses for years; the concept of meaningful oversight has been essentially forgotten. And in a party ruled largely by conservatives, and built with the help of evangelicals, many of whom view homosexuality as unnatural and homosexual acts as sinful, leaders may also have had a special reluctance to scrutinize the sexual behavior of their colleagues or their staffs.

Inevitably, Washington was rife with nasty rumors of a "Velvet Mafia" of gay Hill staffers conspiring to protect each other. But Foley's homosexuality should not be the central issue in the scandal. His wrongdoing was to sexually prey on teenagers. Sexual orientation has nothing to do with sexual predation, and to suggest otherwise is to dredge up ugly stereotypes that are factually wrong (according to a 2000 Justice Department study, 97 percent of adults who sexually assault 12- to 17-year-old children are male—and 90 percent of their victims are female). Nonetheless, it is relevant that Foley is both homosexual and a Republican.

A number of top GOP staffers on Capitol Hill are gay and, generally speaking, most do not advertise their sexual orientation. Some staffers may believe that their place at the pinnacle of power could be compromised if their private lives were publicly known. Republican leaders on the Hill may not want to know too much about the sexual orientation of a fellow Republican congressman, like Foley, or even their staffers. They may wish to be in a position to deny any knowledge. If there were any efforts among gay staffers to protect Foley, they may have been motivated by personal considerations, or an effort to protect the GOP's rule on Capitol Hill. "The notion that there's a cabal and they're closing ranks and protecting one another because they're gay is reprehensible," says Brian Bennett, who came out after serving as chief of staff to former congressman Bob Dornan, a fierce right-winger. "People protect each other because they're friends."

Republicans have been tripping over each other for days trying to get their stories straight on who knew what and when. The various explanations have only served to obfuscate. In the end, the Republicans may not be able to escape the irony of the Foley scandal. In 2004, the GOP helped get President George W. Bush re-elected by turning out the base, especially the Christian right, to vote for state bans on gay marriage. In 2006, the GOP may lose control of Congress because it didn't try harder to investigate a gay congressman who was also a sexual predator.

The man at the center of the scandal is, or was, by all accounts an unusually upbeat, buoyant politician. Raised in modest circumstances, Foley, the son of a Marine veteran of Guadalcanal, has been enamored with politics from the time he dropped out of Palm Beach Junior College to start a small restaurant. A moderate Republican, he became a fixture in the glitzy Palm Beach social scene, hobnobbing with the wealthy at places like Donald Trump's Mar-a-Lago estate. Foley was "just easy to like," says Sid Dinerstein, chair of the Palm Beach County Republican Party. "He loved his job. He loved waking up in the morning to find another event to go to."

Foley did not exactly hide his sexual orientation. He was often spotted with his longtime companion, a well-to-do Palm Beach dermatologist, though Dinerstein says the two were careful not to sit together at big charity functions. From time to time, however, Foley had to evade questions. Asked by a local radio host when he first ran for Congress in 1994 "Is it true you're gay?" Foley replied, "I have a girlfriend." He said the woman lived in Miami and spent time in Washington. In 2003, Foley backed out of a bid for the Senate, ostensibly to care for his sick father—but also, his friends suggested, because he did not want to withstand the inevitably increased scrutiny of his sexual orientation.

In Washington, Foley's homosexuality was an open secret. Gays active in Republican politics describe an informal "don't ask, don't tell" rule: gay staffers can be out of the closet, as long as they aren't too public about it. The party leadership apparently welcomed Foley: he raised hundreds of thousands of dollars for GOP campaign coffers. Radical gay groups sometimes try to out closeted GOP congressmen, but Foley believed he had some protection. He could not be accused of hypocrisy because he voted against a constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriage.

Still, Foley was subject to the jeers of at least one openly gay Democratic congressman. Last week Rep. Barney Frank of Massachusetts told the Advocate.com, a gay news site, "Once, at a congressional Christmas party at the White House, my ex-boyfriend Herb went up to Foley, who was with a female date, and said to him, 'Why don't you get a real date?' Foley didn't say anything."

Foley was sexually active in Washington, according to a gay Republican who declined to be identified discussing Foley's private life. Because he had a longtime partner, he told a friend, he preferred to have affairs with men who also had boyfriends. That way, he explained, they both had something to lose. Foley jokingly described this practice as "mutually assured destruction," said this friend.

Foley was looked after, at least to a degree, by Kirk Fordham, who ran Foley's first campaign and came to Washington as his chief of staff. Fordham, who is openly gay, has said he warned Foley not to flirt too openly. If Fordham is to be believed, Foley began showing undue interest in congressional pages as early as 2001. The Clerk of the House, Jeff Trandahl, advised Fordham to warn Foley about his conduct. Fordham, a skilled and ambitious political operative, left Foley's staff after he bowed out of a Senate run in 2003 and moved on, ultimately becoming chief of staff to Rep. Tom Reynolds, the head of the Republican congressional campaign committee.

Foley sent the e-mails that ultimately led to his downfall beginning in July 2005. Foley e-mailed a former page to ask, "How old are you now?" He asked the page what he wanted for his birthday. In a later e-mail, after Hurricane Katrina had hit Louisiana, Foley asked after his safety and to send a picture of himself. The e-mails were very familiar, but not overtly sexually suggestive, though in one e-mail Foley noted that he was on his way to the gym and wrote, "I am just finished riding my bike on a 25-mile journey."

The e-mails "freaked me out," the page told a staffer for his congressman, Louisiana Rep. Rodney Alexander. Foley's request for an "e-mail pic" was "sick sick sick sick sick sick sick sick sick sick sick sick sick," the page told the staffer, scheduler Danielle Savoy. Representative Alexander's staff notified Speaker Hastert's staff, who in turn went to Representative Shimkus, the congressman who runs the Page Board, which acts as a kind of all-purpose den mother to the young pages.

A former Army Ranger, Shimkus is a tall, straight-talking West Pointer. He was shown at least parts of some of the e-mails, which he thought were disturbing, but ambiguous. In the fall of 2005, Shimkus marched over to Foley's office in the Cannon Building. Shimkus had been told by Clerk of the House Trandahl that the page's parents wanted the contact between Foley and their son to be stopped immediately. Fearing a media frenzy, they also wanted the matter to go no further.

Shimkus told Foley, "This is unacceptable. Stay away from the kid and stay away from the pages," according to a Shimkus staffer. Foley looked taken aback, the aide says. Foley said that he was merely acting as a "mentor." "Am I guilty of being too friendly?" Foley asked. "Yes," he answered his own question.

At the time, Shimkus was satisfied with Foley's response. He now refers to Foley as a "slimeball," and regrets he did not push further. He says he was fooled by Foley's performance and felt constrained by the parents' desire for discretion.

The e-mails from Foley to the page did not go away. They began showing up in newsrooms—at the St. Petersburg Times and The Miami Herald in Florida and some Washington news organizations. It is not clear how they got there. (A St. Petersburg Times editor told NEWSWEEK that the paper received the e-mails from a source in Alexander's office. The congressman's office did not return calls.) Journalists at several news organizations have identified the leaker as a "Republican whistle-blower." But it is also true that liberal and gay activist bloggers picked up the scent. While the newspapers did not believe that the e-mails revealed enough evidence of wrongdoing to publish them, the blogs had fewer compunctions. On Sept. 24, a site called stopsexpredators.blogspot.com published scanned images of Foley's e-mails to the pages, and within hours, the widely read liberal blog Daily Kos provided a link to the mystery blogger.

Over at ABC news, veteran investigative reporter Brian Ross had known about the Foley e-mails for some time, but he was distracted by more pressing stories. After the story was already out on the Internet, Ross published portions of the e-mails on his own blog, The Blotter.

The ABC blog seems to have opened the floodgates. Overnight, other former congressional pages began sending Ross much racier instant messages sent out by Foley, suggesting that the congressman had engaged in Internet sex and was angling for trysts. An ABC producer called Foley's office and read his staff some of the messages.

Foley was having lunch at his Capitol Hill town house with his old friend and former aide Kirk Fordham and other campaign advisers when they heard about the ABC inquiry. The congressman had already responded to the earlier, more benign e-mails with a statement brushing them off and accusing his Democratic opponent of smear tactics. On the phone, Foley told a friend, "It's worse. There are new e-mails and they're very graphic." Foley knew he was finished. Fordham walked over to GOP headquarters and shared the information with Reynolds and Hastert, according to a source who was present (and asked for anonymity given the delicacy of the situation). Fordham brought back a draft resignation letter; Foley signed it that evening. Fordham tried to win Foley some cover by offering ABC's Ross an exclusive on Foley's resignation if Ross agreed not to print the seamier messages. But Ross wasn't buying. Foley signed a short resignation letter and was in his car, a BMW, driving south for Florida by that evening.

Saying that he had an alcohol problem, Foley checked into rehab. His lawyer, David Roth, put out a statement that Foley had been abused by a clergyman as a teen—and said his client "unequivocally" denied having sex with a minor. These assertions were greeted with some skepticism, even by Foley's supporters. No one seemed to be able to recall seeing Foley drunk—though it is interesting that Foley was reportedly inebriated when he allegedly showed up outside the pages' dorm on that night three or four years ago. Foley did attend a parochial school, but so far no evidence has emerged that he was abused there. Though the FBI has opened up an investigation into Foley's relations with the pages, it is unlikely he will be prosecuted unless evidence emerges that he tried to lure minors into physical sex, not just e-mail sex.

The questions about Foley's past were accompanied by a furious round of accusations and denials by House Republican leaders. Hastert originally said he first heard about Foley's page problem from staff as the news broke. But House Republican leader John Boehner insisted that he had talked to Hastert himself last spring about Foley's contacts with the page. Republican operatives began predicting that Hastert would have to take the fall and resign. Last week, the Speaker, who has long been viewed as a figurehead installed by former House majority leader Tom DeLay, took "responsibility" for the Foley mess—without admitting that he had done anything wrong. In an attempt to quiet the speculation about his future, Hastert vowed that he would not step down. But the questions about what the GOP leadership knew about Foley—and what Hastert & Co. did or did not do—would not go away.

Behind the scenes, attention increasingly focused on Foley's after-hours visit to the pages' dorm several years ago. If Foley were really behaving that outrageously so long ago, why hadn't more been done to stop him? The answers may start with the testimony of Fordham, the former Foley chief of staff who is now cooperating with federal investigators.

Fordham had long worried about the behavior of his friend and boss. As early as in 2001, Fordham had received disturbing reports of Foley's "inappropriate" behavior toward the congressional pages. According to a knowledgeable source familiar with Fordham's account, who did not wish to be identified discussing such a sensitive matter, Fordham is prepared to tell investigators that he was warned "on two or three occasions" about Foley's "overly friendly" socializing with young male pages.

He was informed by Jeff Trandahl, then the Clerk of the House, who oversees the page program. On one occasion, sometime in 2002 or 2003, Trandahl told Fordham about Foley's nocturnal adventure to the pages' dorm. Trandahl told Fordham that Foley "appeared intoxicated," according to the source who provided Fordham's account to NEWSWEEK.

This incident prompted Fordham to go to Scott Palmer, Hastert's chief of staff, and tell him about Foley's behavior. Fordham called Palmer and told him that he wanted to speak with him privately, the source says. The two men met in a small office on Capitol Hill. (Palmer says the meeting never took place.)

Fordham did not tell Palmer about Foley's attempt to enter the pages' dormitory, but rather that he was generally concerned about his boss's excessive friendliness to the pages, according to the source. Palmer expressed surprise and concern, the source says, and wondered what this could mean to Foley's political future. Why would he endanger his career with such conduct?

Palmer assured Fordham that he would talk to Foley. A day or two later, Fordham called Palmer to ask what happened. Palmer told him that he "dealt with it" by talking to Foley and that he "informed the Speaker," according to the source familiar with Fordham's account. Months later Fordham had an awkward conversation with Foley in which his boss indicated that he had spoken to Palmer.

Last week, as House GOP leaders felt the waves of scandal breaking over their heads, a spokesman for Hastert insisted that Fordham had never warned the Speaker or his top aide, Palmer. "What Fordham said did not happen," said Palmer in a written statement. Trandhahl, who resigned for unknown reasons as Clerk of the House in November 2005, was not returning phone calls. Trandahl, who like Fordham is openly gay, could be an important witness as the House ethics committee begins an inquiry.

Foley's alleged late-night visit to the pages' dorm came up during a fraught conference call for all House Republican congressmen last week, and various Republican leaders were demanding a full investigation. One GOP member, Ginny Brown-Waite of Florida, said in a statement provided to NEWSWEEK that she had "learned" of the incident at the pages' dorm after she initiated her own investigation. One of her staff aides said that Brown-Waite had talked to a House official with direct knowledge of what had happened. Capitol Police were saying last week that they could find no records of Foley's alleged visit to the dorm.

At the White House, aides were straining to sound optimistic. "I think we've stabilized," said one senior Bush aide, operating under the usual White House requirement of anonymity. "Unless there's another circular firing squad or new information comes out." Others were gloomier. In Rep. Ray LaHood's Illinois district, the Foley scandal has been the lead story in the local paper every day for the past week. "We had this game plan of coming home and talking about our accomplishments on border security and the economy, and nobody wants to hear about it," says LaHood. "The only thing I hear from people is Foley ... It's all anybody wants to talk about, and I don't see that changing any time soon." According to the new NEWSWEEK Poll, fully 53 percent of Americans want the Democrats to win control of Capitol Hill next month; just 35 percent want the GOP to retain power. For the first time since 2001, the poll shows, more Americans trust the Democrats than the GOP on moral values.

It's not just the voters who care about "family values" who might be driven away, said Matt Dowd, Bush's longtime pollster. The brouhaha on the Hill threatens what Dowd calls "the gut values" relationship between voters and politicians they trust. "Values always determine elections," says Dowd. "Deep gut values, like 'Do I trust someone?'" Several leading party strategists worry that public trust in the House Republican leadership—never exactly ironclad, even among the truest Republicans—could be shredded by disarray in the leadership and doubts about whether they tried hard enough to deal with Foley before he could prey on teenagers.

The Democrats seemed happy to just get out of the way and let the Republicans devour themselves. "The story has plenty of energy on its own," said one Democratic strategist, who asked not to be identified as he crowed. "There's no need for us to draw attention to it." Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi has been strongly demanding an investigation, but she is seen as well positioned to take a public role, since her San Francisco district has a large gay population, and she runs little risk of being branded as insensitive. Republicans are furiously accusing the Democrats of timing the scandal to break just before the election. "This was a professional hit," says Grover Norquist, head of Americans for Tax Reform and a leading GOP activist. No evidence of Democratic Party involvement has turned up, though whether the blogs got any information from party sources is open to question.

There is a real risk that the Foley scandal could spur a vicious campaign to out closeted gay Republicans. Although many gay conservatives make little effort to hide their sexual orientation, they have to put up with a certain amount of disdain, if not outright hostility, from certain quarters. Some GOP lawmakers frowned on Foley's fraternization with younger male staffers. A House GOP aide remembers standing on the House floor with his boss when Foley came over to say hello. Afterward, the aide remembers, his boss turned to him with an air of disdain. "Do you hang around with that guy?" the congressman asked. If the Foley scandal continues its downward spiral, the atmosphere of suspicion will only get worse.

The Steady-Handed Hastert (USNEWS)

U.S. News and World Report, October 9, 2006

To many political observers, last week's drumbeat for Dennis Hastert's resignation as House speaker felt like 1998 all over again-the year that Speaker Newt Gingrich was forced out after the GOP was rocked by the loss of congressional seats in the midterm elections and sex scandals that came swift on its heels. From that chaos emerged Hastert: a farm kid and disheveled former wrestling coach from Illinois without a whiff of excitement to him.

In many ways, Hastert was the anti-Gingrich. He shied away from the spotlight, quieted the noise surrounding the contentious Contract With America, and pursued more personal, behind-the-scenes consensus building that allowed the rank-and-file to shine. "It's remarkable how he's been able to hold the [Republican] coalition together," says a former House aide. "Look at all the votes they won by one or two. That's a testament to his leadership." Critics have accused him of allowing former Rep. Tom DeLay to be his hatchet man while he made friends with a relatively hands-off approach. Whatever the case, the 64-year-old's quiet style has made Hastert the longest-serving Republican speaker.

Low key. But when the Mark Foley sex scandal exploded and put the speaker in the eye of the storm, some wondered whether the pragmatic, no-frills style that vaulted Hastert to power might ultimately prove to be his undoing. "One of the reasons he was elected was because you don't need to be a great communicator when your job is to run a train on time," says a former top GOP aide. "But when you get sucked into a whirlwind like this, a plodding approach is not the way to survive."

Indeed, it seemed as if Hastert had explaining to do. His version of when and what he knew about Foley's behavior seemed to contradict those of other Republicans touched by the scandal. Democrats, meanwhile, blasted House leaders for not sharing concerns about Foley with the Democrat on the House Page Board.

As the fallout from Foley spread, Hastert was slammed by conservatives like Paul Weyrich who called for his resignation. But by week's end, Hastert appeared to have won over some of the doubters. "Any Republican with half a brain realizes they cannot toss [Hastert] over," says a Senate Republican staffer. "They understand if we lose Hastert, that's a guaranteed way to lose the majority. He's remained speaker because he puts the good of the party ahead of himself." Hastert has insisted that he handled the case appropriately based on the information he had. And in private conversations with Republican leaders, he has said he would resign if he felt it would help the GOP. After speaking personally with Hastert, Weyrich recanted his criticism, saying Hastert convinced him that he's telling the truth. In a press conference back home in Batavia, Hastert made clear he had no intention of resigning. But he struck a contrite tone. "The bottom line is ... the buck stops here," he said. President Bush, who has asked the veteran congressman to hold his leadership post through 2008, called to offer his support. Hastert's slow-and-steady approach seemed to have worked again.

The End Of A Revolution (TIME)

By Karen Tumulty

Time, October 16, 2006

Sex, lies and power games are just the latest symptoms of a Republican Party that has strayed from its ideals

Every revolution begins with the power of an idea and ends when clinging to power is the only idea left. The epitaph for the movement that started when Newt Gingrich and his forces rose from the back bench of the House chamber in 1994 may well have been written last week in the same medium that incubated it: talk radio. On conservative commentator Laura Ingraham's show, the longest-serving Republican House Speaker in history explained why he would not resign despite a sex scandal that has produced a hail of questions about his leadership and the failure to stop one of his members from cyberstalking teenage congressional pages. "If I fold up my tent and leave," Dennis Hastert told her, "then where does that leave us? If the Democrats sweep, then we'd have no ability to fight back and get our message out."

That quiet admission may have been the most damning one yet in the unfolding scandal surrounding Florida Congressman Mark Foley: holding on to power has become not just the means but also the end for the onetime reformers who in 1994 unseated a calcified and corrupted Democratic majority. Washington scandals, it seems, have been following a Moore's law of their own, coming at a faster clip every time there is a shift in control. It took 40 years for the House Democrats to exhaust their goodwill. It may take only 12 years for the Republicans to get there.

If you think politicians clinging to power isn't big news, then you may have forgotten the pure zeal of Gingrich's original revolutionaries. They swept into Washington on the single promise that they would change Capitol Hill. And for a time, they did. Vowing to finish what Ronald Reagan had started, they stood firm on the three principles that defined conservatism: fiscal responsibility, national security and moral values. Reagan, who had a few scandals in his day, didn't always follow his own rules. But his doctrine turned out to be a good set of talking points for winning elections in a closely divided country, and the takeover was completed with the inauguration of George W. Bush as President.

But after controlling both houses of Congress and the White House for most of Bush's six years in office, the party has a governing record that has come unmoored from those Grand Old Party ideals. The exquisite political machinery that aces the elections has begun to betray the platform. To win votes back home, lawmakers have been spending taxpayer money like sailors on leave, producing the biggest budget deficits in U.S. history. And the party's approach to national security has taken the country into a war that most Americans now believe was a mistake and that the government's own intelligence experts say has shaped "a new generation of terrorist leaders and operatives."

One of the problems is that after the Republicans got into power, the system began to change them, not just the other way around. Among the first promises the G.O.P. majority broke was the setting of term limits. Their longtime frustrations in the minority didn't necessarily make them any better at reaching across the aisle either. Compromise, that most central of congressional checks and balances, has been largely replaced by a kind of calculated cussedness that has left the G.O.P. isolated and exposed in times of crisis.

The current crisis arrived with a sex scandal that has muddied one of the G.O.P.'s few remaining patches of moral high ground: its defense of family values and personal accountability. Although Hastert and other Republican leaders say they heard last fall about the "overfriendly" approaches of a not-so-secretly-gay Congressman to a 16-year-old former page--both majority leader John Boehner and campaign chairman Tom Reynolds say they brought it up with Hastert last spring--they insist they never imagined anything like the more graphic instant messages that subsequently came to light. Boehner spokesman Kevin Madden said his boss was told only that there had been "contact" between Foley and a page, and that his knowledge of even that much came from a fleeting conversation on the House floor. But shouldn't someone have got chills at learning that a 52-year-old man had sent a teenager a creepy e-mail asking for a "pic of you"? Certainly the page understood what the e-mail meant, which is why he forwarded it in August 2005 to the office of Louisiana Congressman Rodney Alexander, who had sponsored him for the page program and who was alarmed enough to take his concern to Boehner. "This freaked me out," the teenager wrote. "Sick sick sick sick sick sick sick sick sick sick sick sick sick."

The House response was political from the start. Last November, Jeff Trandahl, then clerk of the House, told John Shimkus, the Republican head of the board that oversees the page program, about the less incriminating e-mails. But nobody bothered to inform the board's lone Democrat. Shimkus and Trandahl appear to have done nothing more than give Foley a private warning. When Alexander expanded the circle of those aware of the e-mails the following spring, one of the two people he chose to loop in was Reynolds, head of the National Republican Congressional Committee, whose job is managing the election. Foley wasn't even stripped of his co-chairmanship of the House Caucus on Missing and Exploited Children.

Even after a batch of truly sleazy instant messages was discovered by ABC News, Reynolds' chief of staff Kirk Fordham, who was also a former aide to Foley, tried to solve the political problem by attempting to talk the network out of publishing the worst of the messages. Fordham resigned last week, but he didn't go quietly, the way House leaders had hoped. On his way out, he threw fuel on the political fire by announcing that he had warned Hastert's staff of Foley's "inappropriate behavior" at least three years ago--a charge that Hastert's chief of staff, Scott Palmer, denied.

All this suggests that the Republican leaders were motivated much more by fear of electoral fallout than concern for the young pages in their care. And if they were worried that the revelation would hurt their chances of holding on to the House, they turned out to be right. Before the scandal broke, they were beginning to believe that the clouds were finally clearing for them. Their fabled get-out-the-vote and fund-raising operations were nearing full stride just as gas prices were dropping and the national debate was refocusing on their home-court issue of terrorism.

It seems likely that the party will instead need to reckon with sex and scandal throughout the final weeks of the election. As conservative George F. Will, writing in the Washington Post last week, put it, the Foley affair is "a maraschino cherry atop the Democrats' delectable sundae of Republican miseries." In the latest TIME poll, conducted the week after the news broke, nearly 80% of respondents said they were aware of the scandal, and two-thirds of them were convinced that Republican leaders had tried to cover it up. Among the registered voters who were polled, 54% said they would be more likely to vote for the Democratic candidate for Congress, compared with 39% who favored the Republican--nearly a perfect reversal of the 51%-40% advantage the G.O.P. enjoyed as recently as August. There was even worse news in a poll by the nonpartisan Pew Research Center that showed a precipitous drop in Republican support among frequent churchgoers, one of the most important and loyal elements of the G.O.P. base. There's no indication that they are clamoring to be Democrats, but the risk is that they will simply stay home on Election Day.

One of the victims may turn out to be campaign chairman Reynolds, who suddenly found himself running as many as 8 points behind in his upstate New York House-seat re-election bid, which had appeared fairly safe a week earlier. Hastert's job seems secure for the moment, barring any big new revelations, in part because the House Speaker is not merely a party leader; the role was established under the Constitution. It would be difficult to replace Hastert without summoning Congress back into town from the campaign trail. Nor would an ugly fight over who would succeed him be good for the party's prospects in November. Still, Republicans are not particularly eager to be seen with him. His campaign schedule is starting to look a lot lighter, as House candidates across the country are turning down his offers to do fund raisers for them. Even the leadership's much vaunted discipline seems to be in tatters. Majority leader Boehner defended himself last week by attacking Hastert: "My position is, it's in his corner, it's his responsibility." And the third in command, whip Roy Blunt, suggested that things would have been different if he had been informed. Not incidentally, both men are expected to consider making a bid for the top job if Hastert ultimately steps down--and maybe if he doesn't. But by then the job description may be House minority leader.

G.O.P. leaders are so desperate to find someone else to blame that they have been reduced--with no indication that they see the irony--to blaming a vast left-wing conspiracy. "The people who want to see this thing blow up," Hastert told the Chicago Tribune, "are ABC News and a lot of Democratic operatives, people funded by George Soros," the liberal financier who has become a bogeyman of the right. Hastert went on to say, without producing any proof, that the revelation was the work of Bill Clinton's operatives. But that line of argument, of course, suggests that Republicans would have preferred to keep Foley's secrets locked away, presumably at the pages' peril. And the Democrats for once are showing the good sense to stay out of the way when the other side is self-destructing. Sighed one of the younger House Republican aides who sits in on key meetings: "Foul play on the Democrats' side? If that is the only card left to play, then we are in serious trouble."

THE "DON'T ASK, DON'T TELL" PROBLEM

As Hastert and his forces have been trumpeting their charges against the Democrats, a whisper campaign has been launched in Washington to blame an internal culprit: a "velvet mafia" at the upper levels of G.O.P. leadership on Capitol Hill. Foley, that line of argument went, had been protected by gay staff members like Fordham, Trandahl and others whose names were being widely circulated. Says a top aide: "It looks like they may have tried to handle this among themselves because they were similarly situated."

In many ways, that story line is the product of the strains within the party over homosexuality. It's a tension nearly as deep and tortured as those the Democrats grappled with over race a half-century ago, when they tried--unsuccessfully--to keep an uneasy coalition of Southern segregationists and Northern civil rights advocates from tearing their party apart. Even though many of the G.O.P.'s policies have been hostile to gay rights, its leaders have long followed a "Don't ask, don't tell" policy with what pretty much everyone in Washington knows is a sizable number of closeted Republicans among members of Congress, upper-level staff and top party operatives. Says Patrick Sammon, executive vice president of the gay group Log Cabin Republicans: "There are a lot of gay Republicans who are working behind the scenes to advance the priorities of this party."

Until now, Republicans were able to manage the conflict. And they managed it by ignoring it. That even became part of an electoral strategy dating back to the 2000 election that suggested there was nothing to be gained by moderation. In a memo he wrote to Karl Rove, Bush pollster Matthew Dowd estimated that truly independent voters had fallen to a mere sliver of the electorate. There were, Dowd concluded, not enough percentage points in being "a uniter, not a divider." The key to winning in a polarized country was mobilizing the conservative base. That year, Bush refused to meet with the Log Cabin Republicans, choosing instead to see a handpicked group of gay Republicans, but only after the party's nomination was secured. In 2004, even as Vice President Dick Cheney's daughter Mary was a potential symbol of the party's openheartedness, Republicans put anti-gay-marriage measures on 11 state ballots to drive voter turnout.

But the Foley scandal is making it difficult for the party to look the other way. Last week some conservatives went so far as to insinuate that Foley proves that every gay person is a pedophile waiting to happen. "You don't need 'gaydar' to understand he has certain dispositions," Utah Congressman Chris Cannon told the Deseret News. Televangelist Pat Robertson recommended that G.O.P. leaders simply explain the situation this way: "Well, this man's gay. He does what gay people do."

The resignations of Foley and Fordham sparked fears that other gay Republicans would also soon be forced out of both their closets and their jobs. "Kirk is the fall guy," says gay-rights activist Hilary Rosen. "It's going to be open season on gay Republicans. It's the right wing's perfect storm. They never wanted gays in their party anyway."

RULING WITH AN IRON FIST

Oddly enough, it was a sex scandal in 1998 that brought Hastert from obscurity to the Speaker's chair in the first place. Gingrich had been ousted because his brand of fiery leadership had become such a drag on the party that it lost seats rather than gained them amid the Monica Lewinsky scandal. But his anointed successor, Robert Livingston of Louisiana, suddenly backed out amid revelations of an extramarital affair. That's when the party turned to Hastert, a former high school wrestling coach whose affability and low-key demeanor seemed to guarantee calmer times ahead. He was, after all, the man who said he was too humble to brag about being humble.

And yet the way the House has operated under Hastert has been anything but humble. He quickly came to be viewed as little more than a genial front for then majority leader Tom DeLay, whose nickname--the Hammer--pretty much summed up his leadership touch. "There has been no institutional rule, means, norm or tradition that cannot be set aside to advance a partisan political goal," says Brookings Institution political scientist Thomas Mann, co-author of the recently published book whose title describes Congress as The Broken Branch. In 2003, instead of fashioning a compromise that might woo a few Democrats, Hastert and DeLay held what was supposed to be a 15-min. vote open for three full hours as they squeezed the last Republican votes they needed to pass a bill to provide an expensive prescription drug benefit to the Medicare program. Far more than in the past, they brought bills to the floor with no chance of amendment and allowed the normal appropriations process to be circumvented so that pet projects could be funded without scrutiny. When DeLay faced indictment by a Texas grand jury, Hastert changed the Republican rules so that DeLay could stay on as leader--though in the ensuing outcry, he had to reverse himself. Hastert was successful, however, in purging the ethics committee of its chairman and two Republican members who had reprimanded DeLay for misconduct. Stretching the limits of arcane House rules and shuffling committees around may not seem like earthshaking offenses, but they are the same type of procedural strangleholds and power plays that the G.O.P. had hoped to excise from the body politic 12 years ago.

"The Republican Party of 2006 is a tired, cranky shell of the aggressive, reformist movement that was swept into office in 1994 on a wave of positive change," Frank Luntz, one of the strategists of the G.O.P. takeover, wrote this week in a column for TIME.com "I worked for them. They were friends of mine. These Republicans are not those Republicans."

On policy matters, Hastert's leadership approach has been to act as though the Democrats--and sometimes the Senate--simply do not exist. He squeezes hard-edged partisan bills through the House to please the G.O.P. base, even though they have no chance of ever getting through the Senate and reaching the President's desk. "There have been numerous occasions when bipartisan approaches, which would have benefited our conference more than Democrats, have been rebuffed by the Speaker," complains a senior Republican aide, who says he likes and respects the Speaker. "His strategy seems to be, 'Well, don't worry about it. We'll blame [Democratic Leader Nancy] Pelosi.' That might work in isolated circumstances, but when your party's numbers start to tank, and people want to see that you can govern, that approach is not a solid one."

Party leaders concede the point that their revolution hasn't lived up to everything they promised. But they say voters still see the difference between where the parties stand. Former Republican chairman Ed Gillespie--one of the authors of the Contract with America, on which House Republicans ran in 1994--says, "Our party is still better when it comes to spending than the Democrats, stronger on national security than the Democrats and more likely to share concerns about the coarsening of our culture that a majority of Americans share than the Democrats are." Strategists are putting an optimistic face even on the effects of the Foley scandal, saying their internal polling shows little movement against the G.O.P.

Will the Democrats behave any differently if they retake Congress in November? Some would undoubtedly try to use their majority power to exact revenge for Republican overreach. And history has shown them to be just as capable of the type of ideological drift that is tearing at the G.O.P.

For now, though, the question on everyone's mind is, How do the Republicans find their way from here? A number of conservatives have begun to wonder aloud if it wouldn't be better for the party to lose the House or Senate in November. If the revolutionaries have become the redcoats, then perhaps it's time for another uprising. Send the Republicans back into the wilderness so they can forage for the kind of fresh ideas and guerrilla tactics that made them such a force during their previous march on Washington. They could very well be ready in time for the presidential election in 2008. And while they're out there on the campaign trail, they just might rally around their old general, who will be looking to cap his own hardscrabble journey from political pariah to rehabbed revolutionary. That general, of course, is none other than former Speaker Gingrich, who has been spotted in Iowa, New Hampshire and other battleground states for more than a year now, taking potshots at the Establishment he helped create and rearming himself to storm the next barricade. GOP Officials Brace For Loss Of Seven To 30 House Seats (WP)

By Jim Vandehei And Chris Cillizza

The Washington Post, October 10, 2006

Republican campaign officials said yesterday that they expect to lose at least seven House seats and as many as 30 in the Nov. 7 midterm elections, as a result of sustained violence in Iraq and the page scandal involving former GOP representative Mark Foley.

Democrats need to pick up 15 seats in the election to take back control of the House after more than a decade of GOP leadership. Two weeks of virtually nonstop controversy over President Bush's war policy and House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert's handling of the page scandal have forced party leaders to recalculate their vulnerability and placed a growing number of Republican incumbents and open seats at much greater risk.

GOP officials are urging lawmakers to focus exclusively on local issues and leave it to party leaders to mitigate the Foley controversy by accusing Democrats of trying to politicize it. At the same time, the White House plans to amplify national security issues, especially the threat of terrorism, after North Korea's reported nuclear test, in hopes of shifting the debate away from casualties and controversy during the final month of the campaign. These efforts are aimed largely at prodding disaffected conservatives to vote for GOP candidates despite their unease.

Still, GOP leaders privately said that Democrats are edging much closer to locking down a majority of House seats because a small but significant number of conservatives are frustrated with Republican governance, while independent swing voters are turning against GOP candidates.

"If you are a Democrat, you have to like the atmosphere," said Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (Va.), a top campaign strategist for the GOP. Davis said Republicans could lose as many as 30 seats if conditions worsen.

With four weeks left in the campaign, GOP strategists, speaking on background, have begun to outline a highly gloomy view of the House election for their party.

They are all but writing off GOP open seats in Arizona, Colorado, Texas and Florida (the one previously held by Foley). Party officials said that three GOP incumbents in Indiana are trailing in private polling and that seats thought safe suddenly appear imperiled. These include the open Florida seat vacated by Rep. Katherine Harris, who is running for senator. "It is unquestionably closer than we would like," said Rep. Adam Putnam (R-Fla.).

In a sign that the political environment is getting worse for Republicans, political handicapper Charlie Cook now lists 25 GOP-held seats as a tossup -- seven more than before the Foley scandal broke Sept. 29. Stuart Rothenberg, a nonpartisan expert on House races, has raised to nine the number of GOP seats tilting Democratic or likely to switch hands.

Unlike in most elections, when both parties defend several seats, Democrats are favored to win every seat they now occupy and are spending money to defend only a few. As a result, Democrats are not as vulnerable to the GOP's campaign finance advantage in the final weeks as they have been in past campaigns.

A Democratic takeover of the House is not a foregone conclusion, however. Because of congressional redistricting plans that gave huge advantages to incumbents, fewer than 50 of the 435 House seats are competitive. Democrats said internal polls show that the fallout from the Foley scandal is confined to half a dozen races. Moreover, House elections are traditionally shaped by local issues and personalities, and the closest races come down to which party can turn out its most loyal voters.

The page scandal erupted two weeks ago when Foley abruptly resigned after being confronted by ABC News with sexually explicit messages that he exchanged with a former page on the Internet. Investigations by the Justice Department, the House ethics committee and Florida authorities have ensued.

The GOP's emerging strategy on the Foley scandal is to try to limit losses among conservative voters who are expressing alarm about the scandal and about the apparent failure of GOP leaders to act on early warnings about Foley's behavior.

As part of that strategy, the Republican National Committee is seeking to convince conservatives that the debate is fundamentally centered on politics, not values. The RNC is shipping reams of information to conservative radio hosts, television commentators and bloggers. Those GOP talking points detail the Democratic connections of groups including the Center for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington and American Family Voices, which are working to turn the scandal into an issue with national implications.

The NRCC is highlighting Democratic leaders who supported former representative Gerry E. Studds (Mass.), who was censured by the House in 1983 after admitting to sexual contact with a male page a decade earlier; Studds went on to serve in Congress until 1997. "It is important to contrast how Republican leadership is handling the situation with problems with one of its own, and how Democrats did," said former RNC chairman Ed Gillespie, a close White House ally.

DOJ_NMG_0077110

Still, the "Foley factor" has made GOP strategists nervous. Several officials said it has dramatically undermined the reelection prospects of several incumbents, including Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (N.Y.), who was criticized by Democrats for not doing enough to stop Foley's advances on young male pages after learning about them this spring.

Several interest groups with Democratic ties are seeking to take advantage of Reynolds's newfound vulnerability. Majority Action, a group designed to help Democrats retake control of the House, is sponsoring a radio ad in which a narrator says: "Another scandal in Washington, and our Congressman Tom Reynolds is right in the middle." Two public polls show Reynolds trailing his Democratic challenger, Jack Davis, in a race neither side considered very competitive a few weeks ago.

Rep. Deborah Pryce (Ohio), the fourth-ranking GOP leader, is facing the toughest reelection race of her career. She has said she had no prior knowledge of Foley's behavior but has faced criticism for telling a reporter that the former congressman was one of her closest friends in Congress.

"I don't think this is personally sticking to Deborah Pryce, but it is certainly having people have a more jaundiced view of Washington, which is not good for Republicans," said George Rasley, Pryce's spokesman. Pryce had a slight lead over Mary Jo Kilroy in her internal polling before the Foley scandal, an aide said, but Republicans expect Pryce to suffer as much as any incumbent for the renewed scrutiny of congressional ethics.

Scandals are hurting Republicans elsewhere in Ohio, where charges of corruption have rocked the GOP at the local and state levels for the past two years. In the open seat vacated by indicted GOP Rep. Robert W. Ney, Joy Padgett is struggling to lock down a reliably GOP seat east of Columbus, the state capital. Polls show Democrat Zach Space, a liberal critic of the war, on top and GOP strategists agree Padgett is behind.

"It is definitely a challenge to overcome," says Padgett spokesman Morgan Ortagus. "Voters are definitely in a throw-the-bums-out mood."

Space is calling for Hastert's resignation and is asking Padgett to do the same. Padgett canceled a fundraiser with Hastert last week.

In other races where Republican incumbents have been dogged by scandal, Democrats are pushing the Foley story hard.

Former representative Nick Lampson (D-Tex.) is asking Houston City Council member Shelley Sekula-Gibbs (R) to call for the resignation of any member of the House leadership who knew about the e-mails and instant messages exchanged between Foley and former congressional pages. The two candidates are competing for the seat from the 22nd Congressional District, left vacant by the departure of former House majority leader Tom DeLay (R), who is under indictment in Texas.

Elsewhere, the political debate is returning to traditional disputes over the war, taxes and health care, according to Democrats and Republicans. The Foley story "is getting a lot of attention now, but I don't think it will have the legs to last four weeks," said Ron Carey, chairman of the Minnesota Republican Party.

Scandal Pushes Voters To Dems (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, October 10, 2006

WASHINGTON — A Capitol Hill sex scandal has reinforced public doubts about Republican leadership and pushed Democrats to a huge lead in the race for control of Congress four weeks before Election Day, the latest USA TODAY/Gallup Poll shows.

Democrats had a 23-point lead over Republicans in every group of people questioned — likely voters, registered voters and adults — on which party's House candidate would get their vote. That's double the lead Republicans had a month before they seized control of Congress in 1994 and the Democrats' largest advantage among registered voters since 1978.

Nearly three in 10 registered voters said their representative doesn't deserve re-election — the highest level since 1994. President Bush's approval rating was 37% in the new poll, down from 44% in a Sept. 15-17 poll. And for the first time since the question was asked in 2002, Democrats did better than Republicans on who would best handle terrorism, 46%-41%.

“It's hard to see how the climate is going to shift dramatically between now and Election Day,” said John Pitney, a former GOP aide on Capitol Hill who now teaches at Claremont-McKenna College in California. He said Iraq remains the biggest problem for Republicans: “People just don't like inconclusive wars.”

The plummeting GOP ratings in the poll of 1,007 adults, taken Friday through Sunday, come amid a series of events that have given Democrats ammunition to argue that the country needs a new direction.

Those include increased violence in Iraq; a National Intelligence Estimate that belied upbeat administration talk on Iraq; a new Bob Woodward book about internal White House discord over Iraq, and the Sept. 29 resignation of GOP Rep. Mark Foley. He quit hours after ABC News showed him sexually explicit instant messages he allegedly exchanged with a teenage former page.

DOJ_NMG_0077111

Some Democrats call the scandal a tipping point. “It's the absolute crystallization for people of everything they dislike about Washington and congressional Republicans,” Democratic strategist Anita Dunn said.

GOP pollster Ed Goeas said Republican fortunes are better in individual districts than nationally. Republicans remain energized and loyal, he said, but added he's monitoring whether the Foley matter fires up independents who normally don't vote. “Does this become a catalyst for their involvement?” he asked.

Two-thirds of those in the poll said they are following the page scandal very or somewhat closely. More than half — 54% — said GOP leaders who knew about Foley's actions for months or years did not act against Foley earlier “for political reasons.” By 43%-36%, they said House Speaker Dennis Hastert should resign.

Government corruption, Iraq and terrorism were the three most important issues. Along with their lead on terrorism, Democrats had a 21-point advantage on corruption and a 17-point advantage on Iraq. A 56%-40% majority said sending troops to Iraq was a mistake — the widest disapproval margin in a year.

Three other polls released Monday, by CNN, ABC News/Washington Post and CBS News/New York Times, showed Democrats leading the congressional ballot by 13 to 21 points.

Poll Shows Foley Case Is Hurting Congress’s Image (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney And Janet Elder

The New York Times, October 10, 2006

Americans say that Republican Congressional leaders put their political interests ahead of protecting the safety of teenage pages, and that House leaders knew of Mark Foley’s sexually charged messages to pages well before he was forced to quit Congress, according to the latest New York Times/CBS News poll.

The poll, completed before North Korea announced that it had detonated its first nuclear test, also found that the war in Iraq was continuing to take a toll on President Bush and the Republican Party, and that the White House was having difficulty retaining its edge in handling terrorism.

The number of Americans who approve of Mr. Bush’s handling of the campaign against terrorism dropped to 46 percent from 54 percent in the past two weeks, suggesting that he failed to gain any political lift from an orchestrated set of ceremonies marking the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks. In addition, the poll shows that Americans are now evenly divided over which party they think can better handle terrorism, the first time in the Bush presidency that Democrats have matched Republicans on national security, despite a concerted White House effort to seize the advantage on the issue this month.

With four weeks left before Election Day, the poll indicates that the scandal involving Mr. Foley, a former Republican congressman from Florida, is alienating Americans from Congress, and weakening a Republican Party that was already struggling to keep control of the House and Senate. By overwhelming numbers, including majorities of Republicans, Americans said that most members of Congress did not follow the same rules of behavior as average Americans, and that most members of Congress considered themselves above the law.

“Politics goes to people’s heads and they see themselves as their own little entity,” said Donna Mummert, 68, a Republican from Marsing, Idaho, in a follow-up interview after participating in the poll. “They forget why they’re there to represent us.”

Seventy-nine percent of respondents said House Republican leaders were more concerned about their political standing than about the safety of teenage Congressional pages. About half of respondents said that the House Republican leadership had improperly handled the Foley case, compared with 27 percent who said they approved of how it was handled; 46 percent of respondents said Speaker J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois should step down. And Americans are more likely to say that Democrats, and not Republicans, share their moral values.

The nationwide telephone poll was conducted Thursday through Sunday with 983 adults, including 891 registered voters. The margin of sampling error for the entire sample is plus or minus three percentage points and is the same for the registered voters.

The poll describes what is by any measure a difficult political environment for the White House and Republican Congressional leaders. Still, it is a measure of national sentiment rather than the likely outcome in the approximately 40 House races and 8 Senate races that will determine which party controls Congress next January.

In many of the races where Republicans are in danger of losing seats, Democrats hold relatively slight leads, according to local polls and internal party polls. Republicans are counting on their strong voter turnout operation, and sizable financial advantage over Democrats, to compensate for the difficulties they face.

There has been no change since mid-September in the gap between Americans who said they planned to vote for a Democrat over a Republican in their district this November: 49 percent to 35 percent. But Democratic voters are more likely than Republicans to say they are enthusiastic about voting this November.

The public's view of Iraq is as dark as it has been since the war began in 2003, with two-thirds saying it is going somewhat or very badly, while only 3 percent are saying the war is going very well. Two-thirds said they disapproved of how Mr. Bush was handling Iraq.

Mr. Bush's job approval rating has slipped to 34 percent, from 37 percent in September. That is one of the lowest levels of his presidency and poses a complication for the White House as it seeks to send him out on the road to rally base voters. Mr. Bush's job approval rating has even slipped with his base: 75 percent of conservative Republicans approve of the way he has handled his job, compared with 96 percent in November 2004.

The president clearly faces constraints as he seeks to address the public concerns about Iraq that have shrouded this midterm election: 83 percent of respondents thought that Mr. Bush was either hiding something or mostly lying when he discussed how the war in Iraq was going. Fifty-seven percent of respondents said Mr. Bush was personally aware of intelligence reports before Sept. 11 that warned of possible domestic terrorist attacks using airplanes. When the same question was asked in May 2002, 41 percent said they believed Mr. Bush was aware.

"Iraq was a mistake, and even though he gets up and says it's going O.K., it hasn't been going O.K. since Day One," said Gertrude Knowles, a self-described independent voter from Quincy, Mass. "Now he's got to make it sound better than it is."

So far, at least, it appears that, at least nationally, Republicans have had little success in pressing what have been their two biggest lines of attacks against Democratic challengers this fall: taxes and terrorism. The poll found that 41 percent of respondents thought Republicans were stronger on handling terrorism, compared with 40 percent who named Democrats, a statistically insignificant difference. Before Labor Day, Republicans had a 42 percent to 34 percent edge on handling terrorism.

And in a month in which Republicans have sought to discredit Democratic challengers as advocates of big spending and high taxes, 52 percent of respondents said that Democrats would make the right decisions on how to spend taxpayers' money, while 29 percent said Republicans would.

Americans said that Democrats would do a better job than Republicans in making decisions on the war, on the economy and on taxes. Democrats are viewed more positively, or less negatively, than Republicans, with 39 percent saying they held a favorable view of Republicans, compared with 54 percent who said they held an unfavorable view. By contrast, 52 percent of respondents had a favorable view of the Democratic Party, compared with 40 percent who had an unfavorable view.

The problems for Congress have clearly been exacerbated by the Foley scandal. Eighty percent of Americans said they considered the Foley revelations either very serious or somewhat serious. Two-thirds said that House Republicans did not initially take the warnings seriously enough, and 62 percent said they believed House Republican leaders knew before last week that Mr. Foley had sent sexually explicit messages to teenagers.

"They just covered it up," said Charles Young, a Republican from upstate New York. "We put them in office to do what is right for the country. It should have been brought to their attention and disposed of. We don't need people in office who corrupt our children."

The poll found that 69 percent of Americans thought that members of Congress considered themselves above the law, and 69 percent thought that members of Congress did not live by the same rules of behavior that they did.

The poll found that 47 percent of respondents believed that Democrats came closer to sharing their moral values, compared with 38 percent who said Republicans did. The Democratic standing in this area included some unlikely groups: 26 percent of conservatives and 43 percent of people who live in the South named Democrats as the party that came closer to sharing their values.

Poll Shows Strong Shift Of Support To Democrats (WP)

By David S. Broder And Dan Balz

The Washington Post, October 10, 2006

Democrats have regained a commanding position going into the final weeks of the midterm-election campaigns, with support eroding for Republicans on Iraq, ethics and presidential leadership, according to a Washington Post-ABC News poll.

Apparent Republican gains in September have been reversed in the face of mounting U.S. casualties and gloomy forecasts from Iraq and the scandal involving Mark Foley (R-Fla.), who was forced to resign his congressional post over sexually graphic online conversations with former House pages.

Approval of Congress has plunged to its lowest level in more than a decade (32 percent), and Americans, by a margin of 54 percent to 35 percent, say they trust Democrats more than Republicans to deal with the biggest problems the nation is confronting. Fifty-five percent of those surveyed said congressional Democrats deserve to be reelected next month, but just 39 percent said Republicans deserve to return to office.

The poll measures broad public attitudes and cannot be translated into individual House districts, but it sketches an environment that is the most difficult the Republicans have faced since taking control of Congress in the 1994 elections. By a margin of 54 percent to 41 percent, registered voters said they plan to vote for the Democrat over the Republican in congressional elections next month.

Since Congress adjourned 10 days ago, Republicans have been swamped by bad news, particularly from Iraq. The Foley scandal, while not a dominant voting issue for many, nonetheless has contributed to dissatisfaction with the majority party's performance, the survey found.

President Bush's approval rating, which rose to 42 percent in September after an anti-terrorism offensive marking the fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks, registered 39 percent in the latest poll. The percentage of respondents who said they strongly disapprove of his performance is about double the number who strongly approve. This disparity in voter intensity could have implications for turnout on Nov. 7, since impassioned voters are most likely to go to the polls.

The president's approval rating reached a low of 33 percent in May, but he has since regained support from Republicans who had expressed unhappiness with his performance. In the current poll, 82 percent of Republicans said they approve of how he is handling his job, compared with 68 percent in May.

Democrats and independents are almost as negative in their appraisals of the president now as they were five months ago.

Bush's ratings on the war in Iraq are among the lowest of his presidency, with 35 percent approving of how he is handling the situation and 64 percent disapproving (54 percent strongly disapprove). On terrorism, a majority (53 percent) said they disapprove of his performance. That is the lowest rating Bush has received on his signature issue.

Asked whether the war in Iraq has been worth fighting, 63 percent said no, the highest recorded during Bush's presidency. Fifty-one percent agreed with Bush's argument that Iraq is a front in the global campaign against terrorism, the lowest of his presidency. Fifty percent of those surveyed said that the country is safer today than it was before Sept. 11, 2001, but 42 percent, a new high, said the nation is now less safe.

Still, there is no significant support for withdrawing U.S. forces immediately. Half of those surveyed -- about the same percentage it has been throughout the year -- said they would like to see troop levels decrease. Despite the high number of casualties, only a fifth said they supported immediate withdrawal.

With the decline in gasoline prices, Americans are somewhat more positive about the economy, with 47 percent describing it as good or excellent -- the highest since July 2001 -- and 53 percent saying it is not so good or poor. Forty-one percent approve of how Bush has handled economic issues, about the same percentage as in August.

Bush's performance remains a potentially significant factor in the midterm elections, with 35 percent of those surveyed saying they will use their congressional votes to express opposition to the president, a new high on that question, and about twice the number who said they will use their votes to show support for him.

The Post-ABC News poll is based on interviews with 1,204 adults and was conducted Oct. 5-8. The margin of sampling error is plus or minus three percentage points.

The Foley scandal has remained a key news item over the past 10 days and the poll shows that Americans are reading and watching. Seven in 10 said they are following the story "very" or "somewhat" closely. But only about two in 10 said the issue will be very important in their votes next month.

The political fallout is mixed. Almost two-thirds said Republican leaders tried to cover up the scandal, but about the same percentage said they think Democratic leaders would have done the same. More than three in five said Democrats are criticizing Republican leaders for political advantage. Voters are evenly split over whether House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) should step down from his post.

There is broad dissatisfaction among voters this fall, with one-third saying the country is heading in the right direction. Similarly, Congress has proved to be a disappointment to most Americans, with two in three saying they disapprove of its performance, the highest number in a Post-ABC News poll since November 1995.

As bad as these findings are, they are not as bad as they were in the months before Democrats lost control of Congress in 1994. Congressional approval hit 18 percent in October of that year.

On another measure, 60 percent of those surveyed in the new poll said they approve of the performance of their own House member. That compares with 49 percent in an October 1994 poll.

The new poll suggests that there are few issues on which Republicans can hope to appeal to voters in the next four weeks. When respondents were asked which party they trust to handle various issues, Democrats led on every subject, by 33 percentage points on health care, 19 points for ethics, 17 points for the economy, 13 points each for Iraq and immigration.

Even on terrorism, which Republicans hoped to turn into a powerful issue this fall, Democrats led in trustworthiness by six percentage points, reversing a seven-point deficit in September.

There are also modest signs that Democrats have improved their posture among voters. For the first time, a narrow majority, 52 percent, said Democrats are offering the country a clear alternative direction to Bush and Republicans. While Americans are split on the performance of congressional Democrats -- 48 percent approve, 50 percent disapprove -- they are overwhelmingly negative about GOP performance, with 63 percent disapproving and 35 percent approving.

Republicans are closely monitoring Christian conservatives for signs of disaffection that might contribute to lower voter turnout next month. The Post-ABC poll shows that they are not as strong in their support for Republican House candidates as they were in 2004, but it is unclear whether that is related to the Foley scandal. Forty-eight percent of white evangelical Christians said that House GOP leaders took the proper steps in responding to Foley's actions, compared with 60 percent of all conservative Republicans.

Robert Nelson, a machinist from Laurens, S.C., said the Iraq war is one of the issues that have turned him against the Republican Party. "I guess you could said I'm a Reaganite," he said. "Ronald Reagan got me interested in the Republican Party and I pretty much voted the party line." He did not support Bush two years ago, he said, and now thinks the country would be better off with Democrats in control of Congress. "The Republican Party has lost track, gone off in their own direction," he said.

Francis Jacobs, a computer tutor and technician from Grand Ledge, Mich., said he thinks Hastert should resign as speaker because "he knew more" about what was going on with Foley. Jacobs thinks that both parties "are having a field day" with the scandal but is highly critical of the Republican-controlled Congress.

"The question is, what have they accomplished?" he said. "They've accomplished nothing."

In the Post-ABC News poll, 71 percent agreed that Congress did little or nothing this year.

Polls: Hastert Should Resign As House Speaker (CHIT)

By Mike Dorning

Chicago Tribune, October 10, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Three independent polls released on Monday demonstrated the political damage that congressional Republicans and particularly House Speaker Dennis Hastert have sustained since a GOP congressman's sexually explicit electronic messages to underage pages were disclosed late last month.

Few in the country previously had strong impressions of the speaker. But about half of all Americans now say Hastert, an Illinois Republican, should resign his leadership post. Even among Republicans, more than a third believe the speaker should go, according to the CNN-Gallup poll, conducted over the weekend after Hastert's Thursday news conference.

Two of the polls, those by CNN-Gallup and ABC News-Washington Post, showed that between 52 percent and 64 percent of those surveyed believe party leaders deliberately tried to cover up wrongdoing by Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.), who resigned last month. And three-quarters of the country consider Republican leaders' handling of the issue inappropriate, CNN-Gallup said.

While voters say such issues as the Iraq war, terrorism and the economy are more important to them than the handling of Foley's lurid messages, polls show a sharp drop in public support for GOP congressional candidates.

Among likely voters, 58 percent say they plan to vote for Democrats in November, versus 37 percent who say they will vote Republican, according to the CNN-Gallup poll. The 21 percentage point margin is 5 points wider than it was a week earlier in the same poll.

The ABC-Post poll found registered voters favor Democratic over Republican candidates 54 percent to 41 percent. The 13-point margin also is 5 points wider than the last ABC-Post poll, taken a month earlier.

According to the CBS-New York Times poll, four out of five Americans think GOP leaders are more concerned with politics than the well-being of pages.

All three surveys were completed before the Washington Post reported on Monday that Rep. Jim Kolbe (R-Ariz.) had confronted Foley over inappropriate behavior toward pages in 2000, extending to at least six years the time period in which other members of Foley's party were aware of suspicious activity. Kolbe was a member of the House Page Board at the time, though it was unclear whether he informed other members.

On Monday, the House ethics committee sent a letter to congressional offices asking them to contact former pages and request they report inappropriate messages or contacts by Foley or other members of Congress.

National polls are of limited use in forecasting the outcome of mid-term elections, in which control of the House and Senate will be determined by a small number of individual elections.

Still, such a dramatic shift in national sentiments is a striking illustration of a changing political mood that would likely reverberate in voting on Nov. 7 if there is no change in public attitudes in the next four weeks.

A political strategist for a Republican-leaning business group said that a pollster who has been tracking competitive congressional races for the group has christened Sept. 29—the day the Foley messages were disclosed—as "Black Friday."

The group's polling showed a clear reversal on that day of a trend in which GOP fortunes were modestly improving amid a campaign by the White House to highlight lower gas prices and bolster the case for a connection between the Iraq war and the war on terror.

DOJ_NMG_0077115

After slight improvements in President Bush's standing during September, all three polls showed a drop in public approval for the president.

Still, it was the shift in public attitudes toward Hastert that was most striking.

The CNN-Gallup Poll found those with an opinion strongly favoring Hastert's resignation, with 52 percent in support of a resignation and 31 percent against. The CBS-New York Times poll found 46 percent saying Hastert should go while 26 percent said he should stay. The ABC-Washington Post Poll showed a more even split, with 45 percent saying Hastert should step down and 47 percent saying he should remain.

Foley Probe To Focus On Who Knew, When (LAT)

By Richard Simon And Noam N. Levey

The Los Angeles Times, October 10, 2006

WASHINGTON — Witnesses will begin testimony behind closed doors this week in the sex scandal that has sent shudders through the Republican-controlled Congress and potentially though the upcoming elections.

The investigation, which is being conducted by the House ethics committee in an otherwise quiet Capitol, will look into who knew what when about the contacts between then-Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) and male pages.

In what is shaping up as a classic "he said/he said," Kirk Fordham, a former Foley aide, is expected to testify that he warned House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert's office in 2003 or earlier about the congressman's inappropriate interest in teenage pages.

Officials in Hastert's office have said they did not learn about Foley's advances until last fall, when a Louisiana congressman alerted the office to a series of e-mails Foley sent to a former page. Hastert has maintained that his aides then alerted officials in charge of the page program, who told Foley to cease contact with the teenage boy.

"All eyes will be on Hastert, and the basic point of the interviews with staff and GOP leaders will be to find out when the speaker had serious indications something was wrong with Foley," said Julian Zelizer, a specialist in congressional history at Boston University.

Hastert's attorney, J. Randolph Evans, said, "We're going to be fully cooperative."

Also Monday, it became clear that the Foley scandal was sparking political concerns at the highest levels of the White House, with strategist Karl Rove conceding in a private briefing that the matter "complicates things" for some Republican candidates who have been linked to the scandal.

Fordham's attorney, Tim Heaphy, said Monday said that he expects the committee investigation to focus "less on what Congressman Foley did and more on who knew what when."

This week's questioning of witnesses and scrutinizing of records comes as the committee broadens its probe to determine whether any other House members have had inappropriate contact with the 16- and 17-year-old congressional pages.

Ethics committee Chairman Rep. Doc Hastings (R-Wash.) and the panel's top Democrat, Rep. Howard Berman of Valley Village, asked all House members to contact current and former pages sponsored by their offices to determine "whether any of those individuals had any inappropriate communications or interactions with former Representative Foley or any other member of the House."

The politically sensitive investigation also comes as the scandal has become a campaign issue in the battle for control of Congress. The committee has vowed to act swiftly, but it is unclear whether it will be done before the November elections.

The panel conducting the investigation, made up of two Democrats and two Republicans, is trying to determine whether any House members or staff violated House rules. The committee has no power to discipline Foley, who resigned from Congress Sept. 29. A separate criminal investigation is being conducted by the FBI.

The committee is expected to interview Hastert and members of his staff, including Scott Palmer, whom Fordham has said he spoke to in 2002 or 2003 about Foley. Hastert's chief political advisor, Mike Stokke, and his senior counsel, Ted Van Der Meid — both of whom helped field the complaint last year, according to an account prepared by the speaker's office — may be called as well.

So may a host of other lawmakers and staff, and perhaps Foley and former pages . Other possible witnesses include:

Former House Clerk Jeff Trandahl, who oversaw the page program and allegedly was asked to talk to Foley after the speaker's office received a complaint last year;

Rep. John Shimkus (R-Ill.), chairman of the board that oversees the page program, who allegedly accompanied Trandahl to talk to Foley;

Rep. Rodney Alexander (R-La.), who sponsored the page who received e-mails from Foley last year;

Rep. Jim Kolbe (R-Ariz.), whom the Washington Post reported confronted Foley as early as 2000 about messages to pages;

Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (R-N.Y.), chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee, who hired Fordham as his chief of staff last year.

The panel has prepared about four dozen subpoenas for documents and testimony, but officials refuse to say whom they have summoned. Witnesses called by the committee testify under oath; they can be accompanied by an attorney and can plead the Fifth Amendment against self-incrimination.

In his private briefing Monday, Rove noted that with the Democrats needing just 15 seats to take control of the House, "every seat matters." It does not help, he suggested, "having Foley's seat up for grabs rather than being safe and having Reynolds responsible now for fighting back on this issue."

Rove's remarks, in a roughly half-hour conference call with GOP supporters across the country, offered a glimpse into private worries over the Foley fallout in a White House that has tried to steer clear of the controversy. A participant in the Rove call invited a Times reporter to listen in. The White House said it would have no comment on private calls, but added that Rove assured activists that the party would overcome the problem.

Overall, Rove sought to sound upbeat as he addressed the activists. He predicted the GOP would hold the House and Senate, but seemed to acknowledge that his hopes had been dampened in recent days

"I felt great about [the House] before Foley," he said. "But I still feel good about it."

Foley Scandal Drags Reynolds Into Underdog Role In N.Y. 26 (CQ Politics)

By Marie Horrigan

CQ Politics, October 10, 2006

The scandal surrounding resigned Florida Republican Rep. Mark Foley and the salacious messages he sent to underage congressional pages has engulfed Washington, D.C., and reordered the already pitched partisan battle for control of the House.

And nowhere is that more true than in New York's 26th District, where the re-election prospects of four-term Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds — head of the Republicans' national House campaign organization — have seen a stunning reversal of fortune. The controversy over Reynolds' handling of information about Foley's activities has prompted CQPolitics.com to change its rating on the race to Leans Democratic from Leans Republican.

That switch comes just one week after CQPolitics.com downgraded Reynolds to Leans Republican from Safe Republican — a position where Reynolds had comfortably resided prior to Foley's abrupt Sept. 29 resignation.

The Leans Democratic rating does not mean that Reynolds definitely will lose on Nov. 7: His past popularity, strong fundraising advantage and the Republican lean in his upstate New York district gives him at least a chance of reversing the tide running strongly against him.

But all of the momentum appears on the side of the Democratic nominee, factory owner Jack Davis, who had been running a vigorous underdog campaign even before the Foley scandal erupted.

The contest is a rematch of the 2004 race in which Davis held Reynolds to an unexpectedly close 56 percent to 44 percent edge. Now, three separate polls since late last week showed Reynolds trails Davis by significant margins.

Reynolds' role in the Foley incident began in fall 2005, when Louisiana Republican Rep. Rodney Alexander told him a former page, a constituent of Alexander's district, had complained of receiving inappropriate e-mails and instant messages from Foley.

Reynolds — who has defended himself by saying that the e-mails in question were not the sexually explicit ones to other young men that were later revealed — says he mentioned the matter to the office of House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois, a matter of serious dispute since the scandal broke.

But what appears clear is that Reynolds referred the matter to Illinois Republican Rep. John Shimkus, chairman of the House board that supervises the page program, who has said he held a conversation with Foley in which he instructed him to treat the pages with respect.

This has led many critics to demand to know why Reynolds didn't think the matter required a more thorough investigation,and whether he would not have been much more aggressive if — in his role as chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee — the lawmaker making inappropriate contacts with pages had been a Democrat rather than a Republican.

In the past several days, Reynolds has moved rapidly to try to dissipate the building furor. He appeared at a press conference last Monday surrounded by young children and some of their parents, but also cancelled an appearance on a national Sunday morning talk show in which he was expected to discuss his role in the Foley scandal. A Reynolds spokesman said the congressman had to bow out because he was suffering from flu-like symptoms.

Reynolds' campaign, nonetheless, has released a TV ad in which the congressman, looking straight at the camera, talked about the steps he took as the more explicit electronic messages surfaced, contending that he was among those who forced Foley to resign.

"Nobody's angrier and more disappointed than me that I didn't catch his lies," Reynolds said in ad. "I trusted that others had investigated. Looking back, more should have been done, and for that I am sorry."

But Democrats and allied groups are moving just as fast to leverage the scandal and Reynolds' precarious situation into another pick-up toward the net gain of at least 15 seats they need to win control of the House.

The political action group for the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees, the country's largest union of public employee and health care workers, on Thursday spent $111,000 on ads to be run against Reynolds in the 26th District. The union's analysis of House votes found Reynolds did not support its position on any of the eight votes it chose as key in 2005, and that he had a career record of voting with them 2 percent of the time.

Majority Action, a Democratic-affiliated group organized under Section 527 of the Internal Revenue Code, reported spending $12,000 on ads against Reynolds on Friday. The group had gone after Reynolds even before the controversy, spending $88,000 in early September for negative ads, but new radio and TV spots say Reynolds knew about the inappropriate Foley contacts and did nothing.

"Tell Tom Reynolds and Republican leaders to drop the politics," the TV ad said. "Stop the coverup. Tell the truth or resign."

The increasing onslaught against Reynolds appears strongly connected to Davis's improved position. A Zogby International poll reported Sunday indicated that Davis leads Reynolds 48 percent to 33 percent, with 57 percent of respondents disapproving of how Reynolds handled the page scandal and 58 percent saying it is time to elect someone new.

In an indication that the shifting tide may be more about Reynolds than his challenger, Davis received his high polling numbers even though one-third of respondents did not know who he is.

Davis campaign spokesman Curtis Ellis said the low name ID indicated the campaign had more work to do, but that they were getting greater response from voters on both sides of the aisle. "We're hearing from Republican voters every day who are planning on voting for Jack Davis," Ellis told CQPolitics.com.

The Zogby poll indicated a widening lead from a SurveyUSA poll released Thursday that showed Davis led Reynolds by 50 percent to 45 percent. The state Democratic Party also publicized an internal poll from the Davis campaign that indicated Davis had an 8-point lead, 50 percent to 42 percent.

Reynolds spokesman L.D. Platt, however, told CQPolitics.com he was "not at all" concerned about the effect the scandal would have on the congressman's re-election campaign.

"This race isn't about scandal. This race is about the issues, and the fact that Jack Davis and the Democrats are afraid to talk about the issues and are trying to distract the voters from that," he said.

'Values' Choice For The GOP (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, October 10, 2006

It's possible that the Mark Foley scandal could finally end the phony, trumped-up "culture war" that the Republican Party has so expertly exploited all these years -- possible, but not likely. I'm afraid the Foley episode will be remembered as just another bloody battle, one with lots of collateral damage.

The Republicans wouldn't be where they are today -- in control of the White House and all of Capitol Hill -- if they hadn't portrayed themselves as the stalwart defenders of moral standards and painted Democrats as a bunch of anything-goes libertines. Republicans promised social and religious conservatives that the values they treasure would not only be respected but written into law. Even if they didn't deliver on these promises, or even try very hard, Republicans paid enough lip service to moral issues to keep "values voters" inside the tent.

It was a political masterstroke, but it required creating and sustaining an illusion -- that Republican officeholders themselves not only talked the talk but walked the walk, that in their own lives they adhered to these deeply conservative moral standards. Human nature being what it is, there was no way this illusion could be sustained.

So for a party that crusades against gay marriage and welcomes voters that consider homosexuality a sin or a disease, headlines about a gay Republican congressman lusting after underage male congressional pages are a problem. The emerging outlines of a coverup -- allegations that the Republican speaker of the House, or at least his aides, got wind of Foley's little problem months or years ago -- are an even bigger problem.

And it will come as a surprise to some religious conservatives that so many Republicans involved in the scandal are gay -- Foley; his former aide Kirk Fordham; a former clerk of the House, Jeff Trandahl. The Post reported yesterday that Rep. Jim Kolbe of Arizona, the one openly gay Republican congressman, saw "inappropriate" e-mail correspondence between Foley and young pages as long ago as 2000.

It comes as no "October surprise" to the Republican leadership that there are gay men -- and, yes, lesbians, too -- working on Capitol Hill, some in high-ranking positions. Before the Foley scandal runs its course, we will probably learn of other gay staff members on the Hill. These people are good at their jobs, and their sexual orientation is, of course, irrelevant. The understanding, in these years of Republican hegemony, reportedly has been something akin to don't ask, don't tell.

But some conservative activists are irate that the "values" party would allow such an arrangement. Cliff Kincaid of Accuracy in Media, a conservative watchdog, thundered on the group's Web site yesterday that "House leaders permitted homosexuals to infiltrate and manipulate the party apparatus while they publicly postured as friends of family values and traditional marriage. The facade is now in ruins."

In other words, Republican House leaders secretly harbored fairly modern attitudes toward homosexuality. How inexcusable.

The culture war is supposed to be about morality, but really it's a crusade to compel Americans to follow certain norms of private behavior that some social and religious conservatives believe are mandated by sociology, nature or God. Republican officeholders have paid lip service to this crusade, all the while knowing that the human family is diverse and fallible. They know that the gravest threat to marriage is the heterosexual divorce rate. They know that Republicans drink, swear, carouse and have affairs, just like Democrats. They know that homosexuals aren't devils.

Most Americans know all of this, too, by the way. Main Street hasn't been Hicksville for a long time.

But Republicans positioned themselves as our national Church Lady and were rewarded with the support of the staunchest religious conservatives, who now feel betrayed. Faced with the spreading Foley scandal, the party has a choice.

The party can look America in the face and say, "Folks, we're all just human, and while we should strive to adhere to the highest moral standards, this whole idea of writing a specific, narrow, fundamentalist Christian view of morality into law is really not a good idea. Even those of us who thought that way when we came to Washington realize we were wrong. Condemning others just because they are different doesn't make us stronger or better, it makes us weaker and poorer. As Barry Goldwater would have said, live and let live."

Or the party can purge its gay staffers, maybe symbolically burn a few at the stake, and continue to pretend that you can legislate what is permitted to reside in American hearts and minds. Unfortunately, that's where it looks like we're headed.

Polled And Confused (NYT)

By John Tierney

The New York Times, October 10, 2006

You may have heard that American voters are disappointed. They are disappointed with Dennis Hastert and the rest of Congress. They are very disappointed with the war in Iraq. They are very, very disappointed with President Bush.

I share their unhappiness, but I must confess to one further regret. I am disappointed with the voters — or at least the ones who show up in public-opinion polls. They keep complaining that Washington doesn't understand what they want, but who on earth could?

Early in the Iraq war, Americans told pollsters they favored it and considered it a major part of the war on terrorism. Then they decided the war was a mistake and didn't reduce the risk of terrorism. Yet as they got angrier and angrier at Republicans for making a mess of Iraq, they kept telling pollsters that they didn't trust the Democrats to do a better job of dealing with terrorism.

Their feelings on the economy are even harder to fathom. In the New York Times/CBS News poll released yesterday, a solid majority of voters said the economy was doing well. When asked if they were making enough to pay their bills and sock away savings, they also sounded upbeat — more upbeat than the respondents 10 years ago who were asked that question when the White House was in Democratic hands.

Yet this year's respondents solidly disapproved of Bush's handling of the economy and said they trusted Democrats to do a better job of it. In part, the reaction reflected the generalized anger at Bush and Republicans. But there's another factor, too: the voters like each party for the wrong reasons.

They can't break their old prejudices. They still think of Republicans as the tough, worldly realists best able to deal with foreign enemies, and Democrats as the compassionate idealists protecting the little guy at home. At one time these stereotypes made sense, but not anymore.

DOJ_NMG_0077119

The Republicans have become Wilsonian idealists in foreign policy, the neoconservative innocents abroad who thought they could quickly transform the Middle East. A few Democrats have tried proposing more pragmatic foreign policies — like treating terrorism as a law-enforcement problem, not a war — but most are terrified of sounding weak because they read the polls.

Despite the Republican failures in Iraq, voters maintain their longstanding mistrust of Democrats' handling of foreign policy. Vic Fingerhut, a Democratic pollster working in battleground states, reported Sunday in The Washington Post that swing voters overwhelmingly trust Republicans on Iraq, terrorism and other foreign policy issues.

On the domestic front, voters still trust Democrats to deal with issues like education and Social Security even though the Democrats have run out of ideas. Their basic educational strategy is to spend more money and keep teachers' unions happy. They have no plan to keep Social Security solvent, except "taxing the rich," which won't do the trick.

The G.O.P.'s Social Security plan last year would have left the poor better off than under the current system, but Republicans couldn't overcome their image as the cruel despoilers of the Democrats' New Deal. They did succeed (with President Clinton's grudging cooperation) in reforming welfare. That did more to break the cycle of poverty than anything done during the Great Society, but in voters' minds the Democrats remained the party of compassion.

Republicans fought to improve schools at the local level by giving more choices and power to students, parents and principals. These reforms (like vouchers and charter schools) were popular in places where Republicans overcame the resistance of Democrats and teachers' unions, but in national polls, voters preferred Democrats to deal with education.

So President Bush abandoned the party's principles and made a deal with Ted Kennedy to enact the No Child Left Behind law, a centralized Democratic-style plan that gave the Republicans a brief boost in the polls. Like previous Democratic plans for reviving education with regulations from Washington, it was an expensive flop, but voters still tell pollsters they trust the Democrats to fix the schools.

Maybe someday a candidate with Republican domestic policies and Democratic foreign policies will miraculously catch fire with voters. For now, the best hope is for a return to divided government and gridlock, so that each party can stop the other from fulfilling its poll-driven agenda.

Of course, if that happens, voters will be complaining to pollsters about how little gets done in Washington. But they won't be as disappointed as they are now.

Allen, Webb In Slashing, Wide-Ranging Debate (WP)

By Michael D. Shear And Tim Craig

The Washington Post, October 10, 2006

RICHMOND, Oct. 9 -- Virginia Sen. George Allen and former Navy secretary James Webb clashed over issues and character in a fast-paced and contentious series of exchanges during the last of four scheduled debates Monday night.

The 60-minute debate, held in Richmond and broadcast live on 19 public and commercial television stations statewide, gave Webb and Allen a chance to highlight the issues they hope will dominate the four weeks before the Nov. 7 election.

For Allen, the Republican, those issues are taxes, same-sex marriage and a dislike of liberals. Webb, running as a Democrat, stressed the Iraq war and economic fairness as he appealed for support from independents and Republicans.

In a campaign marked by personal attacks on character, real issues emerged Monday night. In rapid-fire succession, the candidates sparred over energy independence, immigration, the federal deficit, the Capitol Hill page scandal, the minimum wage and secret spying by the government.

"My opponent doesn't stand with John Warner and me in keeping taxes low," Allen said in his opening statement, referring to Virginia's senior senator, also a Republican. "He stands with Hillary Clinton, John Kerry and the big-government Democrats who want to raise taxes."

Allen was hoping to align Webb with Clinton, of New York, and Kerry, of Massachusetts, two senators widely seen as too liberal for Virginia voters.

When it was his turn, Webb assailed the increase in corporate profits at the expense of wages. And Webb, a decorated veteran whose son is serving as a Marine in Iraq, lashed out, indirectly, at Allen's lack of foreign policy or wartime experience.

"Very few of these leaders are willing to invest their own loved ones in this effort," he said of the war in Iraq. "America needs leaders who understand these divisions and want to repair them, leaders whose experience in foreign policy is formed by experience, not by sound bites."

Allen, who is a former governor and congressman, appeared more comfortable with the fast-paced forum, which gave each man a minute or 30 seconds to answer complex questions. He stuck to his talking points and often looked directly at viewers for impact. Webb, by contrast, seemed to look down at his notes and wasn't as smooth, but he appeared aggressive and not intimidated.

Like the broader campaign being waged on both sides, the exchange provided a nasty, bickering forum for questions about personal honesty and character. Allen was pressed on questions about his racial sensitivity. Webb was confronted with allegations that he demeaned females by opposing women in combat in an article he wrote 27 years ago.

The Virginia Senate campaign has become a focal point in the national battle for control of Congress. On Tuesday, the national Democratic Senate Campaign Committee is expected to begin a nine-day, $1 million advertising blitz on behalf of Webb, according to sources in both campaigns. The committee's GOP counterpart already has paid to mail glossy campaign literature for Allen to hundreds of thousands of voters.

Webb, Navy secretary during Ronald Reagan's presidency, has closed a 16-point Allen advantage to a statistical dead heat. That's not how it was supposed to be. Allen started his reelection campaign this year brimming with confidence and with one eye on Iowa and New Hampshire, as he plotted a possible bid for the presidency in 2008.

The race tightened late this summer after Allen referred to a Democratic volunteer of Indian descent as "macaca," considered a racial slur in some cultures. The gaffe opened Allen up to scrutiny about his past, including his having once displayed a noose in his law office and his admiration as a young man for the Confederate flag.

Allen acknowledged that some of the trouble was his own doing, but he blasted as untrue allegations of racial insensitivity, including allegations that he used an offensive racial epithet about black people in the past.

The debate Monday offered viewers a chance to make direct -- if not particularly deep -- comparisons of the two candidates on many issues. The candidates continued to spar over the war in Iraq, responding to a question from the moderator, Russ Mitchell of CBS News, about the 2,700 Americans killed since the war began.

Allen has accused Webb of wanting to "cut and run" from Iraq. Allen says that he hopes U.S. troops can come home soon but that they must continue to fight in Iraq to prevent terrorists from operating there.

"We must persevere," Allen said. "We cannot be a country that just loses faith in our ability to protect ourselves. . . . Our goal is to make sure Iraq is a country that is on our side on the war on terror."

In past debates and on the campaign trail, Webb has called the war "a strategic blunder of historic proportions" and criticized Allen for not asking tougher questions about President Bush's conduct of the war and its aftermath.

During the debate, he responded to Allen's contention that Democrats would leave Iraq as a haven for terrorists. "Nobody wants to see terrorism in Iraq or elsewhere," Webb said. He reiterated his position that peace and stability could be achieved in Iraq through diplomacy involving other countries, including those in the region.

The debate gave Allen and Webb several opportunities to question each other directly, leading to several testy arguments that left Mitchell trying to restore order.

Allen repeatedly attacked Webb for what he said was his support for tax increases, citing Webb's statements questioning tax cuts championed by Bush. In an earlier debate, Webb said, "I don't understand how you can have a tax cut and be spending $500 billion on the war."

On Monday, Webb said the comment was meant to suggest only that he would roll back tax cuts for the wealthy, not tax cuts for married couples or cuts in estate taxes as Allen has contended in a television commercial and asserted again during the debate.

"I never said that I would agree with tax increases that you used in your ad," Webb said.

When Webb got the opportunity to question Allen, he went after what he has called Allen's lack of foreign policy knowledge.

Allen, who stumped Webb this summer during the first debate with a question about a port project on Craney Island in the Hampton Roads area, was left almost speechless Monday when Webb queried him about the Senkaku Islands off the coast of Taiwan. "I'll have to study it," a clearly baffled Allen said. Webb then lectured him about the island's strategic importance to Southeast Asia.

The candidates offered starkly different assessments of the proposed Virginia constitutional amendment on November's ballot that would ban same-sex marriage and civil unions.

Webb said he opposes gay marriage but believes the amendment would also affect contracts and agreements between heterosexual partners and friends.

Allen said he supports the amendment as a way to keep "elitist judges" from granting gays the right to marry despite Virginia laws to the contrary. "This is a way to protect the values and view of the people of Virginia," he said.

In response to a question about day-laborer centers in Herndon, Allen said Webb's positions on immigration would reward illegal behavior. "This is a country that that has been built by legal immigrants, and we should not be rewarding illegal behavior," Allen said.

Webb accused Bush and the Republican-controlled Congress of failing to secure the borders, making the day-laborer centers a necessary step for local governments.

DOJ_NMG_0077121

Allen called for a balanced-budget amendment and a line-item veto to help control spending. Webb, who railed against corporate profits, said big companies should pay more.

Allen questioned Webb's commitment to the war on terrorism, asking whether he supported the National Security Agency's wiretappingWebb said he understands the need for such spying but would insist on oversight from Congress and judges.

Allen, Webb Spar One Last Time (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, October 10, 2006

RICHMOND -- U.S. Sen. George Allen and James H. Webb Jr. last night sparred over taxes and the war in Iraq during their last debate before next month's general election.

Mr. Allen, a Republican first elected to the Senate in 2000, opened by reminding Virginians that he has cut taxes, abolished parole and reformed the welfare system as governor in the 1990s. He also said that Mr. Webb would raise taxes, costing each Virginia family $2,000.

"If you allow me a second term ... I am going to make the best of it," Mr. Allen said, adding that he will be a senator "who will stand with John Warner and not Hillary Clinton."

Mr. Allen, who also is a former congressman and state delegate, repeatedly tried to paint his opponent as a liberal who would take his cues from "friends" such as Mrs. Clinton.

Mr. Webb, a Republican turned Democrat who served as President Reagan's secretary of the Navy, said that the tax accusation isn't true and told voters there is a disparity between the wealthiest Americans and corporate executives and everyday Virginians.

"America needs leaders who understand these divisions and want to repair them," he said. "Leaders whose views on foreign policy are informed by experience, not sound bites."

Mr. Webb, a decorated Vietnam veteran whose own son is serving in Iraq, has portrayed Mr. Allen as a rubber stamp for President Bush who failed to prevent the country from going to war.

"We need to get a diplomatic solution," he said, criticizing Mr. Allen for using "propagandistic" phrases such as "Stay the course."

Mr. Allen repeated his campaign line that he wants U.S. troops "to come home as soon as possible ... in victory and not defeat." He added that he differs from Mr. Webb in thinking that "we're not occupiers, we're liberators in Iraq."

Mr. Webb said that Congress has failed to provide oversight of some of the Bush administration's programs, included the National Security Agency's terrorist surveillance program.

On torture, Mr. Webb said the U.S. should take the "moral high ground" and act according to the Geneva Convention. "I know what it's like to be out there worrying about if I was going to be taken prisoner," he said.

The the League of Women Voters was host of the debate held at the Richmond studios of Community Idea Stations. It will be rebroadcast in the Richmond area at 9 p.m. Thursday, at 3 p.m. Oct. 22 and at 9 p.m. Oct. 31. It is also scheduled to be replayed on C-SPAN.

Independent candidate Gail Parker, whose main issue is securing funding for Metrorail in Northern Virginia, was not invited to participate. Last night she sat in the front row.

"If I wasn't in this race, there would be no candidate for me to vote for," she said before the debate.

Mr. Allen scored points when he called for a "taxpayers' bill of rights" and then asked Mr. Webb how many Virginians have benefited from Mr. Bush's tax cuts, which Mr. Webb has criticized and the senator wants to make permanent.

Mr. Webb did not answer, and Mr. Allen responded that 3 million residents have been helped by the cuts, which are set to expire.

However, Mr. Webb said the costly Iraq war makes tax cuts for the wealthy impractical. "You can't keep spending like this without increasing revenue," he said.

Republicans have given many of the wealthiest people and the largest companies tax breaks while health care and education costs for the poor and middle class have skyrocketed, Mr. Webb said.

Mr. Allen said that he favors a proposed state constitutional amendment that would define marriage as "a way to protect the values and views of the people of Virginia from judges who want to impose their own elitist views."

Mr. Webb said that he thinks marriage should be between one man and one woman but added that he opposes the measure because it is unnecessary and would harm unmarried heterosexual couples.

On immigration, Mr. Allen said he opposed the "comprehensive" Senate immigration bill because it rewards illegal aliens.

Mr. Webb said the Bush administration has "failed" to deal with immigration problems, and noted that day-laborer shelters such as the one in Herndon are a good short-term solution for businesses plagued by loitering.

DOJ_NMG_0077122

Mr. Allen opened himself to scrutiny in August when he called an Indian-American Webb volunteer "macaca," which is considered a racial slur in some cultures.

After that, several people who knew Mr. Allen when he was a University of Virginia student accused him of regularly using a racial slur to describe blacks.

Last night, Mr. Allen dismissed the stories as "baseless," saying they don't reflect "who I am" or how he was raised. He added: "I don't recall using that word."

Mr. Allen has apologized frequently for the "macaca" comment, saying he made up the word.

Mr. Webb has been criticized for his 1979 article "Women Can't Fight," which questioned the role of women in military billets.

The debate was crucial for each candidate, as there is less than a month remaining before the election. Polls show Mr. Allen with a slight lead or tied with Mr. Webb.

Today is the deadline for Virginians to register to vote in the Nov. 7 election.

Stock Options Held By Allen Not Disclosed To Congress (WP)

By Michael D. Shear

The Washington Post, October 10, 2006

RICHMOND, Oct. 9 -- Sen. George Allen did not disclose to Congress that he owned stock options in a Virginia high-tech company and has now requested an opinion from the Senate Ethics Committee about whether that failure violated Senate rules.

Allen (R-Va.) received options on 15,000 shares of stock in Commonwealth Biotechnologies Inc. after serving on its board of directors between the end of his term as governor and his election to the Senate. He disclosed the options before his first Senate term in 2001 but has not reported his continued ownership of them since, campaign officials said Monday.

That failure to disclose, as first reported by the Associated Press, has prompted criticism of Allen as he battles for a second term in the Senate against Democratic challenger James Webb.

Webb spokeswoman Kristian Denny Todd called for an investigation of the allegations by Republican leaders in the Senate. "If true, these allegations represent a serious betrayal of the voters of Virginia," she said.

Allen spokesman Dan Allen said Monday that the senator did not report the stock options after the first year because his attorneys interpreted the Senate's written rules to mean he did not have to.

"We were following guidelines based on the reporting disclosures," said Dan Allen, no relation to the senator. "It was a matter of public record. He certainly wasn't hiding anything."

All members of the Senate and the U.S. House of Representatives are required to report their finances annually to Congress. They must list their assets, such as homes, investment holdings and salaries, as well as liabilities.

Under terms of Allen's stock options, he can buy the Commonwealth shares at $7.50 each.

The company's stock closed at $2.58 per share Monday, making the options worthless today, but potentially valuable if the stock rises above $7.50. The Senate's disclosure instructions say that options that are not vested or are "contingent upon the occurrence of some future event" need not be disclosed.

But Dan Allen said the senator recently became aware that the Senate Ethics Manual requires annual disclosure of options, even when they are currently worthless. He said the senator will abide by the decision of the ethics committee.

"We have clearly, proactively gone to the ethics committee," Dan Allen said. "Of course, the Webb campaign is going to launch attacks on this. They understand if it gets away from the issues, ideas and Allen's past performance of service, they have a chance of winning this race."

Sheila Krumholz, acting executive director of the nonpartisan Center for Responsive Politics, said Allen's defense -- that the options were worthless -- should not excuse him from having to disclose that he owned them.

"It doesn't matter whether the exercise price is above or below the current stock price," she said. "What matters is you own it, you have it and at some point it may be worth money."

Krumholz said that public disclosure about ownership of such stock options helps voters decide whether lawmakers are making policy decisions that also enrich themselves. There is no evidence that Allen did anything to boost the stock price of Commonwealth.

"If it is worthless today, and then worth millions next year, then it's of enormous interest whether the representative or senator made decisions based on their potential financial gain," Krumholz said.

Allen's staff also acknowledged Monday that the senator had written a letter on behalf of another Virginia company in which he owned stock.

In the December 2001 letter, furnished by Allen campaign officials, the senator urged the Army to expedite a decision regarding a contract with Xybernaut, another Virginia high-tech company. Allen also has served on Xybernaut's board.

DOJ_NMG_0077123

"Your immediate attention and expeditious assistance with the requests and concerns expressed in this case would be greatly appreciated," Allen wrote in the five-sentence letter to Army officials as Xybernaut vied for a Army with the service.

Campaign officials said that the request by Xybernaut was turned down and that Allen's only intervention was in a form letter. The office provided copies of similar letters written on behalf of other Virginia companies that contained the exact language. The AP also first reported about the Xybernaut letter.

This is not the first time Allen has faced inquiries about his corporate dealings.

In 2001, news reports surfaced that Allen had reported a $279,000, one-time payment from stock options he received as an advisory board member at Com-Net Ericsson, a high-tech company in Lynchburg, Va.

Allen joined the Com-Net board in 2000 after helping the company expand while governor.

The payment was made after Allen received a ruling from the Senate Ethics Committee that the compensation did not violate Senate rules.

"Senator Allen takes this very seriously," Dan Allen said. "He's always been open and honest."

Mr. Allen's Ethics (WP)

The Washington Post, October 10, 2006

After he left the Virginia governor's mansion in 1998 and before he entered the U.S. Senate in 2001, George F. Allen of Virginia did what out-of-office politicians often do: He tried to make some money. As it happens, a number of companies that he had assisted as a pro-business Republican governor returned the favor once he was a private citizen by inviting him to join their boards and furnishing him with potentially valuable stock options. One of them was a high-tech government contractor called Com-Net Ericsson, whose stock options translated into a one-time windfall for Mr. Allen worth $279,000 in 2001. As governor, Mr. Allen had helped Com-Net with its expansion plans.

It is not illegal for a governor to help out companies while in office and then join with them once he leaves -- though one can certainly question the ethics of doing so. However, it becomes a potentially graver problem when a U.S. senator owns options to buy a substantial quantity of a government contractor's stock -- and then goes to bat for that company with an arm of the federal government.

That's apparently what Mr. Allen did, in his first year in the Senate, when he intervened with the U.S. Army on behalf of a government contractor called Xybernaut Corp. According to the Associated Press, Mr. Allen joined Xybernaut's board shortly after leaving the governor's office; at the time he was urging the Army to help the firm, he still owned options to buy 110,000 shares of the company's stock. Had the Army heeded Mr. Allen's request and come down in Xybernaut's favor, the firm's stock price might well have gone up.

The Army did not give Xybernaut what it wanted and, according to Mr. Allen's aides, the senator offered no further help. Eventually, Mr. Allen sold his Xybernaut stock at a loss, he told the Associated Press. Still, his aides didn't dispute that Mr. Allen, in his official capacity, intervened on behalf of a firm in which he had a financial interest.

The AP also reported that for the past five years -- years in which he filed annual disclosure reports -- Mr. Allen did not report his stock options in a firm called Commonwealth Biotechnologies Inc., on whose board Mr. Allen also served. The senator's explanation is that he believed the options were worthless, since the option purchase price exceeded the stock's market value. That is beside the point. What is relevant is that Mr. Allen has a financial stake in Commonwealth, which as a government contractor may have business before Congress.

Mr. Allen says his financial dealings have been aboveboard. But in these cases they appear to reflect at best an ethical sloppiness.

Allen Manages To Create A Diversion (WP)

By Marc Fisher

The Washington Post, October 10, 2006

Suddenly, macaca, Jewish heritage and racial slurs are yesterday's news. Look through Virginia's newspapers, look even at the partisan blogs that relish hitting Sen. George Allen as hard as they can: The feeding frenzy has subsided. The waters seem almost calm again.

The Allen campaign must be, as the senator's ancestors might have put it, kvelling (Yiddish for bursting with pride.) Without going through the ritual Oprah-style confessional purification, Allen and his strategists have managed to steer attention away from his awful few weeks and back onto far more comfortable turf for the one-term senator who still harbors hopes of becoming president.

How did the Allen camp achieve this remarkable turnaround? Simple. They announced that they were changing the subject. All it took was a few moves, none of them particularly exotic:

Â· Allen launched an "Issues, Ideas and Record Tour" of friendly locales where he talked, albeit without many specifics, about "issues."

Â· The campaign announced that the senator would go on TV -- not to address claims that in college he regularly used racial slurs, not to justify his verbal attack on an Indian American working for his opponent's campaign and not to explain why he reacted so negatively when asked about his family's Jewish background. No, all the campaign said was that Allen would make a "major address." That the two-minute TV ad was neither major nor much of an address didn't matter; the moment became a turning point in the Allen campaign.

Â· Allen strategists rolled out the candidate's wife to stand by his side -- literally -- during the "major address," smiling admiringly. Then Susan Allen sat for a Washington Post interview that helped soften the senator's image.

Â· Day after day, Allen presented new endorsements from blacks -- a Democratic legislator, ministers, community leaders. Message: It's okay to go back in the water.

All of this dovetailed beautifully with the Allen campaign's new offensive, a redoubled attack on Democratic challenger Jim Webb for being anti-woman because of a 27-year-old magazine piece Webb wrote arguing against enrolling women at the U.S. Naval Academy. Webb responded reasonably effectively to Allen's TV ad, but it hardly mattered. The subject had been changed.

Still, the Allen camp is hardly home free. Allen's lawyer has admitted this week that the senator failed to disclosed to Congress stock options he received after serving as a director of Commonwealth Biotechnologies Inc., a Virginia company. And even once the bleeding from macaca and the racial slurs was stanched, Allen seemed to remain on the wrong side of public opinion on the Iraq war.

Allen had taken the harshest imaginable, least independent stance in favor of the Bush policy in Iraq: Everything was going fine, no need to pull out, no need to second-guess the war effort. But now, he has used this shift in the campaign's subject matter to change direction. Here's George Allen tacking to the center, alertly taking advantage of Sen. John Warner's conversion to the skeptical side. In a conference call with reporters Friday, Allen awkwardly embraced his fellow Virginian's assessment that things are going poorly in Iraq.

Never mind that Allen's new stance -- the war is a failure, but we have to stay the course -- makes little sense. And Allen didn't go quite as far as Warner, who said that if U.S. forces don't show major progress in 30 to 60 days, it will be time for "bold action," presumably the old Monty Python battle call: "Run away!"

Despite the logical holes in his new position, Allen manages to come off as more independent and honest than many Republicans, such as Maryland Senate candidate Michael Steele (who resorted to a thinly veiled off-the-record lunch to slip in his critical comments about his party's failed foreign policy).

How has Allen been permitted to do all this? Why hasn't the Webb campaign taken advantage of the moment to raise further questions about Allen's credibility and character? Where are the stories trying to square the young man who relished using racial slurs with the senator who went on pilgrimages to absorb the story of the civil rights movement? How did Allen grow up to hold the archaic racial attitudes he seems to have proudly displayed through much of his life? What have his professional relationships with blacks been like through the years?

George Allen runs a savvy campaign and knows how to work the media and public opinion. But we still don't know what really goes on in the heart and head of Virginia's junior senator. Who will demand answers to these questions -- the Webb campaign? Editors and reporters? Virginia's voters?

National Democrats Give Webb A Boost (RTD)

By JEFF E. SCHAPIRO

Richmond Times-Dispatch, October 10, 2006

National Democrats are placing nearly $1 million in television advertising for U.S. Senate hopeful Jim Webb, opening with a commercial spotlighting Republican incumbent George Allen's macaca moment.

The ad could be on the air today in the state's three biggest broadcast markets -- Hampton Roads, Richmond and Northern Virginia.

Sources said yesterday that the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, political arm of the Senate Democratic caucus, is paying for the commercial. Spokesman Phil Singer had no comment.

The TV buy -- described as just less than $1 million -- is a long-awaited lifeline for Webb, who is even with Allen in recent polls. Though he trails in fundraising, Webb has closed the gap in the wake of Allen miscues.

This includes Allen's use of an obscure racial slur -- "macaca" to describe an Indian-American volunteer for Webb. Allen said he made up the word, which refers to a genus of monkey. Widely circulated video from the incident was woven into the Democratic ad.

DOJ_NMG_0077125

The 30-second spot also refers to Allen's opposition to a Democratic budget amendment to purchase body armor for troops assigned to Iraq.

The commercial, to be most heavily broadcast in vote-rich Northern Virginia, notes Allen's resistance to an increase in the federal minimum wage and contributions to his campaign from oil companies.

The Allen campaign said the ad, running after U.S. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., pledged $2 million to the DSCC, is evidence that Webb is captive to liberal out-of-state interests.

"This is further proof that Jim Webb has been bought and paid for by Hillary Clinton," said Allen strategist Christopher J. LaCivita.

A spokeswoman for the Webb campaign could not be reached for comment.

The commercial was produced for the DSCC by Jim Mulhall, an adviser to then-U.S. Sen. Charles S. Robb, D-Va., in his losing campaign to Allen in 2000. Mulhall declined to comment.

Virginia Senator Did Not Disclose Stock Options (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, October 9, 2006

RICHMOND, Va., Oct. 8 (AP) — For the past five years, Senator George Allen, Republican of Virginia, has failed to tell Congress about stock options he got for his work as a director of a high-tech company.

Congressional rules require senators to disclose to the Senate all deferred compensation, like stock options. The rules also urge senators to avoid taking any official action that could benefit them financially or appear to do so.

Mr. Allen's stock options date to the period from January 1998 to January 2001, after his term as governor of Virginia and before he took office as senator.

The Associated Press reviewed his financial dealings from that time and found that he had twice failed to promptly alert the Securities and Exchange Commission of insider stock transactions as a director of Xybernaut and of Commonwealth Biotechnologies.

In interviews, Mr. Allen and his staff sought to play down his corporate dealings, saying they were a good learning experience but did not lead to any large amounts of money, except for a $250,000 windfall from Com-Net Ericsson stock.

Mr. Allen's office said he had sold his Xybernaut stock at a loss and had not cashed in his Commonwealth options because they cost more than the stock is now worth. The senator also said he saw no conflict in going to work for companies shortly after assisting them as governor.

"I actually got no money out of Xybernaut," he said. "I got paid in stock options, which were worthless."

Mr. Allen's office said he did not report his Commonwealth options because their purchase price was higher than the current market value. Mr. Allen viewed them as worthless and believed he did not have to report them, aides said.

Kathleen Clark, a law professor at Washington University in St. Louis, a former prosecutor and a former Democratic Congressional aide, said, "As an ethical matter, it's irrelevant whether the exercise price of those stock options is above or below the current market price."

"If he owns stock options," Ms. Clark added, "he does have such a financial stake."

Mr. Allen's office acknowledged that he had met socially over the years with company executives and that his office had granted "routine courtesy meetings" to company lobbyists "to hear their opinion on legislation and issues before the federal government."

John Reid, a spokesman for Mr. Allen, said he was aware of only one instance in which Mr. Allen's office had helped a former company. That came in December 2001 when Mr. Allen asked the Army to resolve a lingering issue with Xybernaut. The company asked Mr. Allen to intervene, and he urged the Army to give Xybernaut an answer, Mr. Reid said. At the time, Mr. Allen still owned options to buy 110,000 shares of Xybernaut stock, which could have been affected by new federal contracts.

The Army answered but did not give Xybernaut what it wanted, and Mr. Allen did nothing more, Mr. Reid said.

As governor, Mr. Allen took representatives of Xybernaut and Ericsson on trade missions. He helped steer $4 million in tax-exempt bonds to Commonwealth for a new headquarters and announced an $800,000 state grant to help Lynchburg prepare a site for an Ericsson expansion.

Allen Broke Rules By Not Disclosing His Stock Options (WT/AP)

By Sharon Theimer And Bob Lewis, Associated Press

The Washington Times, October 9, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0077126

RICHMOND -- Sen. George Allen has failed for the past five years to tell Congress about the stock options he got for his work as a director of a high-tech company. Mr. Allen, a Virginia Republican running for re-election, also asked the Army to help another business that gave him similar options.

Congressional rules require senators to disclose all deferred compensation, such as stock options. The rules also urge senators to avoid taking official action that could benefit them financially or appear to do so.

The requirements allow the public to police lawmakers for possible conflicts of interest, especially those involving companies with government business.

Mr. Allen has stock options from January 1998 to January 2001 when he was between political jobs and had plunged into the corporate world.

A review of his financial dealings from that time found that the senator:

·Joined three Virginia high-tech companies that he assisted as governor. Mr. Allen served on boards of directors for Xybernaut and Commonwealth Biotechnologies and advised Com-Net Ericsson, all government contractors.

·Twice failed to promptly alert the Securities and Exchange Commission of insider-stock transactions as a Xybernaut and Commonwealth director. The agency requires timely notification and can fine those who file late.

· Kept stock options for serving as a director of Xybernaut and Commonwealth, but steered other compensation from his board service to his law firm.

Mr. Allen, is running for re-election against Democrat James H. Webb Jr. and is a potential 2008 presidential candidate.

He also has served in the U.S. House and as governor. From 1998 through 2000, he worked as a private lawyer and businessman before his election to the Senate.

Mr. Allen and his staff have downplayed his corporate dealings, saying they were a good learning experience but did not lead to extraordinary riches -- except for a quarter-million-dollar windfall from Com-Net Ericsson stock.

Mr. Allen's office said the senator sold his Xybernaut stock at a loss and has not cashed in his Commonwealth options because they cost more than the stock is now worth. Mr. Allen also said he saw no conflict in going to work for companies shortly after assisting them as governor.

"I actually got no money out of Xybernaut," he said. "I got paid in stock options, which were worthless. Commonwealth Biotech asked me to be on their board. Glad to do it. I learned a lot on their board and enjoyed working with 'em, and they seem to be doing all right, I guess."

Mr. Allen's office also said the senator did not report his Commonwealth options on his past five Senate disclosure reports because their purchase price was higher than the market value. Mr. Allen viewed them as worthless and believed in "good faith" that he did not have to report them, aides said.

Mr. Allen disclosed the options once -- on an amendment to his 2000 ethics report filed three months after the normal filing period ended. He excluded the options from subsequent reports.

When Mr. Allen's lawyer was shown the Senate ethics manual requirement that such options must be reported each year regardless of value, the lawyer said he was unfamiliar with the provision. Mr. Allen has asked the Senate ethics committee for an opinion on whether he should have disclosed them.

"While we continue to believe that we have disclosed more than is required, we will abide by the formal ruling of the committee," Allen spokesman John Reid said.

Says he acted correctly; ethics panel to review case

RICHMOND, Va. — For the past five years, Sen. George Allen has failed to tell Congress about stock options he got for his work as a director of a high-tech company. The Virginia Republican also asked the Army to help another business that gave him similar options.

Congressional rules require senators to disclose all deferred compensation, such as stock options. The rules also urge senators to avoid taking any official action that could benefit them financially or appear to do so.

Options give the holder the future right to buy stock at a fixed price that could be lower than the market value at the time of purchase.

Allen's office said he did not report his options from Commonwealth Biotechnologies because their purchase price was higher than the market value. Allen believed in “good faith” he did not have to report them, spokesman John Reid said.

At issue are Allen's stock options from January 1998 to January 2001 when he was between political jobs.

The AP also found that Allen twice failed to promptly alert the Securities and Exchange Commission of insider stock transactions as a Xybernaut and Commonwealth director. The SEC requires timely notification and can fine those who file late.

Allen joined Commonwealth's board about two months after leaving the governor's office in January 1998. Xybernaut named him a director that August, and he became a Com-Net Ericsson adviser in February 2000.

The senator said he saw no conflict in going to work for companies shortly after assisting them as governor. “I actually got no money out of Xybernaut. I got paid in stock options, which were worthless. Commonwealth Biotech asked me to be on their board. Glad to do it,” Allen said.

Reid said Allen asked the Army in December 2001 to resolve an issue with Xybernaut. At the time, Allen still owned stock options. The Army did not give Xybernaut what it wanted and Allen did nothing more, Reid said.

Mo. candidates spar on Iraq, scandal

Missouri Sen. Jim Talent clashed Sunday with Democratic challenger Claire McCaskill in a debate on NBC's Meet the Press that centered on Iraq and the congressional page scandal. Talent said he still would have voted to go to war in Iraq even if he had known in 2002 that U.S. intelligence was wrong in concluding Iraq possessed weapons of mass destruction. McCaskill, the state auditor, urged military leaders to consider redeploying U.S. troops out of Iraq over the next two years “give or take.”

McCaskill also said House Speaker Dennis Hastert should resign for failing to properly investigate reports of former congressman Mark Foley's inappropriate e-mails to male teens. Talent said it was premature to demand resignations until an investigation is complete.

Wanted: More election workers in Md.

Maryland elections officials are trying to find more Republican poll workers to avoid delayed poll openings that marred the Sept. 12 primary. GOP Gov. Robert Ehrlich sent a letter to state employees seeking volunteers, and the Baltimore mayor's office mailed letters last week to city Republicans. Mayor Martin O'Malley, a Democrat, is challenging Ehrlich. State law requires that precincts with more than 200 registered voters have at least two election judges present from each of the major parties.

Mo. Candidates Debate Foley, Iraq War (AP-Y)

By Sam Hananel, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 9, 2006

Candidates in Missouri's hotly contested Senate race clashed Sunday over the congressional page sex scandal and the war in Iraq, with the Democratic challenger saying House Speaker Dennis Hastert should quit.

Missouri state auditor Claire McCaskill said Hastert, R-Ill., and other GOP leaders failed to properly investigate when they first learned of former Rep. Mark Foley's e-mails to congressional pages.

"When a 50-year old man is asking a teenage boy on the Internet for his picture, the response needs to be something other than 'I better go tell the chairman of the Republican campaign committee,' " McCaskill said.

Republican Sen. Jim Talent said it was premature to demand resignations until a formal investigation is complete. The House ethics committee is conducting a probe.

"We need to find out who knew what, we need to have a zero tolerance policy and let the chips fall where they may," Talent said.

The Missouri race is considered a must-win for Democrats, who need to gain six seats to recapture control of the Senate. Recent polls show the candidates running about even.

DOJ_NMG_0077128

Much of the candidates' debate Sunday on NBC's "Meet the Press" focused on Iraq and national security. Talent described McCaskill's views as weak on fighting terrorism, criticizing her for opposing President Bush's domestic surveillance policy and for calling on Bush to redeploy troops from Iraq over a two-year period.

McCaskill, in turn, portrayed Talent's views as those of a politician who has spent too long in Washington.

Talent insisted that, had he been in the Senate in 2002, he would have voted to go to war in Iraq even if he had known that U.S. intelligence was wrong in concluding Iraq possessed weapons of mass destruction. He said ousting Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein was necessary to eliminate him as a threat to the region, including any attempt to revive Iraq's nuclear program.

Asked whether the $300 billion spent on Iraq could have been better spent fighting terrorism elsewhere, Talent said the money represented just 1 percent of the U.S. gross domestic product.

"Clearly he's been in Washington too long if he doesn't think $300 billion is not a lot of money," McCaskill retorted.

Knowing what she knows now, McCaskill said, she would not have voted for war. She called for military leaders to consider redeploying U.S. troops out of Iraq over the next two years or so, and said she agreed with the assessment of Sen. John Warner, R-Va., that Iraq is "drifting sideways."

On other issues, Talent defended his opposition to embryonic stem cell research, which has become a major sticking point in the race. Missouri voters are weighing a ballot initiative that would amend the state constitution to protect all federally allowed forms of stem cell research.

McCaskill, who has made her support for the research a cornerstone of her campaign, said the ballot measure prohibits human cloning and offers hope for future treatment of various diseases.

McCaskill would not apologize for comments she made last month in which she claimed that Bush had "let people die on rooftops in New Orleans because they were poor and because they were black" during Hurricane Katrina.

"I was acknowledging what Americans believed at the time," she said, though she added that she "probably should have said it another way."

Talent, whose House voting record agrees with Bush's agenda 94 percent of the time, dismissed any notion that he could face a backlash from anti-Bush voters. Talent said he is independent and differs from Bush over immigration, farm policy, highway funding and other issues.

"Why don't they ever say in those surveys that the president agreed with me a certain percentage of the time?" Talent said. "I've been in public life a lot longer than he has."

Tight Missouri Senate Race Takes 'Meet The Press' Spotlight (SLPD)

By Deirdre Shesgreen

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, October 9, 2006

WASHINGTON — Republican Sen. Jim Talent and Democratic rival Claire McCaskill sparred over Iraq, terrorism, stem cell research, and the leadership of President George W. Bush in a 40-minute nationally televised debate on Sunday.

Engaged in one of the tightest and most closely watched races in the country, Talent and McCaskill disagreed on the first question out of the box on NBC's "Meet the Press": Whether House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., should resign amid questions about his handling of the congressional page sex scandal.

McCaskill, Missouri's state auditor, said yes.

She contended the scandal involving ex-Rep. Mark Foley's e-mails to House pages demonstrated "an arrogance of power."

"It is about holding on to power instead of about doing the right thing."

Talent asserted, however, that Hastert doesn't need to resign - at least not yet.

"I'm comfortable with the investigation moving forward," Talent said, "and the people who were responsible taking the consequences. And that's up to, and including, the speaker."

Polls show the race to be a dead heat, one of a handful of contests that will determine which party controls the Senate after November.

Sunday's exchange focused heavily on terrorism and Iraq, with commentator Tim Russert grilling both candidates about the war.

He asked Talent how he could assert, as the senator recently did, that the U.S. is making progress in Iraq and the mission is going well, when U.S. military and Iraqi civilian casualties are spiraling.

Talent responded that the level of violence was "unacceptable" but that he still believed the U.S. had made progress. "Saddam is gone and the threat he represented is gone," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0077129

Talent accused McCaskill of being "weak" on the war against terrorism, saying she wants to set an "artificial" timeline for withdrawal from Iraq. He pointed to questions she has raised over the president's warrantless wiretapping program and a recent military trial bill that prevents terrorism suspects from challenging their detention in court.

McCaskill strongly rejected the suggestion that she was weak on terrorism, saying she supports giving the president the tools he needs to do proper surveillance. And she defended her call for a phased, two-year redeployment of U.S. troops from Iraq to other countries in the region.

"Iraq is a mess," she said. "If you're in a hole, you need to quit digging. We are breeding a culture of dependence. We are not breeding a democracy."

Talent said he still would have voted for the war even if he knew in advance that there were no weapons of mass destruction. Asked how long he would support keeping 145,000 U.S. troops there, he said "we have to be there until the mission is done."

Bush and Clinton

In response to a question from Russert, Talent also dismissed any notion that the $300 billion spent in Iraq might have been better spent in Afghanistan or on domestic security at home. Talent said the tab for Iraq and Afghanistan was only 1 percent of the gross domestic product and that Iraq was "an important front on the war on terror."

McCaskill quickly shot back: "Sen. Talent, I think, just said the $300 billion was not a lot of money. Clearly, he's been in Washington too long if he doesn't think $300 billion is a lot of money."

McCaskill accused Talent of not holding the administration accountable for mistakes in the war.

For Talent, one of the most uncomfortable moments of the debate seemed to come after Russert played a series of clips of Bush praising Talent and noted that Talent had voted with the president 94 percent of the time. Russert asked the senator whether Bush was a great president.

Talent wouldn't give a clear answer. "History judges presidents," Talent said, sitting beside a gleeful-looking McCaskill. "History is going to say there were some things he did that were right and some things he did that were wrong."

McCaskill ridiculed Talent's response, and when asked the same question about former President Bill Clinton, she quipped: "He's been a great leader, but I don't want my daughter near him."

McCaskill did a little squirming herself, when Russert asked her whether she would apologize for saying that Bush let people in New Orleans die "because they were poor and because they were black."

At first, she did not back down, saying that she was voicing how "millions of Americans felt," although she added, "I do not believe the president is a racist."

Pressed again, she said, "Maybe I shouldn't have said it that way - but the feelings are real." She said "our citizens died because we couldn't get them food or water. This is not an administration that's ready to protect us."

Stem cell issue

The two candidates also exchanged sharp jabs over stem cell research - one of the hottest issues in the Missouri campaign.

Earlier this year, Talent withdrew his support for a federal human cloning ban that some critics said would also outlaw crucial stem cell research. But he opposes a Missouri referendum that would protect certain kinds of stem cell research.

Asked by Russert about his switch, Talent said the state referendum would "create an unqualified constitutional right to clone at the earliest stages of human life."

Russert asked McCaskill how she could support a form of research that some have said is equivalent to abortion.

"My faith directs me to heal the sick," she said. "I come down on the side of hope, hope for cures and for supporting science."

Talent And McCaskill Clash On Iraq And The Foley Case (GNN)

By Pamela Brogan

Gannett News Service, October 9, 2006

Washingon — Missouri's Senate candidates clashed today on NBC's "Meet the Press" over issues ranging from Iraq to the congressional page scandal.

"Iraq is a mess," Claire McCaskill, the Democratic state auditor said.

"We can either stay the course or we can change the course."

Republican Sen. Jim Talent insisted that that he still would have voted to go to war in Iraq even if he had known in 2002 that Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein did not have weapons of mass destruction.

"I think it was the only possible strategic choice," Talent said. "He represented a threat to us. That threat is now gone," Talent said.

Talent also said that the U.S. has to "finish the mission" but acknowledged that when Congress voted to go to war "the administration and many underestimated the time it would take to stabilize the central part of the country."

Both candidates, who are the parents of teens, expressed disgust over the scandal involving former Rep. Mark Foley, R-Fla.

McCaskill, a former prosecutor, said House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., should resign because Republicans leaders failed to properly investigate when they learned that Foley was sending lurid Internet messages to teenage congressional pages.

"I know this: that when a 50-year-old man is asking a teenage boy on the Internet for his picture, the response needs to be something other than, 'I better go tell the chairman of the Republican campaign committee,'" McCaskill said.

She said the scandal is about an "arrogance of power" and "about holding onto power instead of doing the right thing."

Talent said that Congress needs to have a "zero tolerance policy" for such behavior, but said it was too early to demand resignations before the House Ethics Committee completes its probe.

"This is something that transcends politics," Talent said. "This is a question of protecting these pages and making sure their parents and the public have confidence in the system."

The Missouri race is one of six Senate contests that are tossups. Democrats need six seats to regain control of the Senate, making those races top priorities for Republicans. A poll Friday by USA Today and Gallup Poll found that among 577 likely Missouri voters, 48 percent support McCaskill and 45 percent favor Talent. The poll's margin of error is 5 percentage points.

Both candidates fielded several questions about Iraq and national security.

Talent called McCaskill's views on the war against terror "comprehensively positions of weaknesses."

He criticized her for supporting a withdrawal of troops within two years and for opposing President Bush's domestic surveillance policy.

McCaskill said that Talent, a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, has not asked the Bush administration enough tough questions about the war or held it accountable for its mistakes.

"We should be saying, 'How do we get out of this mess?' Not, "this is a good policy, a sound policy, we need to continue down this road.'"

Moderator Tim Russert asked both candidates whether the $300 billion spent on the Iraq conflict could have been better spent in Afghanistan or on domestic programs.

"No, I think this is an important front on the war on terror," Talent said.

"What we've spent on Iraq and Afghanistan in total is one percent of the gross domestic product (the sum of all goods and services produced in the U.S.)," he added.

McCaskill said that she believed that Talent was implying that $300 billion "was not a lot of money."

"Clearly, he's been in Washington too long, if he doesn't think that $300 billion is a lot of money," she said.

Talent Stresses Independence From Bush (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni, The Washington Times
The Washington Times, October 9, 2006

Missouri Sen. Jim Talent tried to distance himself from President Bush yesterday in a nationally televised debate, during which he and his Democratic opponent, Claire McCaskill, argued over Iraq and stem-cell research.

Tim Russert, host of NBC's "Meet the Press," challenged both candidates on their past statements -- asking Mr. Talent about his ties to the poorly polling president and Mrs. McCaskill about her insinuating Mr. Bush is a racist.

Mr. Talent blanched when Mr. Russert noted that Mr. Bush has campaigned for him in Missouri at least four times, and the senator has voted with the president 94 percent of the time, according to Congressional Quarterly.

"Why don't they ever say in those surveys that the president agreed with me a certain percentage of the time?" Mr. Talent asked. "I've been in public life a lot longer than he has. When I went in the Congress, I think he was still running the Texas Rangers. He's come a little bit further, I guess, than I have since then."

Mr. Talent, first elected as a representative in 1992, contended that he is independent of Mr. Bush on immigration, farm policy and highway funding.

The senator opposed the "comprehensive" immigration plan that most senators and the president supported. He said it equates to amnesty for illegal aliens.

Mr. Russert also got tough on Mrs. McCaskill, the state auditor, over these September comments: "George Bush let people die on rooftops in New Orleans because they were poor and because they were black."

When asked whether she should apologize for her remark, first reported by St. Louis blog Pub Def Weekly, Mrs. McCaskill didn't back down.

"I was acknowledging what Americans believed at the time. I don't believe he's a racist," she said. "I probably should have said it another way, but the feelings are real."

The two candidates are neck and neck in one of the nation's most closely watched races, a key race for Democrats hoping to regain Senate control.

The Iraq war provided sharp contrast between Mr. Talent and Mrs. McCaskill, with the incumbent saying the U.S. has "made progress" despite escalating troop casualties and the Democrat calling the prolonged conflict a "mess."

Mr. Talent, who called his challenger's views on wiretapping and detainee treatment "weak," said he would still have voted for the Iraq war had he known there were no weapons of mass destruction, because he thought removing Saddam Hussein from power was crucial to the war on terrorism. "It was the only possible strategic choice," he said.

Mrs. McCaskill said equating Iraq with the war on terrorism is an attempt to confuse voters in an election year and said she wants the U.S. to begin withdrawing troops.

"We are creating more terrorists around the world with this failed policy in Iraq," she said.

But Mr. Talent shot back: "It's not a question of politics, it's not a question of people's motives, it's a question of what's going to win this war. And positions of weakness are not going to do it."

Mr. Talent's vote against a bill to provide federal funding for embryonic stem-cell research is a hot topic in Missouri, where polls show strong support for the Stem Cell Research and Cures Initiative on the state's fall ballot. Actor Michael J. Fox, who has Parkinson's disease, recently raised $200,000 for Mrs. McCaskill, calling her a "champion" of stem-cell research.

Mr. Talent yesterday called stem-cell research a form of cloning and said the benefits of such research were "speculative."

"The ballot issue would create a constitutional right -- an unqualified constitutional right -- to clone the earliest stages of human life," something he said he is "not comfortable doing" as an evangelical Christian.

"Our country has never turned its back on medical research, and we shouldn't in Missouri," Mrs. McCaskill countered, adding that her religion teaches her to be a healer.

The Missouri measure would amend the state constitution to protect the type of stem-cell research allowed at the federal level. It sets guidelines to conduct research on stem cells "ethically and safely" and bans human cloning.

Missouri Debaters Battle For The Suburbs (WP)

By Shailagh Murray, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 9, 2006

Sen. James M. Talent of Missouri and Democratic challenger Claire McCaskill sparred over the war in Iraq, stem cell research and the House page scandal in a feisty debate yesterday, as the candidates fought for an edge in a race that polls show is a dead heat.

Talent's challenge is to win moderate suburban voters who have grown disillusioned with GOP leadership, while rallying the more partisan-minded social conservatives who live in rural southern Missouri. The senator battled throughout the debate to balance those competing constituencies.

Tim Russert, who moderated the debate on NBC's "Meet the Press," noted that Talent sided with Bush on almost every major issue and counted four times that the president had visited Missouri on Talent's behalf. He then asked Talent to evaluate Bush's tenure.

"Certainly, he's going to end up better than Jimmy Carter, probably not as good as Ronald Reagan," the senator replied. "A lot depends on what happens on whether we can complete the mission in Iraq, and win the war on terror."

McCaskill, now serving as the state auditor, also is juggling constituencies. She is vying with Talent for suburban voters and some rural support, while counting on a huge Democratic-base turnout in St. Louis and Kansas City. She was drawn into an exchange on abortion, one of the many divisive social issues that she has steadfastly avoided throughout the campaign.

"I certainly believe that abortion should remain safe, legal and rare," McCaskill said. "But why don't we concentrate on prevention? None of us want abortion, none of us support abortion."

Pressed by Talent and Russert, she said she supported a ban on so-called partial-birth abortion, with an exception for the life of the mother.

McCaskill, meanwhile, has sought to paint Talent as a conservative extremist on the issue of embryonic stem cell research. Missouri voters will consider a proposed constitutional amendment on Nov. 7 to safeguard early stage stem cell research.

The initiative is supported by prominent moderate Republicans such as former senator John Danforth, along with Gov. Matt Blunt. Supporters believe the measure could be a boon to biomedical research, by making Missouri the first state to formally recognize a right for scientists to conduct the research and for patients to receive treatment.

Talent opposes the measure because he said it could lead to human cloning. "My faith directs me to heal the sick," McCaskill countered.

The candidates spent most of the 40-minute session arguing about national security. McCaskill sketched out the approach to Iraq that she favors: "We need to give them notice. We need to tell the Iraqi government that we're not going to build democracy at the barrel of a gun. It's time for them to stand up and begin taking responsibility for their country."

Talent defended the decision to go to war as "the only possible strategic choice" and said it was warranted even though Iraq did not have weapons of mass destruction. "Well, [Saddam Hussein] wanted them," Talent told Russert. He said the current level of sectarian violence "can't be sustained" and that the Iraqi government "needs to deal with it." But he said progress has been made. Setting a timetable for withdrawal "would be sending a notice to the terrorists that we're going to quit," Talent said.

The candidates also tangled over the Republican House leadership's response to the disclosure that former representative Mark Foley (R-Fla.) had sent questionable e-mails to teenage male congressional pages. House leaders have been criticized for failing to heed warnings that Foley's behavior was out of control. He resigned from the House when some messages became public.

"It is about holding on to power instead of doing the right thing," said McCaskill, who added that House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (Ill.) -- whose office has been questioned for its response -- should resign.

Talent was more cautious. He said he would await the results of an ongoing investigation. "We need to find out who knew what. We need to have a zero-tolerance policy for this and then let the chips fall where they may," Talent said.

On Friday, a USA Today/Gallup survey of 577 likely voters, showed McCaskill leading Talent 48 percent to 45 percent, with 7 percent undecided. The margin of error was plus or minus five percentage points.

Santorum Keys On 'Islamic Fascism' (PTR)

By David M. Brown

Pittsburg Tribune-Review, October 10, 2006

President Bush lacks broad support for the war in Iraq because he's reluctant to depict it as part of a larger struggle against "Islamic fascism" -- a major threat to the nation's security -- U.S. Sen. Rick Santorum said Monday.

"He (Bush) is managing the public relations on this war very poorly," Santorum, the third-ranking Republican in the Senate, said during a meeting with editors and reporters of the Pittsburgh Tribune-Review.

Bush is more concerned about "making the State Department comfortable" than providing the American people with "a clear message and a clear understanding of what we are up against," said Santorum, in his sharpest criticism of the president to date.

Santorum, who faces an uphill battle for re-election against Democrat Bob Casey, said he discussed the issue with Bush several times and said the president "has given a few good speeches on it, but he does not continually do it."

Bush dropped references to Islamic fascists when the State Department "went ballistic because we are offending our allies in the Middle East," Santorum said. "I don't care if we offend our allies in the Middle East."

Santorum, 48, of Penn Hills, headed Bush's re-election campaign in Pennsylvania in 2004 and has been a strong ally for the White House on most key issues.

Casey, 46, of Scranton, has tried to portray Santorum as a lockstep backer of the Republican president, whose approval ratings in Pennsylvania have plummeted over the past two years.

"He's simply running a campaign that 'I'm Bob Casey, and Rick Santorum is George Bush,'" Santorum charged.

Casey spokesman Larry Smar said: "If you look at Rick Santorum's voting record, it's easy to see why some folks would mistake him for George Bush.

DOJ_NMG_0077133

"There is an old saying: 'A hit dog barks,' and Rick Santorum must be feeling the pressure if he's going out of his way to criticize President Bush, finally, 29 days before the election."

Santorum, who trails Casey, the state treasurer, in several recent public opinion polls, acknowledged that his support of an unpopular war will cost him votes.

"This war is more important than this Senate seat," he said.

Santorum said he supported going to war because he was "concerned about a rise of radical Islam as a trigger point to a larger war that, if we did not stop now, could threaten the very existence of freedom everywhere."

"I think we're facing the greatest threat this country has ever faced," he said.

Although Santorum is concerned about reports that North Korea tested a nuclear weapon, he said a greater potential threat would be for North Korea's nuclear capability to be transferred to Iran, which has ties with North Korea.

Iran is the "principal enemy" in the war on Islamic fascism, he said.

"I see Iran as a country that is very clear about their intention to dominate the Muslim world and then conquer the Christian world."

North Korean leader Kim Jong Il is "a little man, a paranoid man, who, if anything, wants to aggressively unite and control Korea, but he's a failing dictator" whose people are suffering and starving, Santorum said.

North Korea's nuclear weapons capability would be "a great regional threat," particularly to U.S. allies South Korea and Japan. "Every single option should be on the table" regarding what to do about that threat, but only in step with actions agreed upon by South Korea and Japan, Santorum said.

Many analysts consider the race between Santorum and Casey to be the hottest contest on Nov. 7, when Democrats, emboldened by Bush's sagging popularity, escalating violence in Iraq and the continuing fallout from a sex scandal involving former U.S. Rep. Mark Foley of Florida, hope to retake the House and perhaps even the Senate.

Santorum fears a Democratic majority in Congress will imperil the war effort.

"They will see an obligation to go in and create hell for this president, and they will try to get us to scale down our operations."

Santorum yesterday was endorsed by the 40,000-member Pennsylvania Fraternal Order of Police. Casey was endorsed by firefighters representing the western district of the Pennsylvania Professional Fire Fighters Association.

Casey will be in Pittsburgh Wednesday for a fundraiser headlined by U.S. Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., at the David L. Lawrence Convention Center, Downtown.

Santorum and Casey then square off Thursday during a televised debate in Pittsburgh. The hour-long debate will take place at the Downtown studios of KDKA-TV and will air at 7 p.m.

Iraq, Foley Dog The GOP In A Key Race (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, October 10, 2006

MARCUS HOOK, PA.

The town of Marcus Hook turned out two fire trucks, three honor guards, and a brass band to honor Curt Weldon, now in the race of his life to hold his US House seat against retired Adm. Joe Sestak (D) in the November election.

The 10-term lawmaker got his political start as mayor here, where he drove the Pagan biker gang out of town. As the No. 2 Republican on the Armed Services Committee, Mr. Weldon leveraged defense-related jobs into the district.

But this year, knowing and serving the district may not be enough. Local issues, typically the grist of midterm elections, are being eclipsed by national ones: the war in Iraq and low ratings for the GOP-controlled Congress - fueled most recently by a GOP sex scandal involving congressional pages.

"Curt has always done good for us, but a lot of people have turned against Bush because of the war. It's not fair, but it's going to be tough," says Chevelle Sipps, a Weldon supporter here.

Indeed, the Philadelphia region is now Ground Zero in the battle for control of the House, analysts say.

Democrats need a net gain of 15 seats to take control the House, and they hope to pick up three of them in the Philadelphia suburbs: Representatives Weldon in the Seventh District, Jim Gerlach in the Sixth and Mike Fitzpatrick in the Eighth. Historically Republican, the Philadelphia suburbs voted for Democrats Al Gore for president in 2000 and John Kerry in 2004.

"The reason the House Republicans have increased their numbers since 1995 was because they began to win the South, but they've run the string out. There aren't any more seats to win. So the battleground now are the suburbs in the north that used to be Republican and now are trending Democratic: in Ohio, Philadelphia, New York, and Connecticut," says Terry Madonna, a political scientist at Franklin Marshall, who directs the Keystone poll.

A recent Keystone poll now calls the Weldon-Sestak race a "dead heat" with Sestak at 44 percent and Weldon at 43 percent. On Friday, the Cook Political Report shifted its prediction for this race from "lean Republican" to a tossup.

In addition, Democrats are fielding - and financing - strong candidates in these races. "For the first time, voters in this district are being presented with a credible alternative to Weldon," writes Amy Walter, who analyzes House races for the Cook Political Report.

Sestak headquarters in Media, Pa., an upscale suburb of Philadelphia, churns with activity. The campaign claims some 2,000 volunteers, including a vast family network in Delaware County. With seven siblings - six still living in the district, "he has almost enough relatives to win," said President Clinton at a fundraiser for Sestak last week.

But what most distinguishes Sestak from former Weldon rivals is his ability to raise campaign funds, more than $1.14 million from July through Sept. 30, Sestak said Wednesday. That's $2.27 million since he announced his candidacy in February - more than all other previous Weldon rivals combined.

A former three-star admiral who conducted combat operations in Iraq and Afghanistan before retiring in January, Sestak calls the Iraq war a "tragic misadventure" and calls for the withdrawal of US troops by the end of next year.

"When we entered the race, we thought Iraq would be No. 5 or 6 [on the list of voters' concerns], but everywhere we go it's the first or second question," said Sestak, in an interview with the Monitor last week.

"There's such a feeling that something has to change. I respect Congressman Weldon's public service, but he's been there too long," he says.

Sestak served as President Clinton's director for defense policy for the National Security Council. He says that his time in the Navy taught him that "national security begins at home in the health, education, and economic promise of our people."

But since last week he is also discussing the recent sex scandal on Capitol Hill involving former Rep. Mark Foley (R) of Florida, who resigned from Congress Sept. 29 after being confronted with sexually explicit electronic messages that he sent to male former pages.

The Foley scandal is "another heavy stain that indicates what people feel already about this Congress: How accountable are Republicans when they can't take care of themselves ... they knew what was going on and did nothing," Sestak says.

Meanwhile, Weldon, like other GOP incumbents in the suburbs, is highlighting his independence from the GOP establishment. His campaign slogan - Curt Weldon...Independent Fighter for US - doesn't mention the Republican Party. But he's not backing away from the war in Iraq. (Weldon famously volunteered to go to Iraq to search for weapons of mass destruction.) "It's going to be a tough race, but I'm not going to run away from the president," he said in a Monitor interview.

Citing former Democratic sex scandals involving pages and interns, Weldon says there's hypocrisy in the Foley scandal "you could cut with a knife." But he says it's not going to hurt his campaign. "People will see it for what it is," he says. "I'm swimming upstream, but the one thing I have is the people."

But analysts tracking this race say the issue can still hurt him, by depressing Republican turnout and detracting from his message of local service.

"All the momentum is with the Democrats, and it's up to Republicans to break that momentum and turn out their voters. The Foley scandal makes it that much harder for Republicans to get their message out and change that dynamic," says political analyst Stuart Rothenberg.

Sestak is hoping to benefit from the current focus on national issues, says David Landau, senior adviser to the Sestak campaign, who ran against Weldon in 1988. "In a normal election, you can get by with saying 'I'm the guy who saved Boeing,' but with the issues floating around in this election, a congressman has to have something more."

In response, the Weldon campaign says Sestak is a carpetbagger, who doesn't pay property taxes in the district and has missed voting in many recent elections.

"The district wants someone who lives here, not someone who rents a condo two weeks before he comes into the race or mispronounces the names of towns he was in," says Michael Puppio, Weldon's campaign manager.

Republicans Target 3 Senate Races (SFC)

By David Espo

San Francisco Chronicle, October 10, 2006

(10-09) 16:38 PDT WASHINGTON, (AP) --

In an unusual move, the Republican National Committee is investing heavily in television advertising in Senate races in Ohio, Tennessee and Missouri in what officials describe as a firewall strategy designed to limit Democratic gains in the Nov. 7 elections and maintain the GOP majority.

The move reflects a desire on the part of Ken Mehlman, the Republican Party chairman, and other strategists to exercise more control over the drive to retain a majority, according to several Republican officials. They said the decision has caused friction with officials at the National Republican Senatorial Committee, which historically has been the only party entity to run commercials on behalf of its candidates.

The move also raises questions about the priority assigned by the RNC to races in other states where Republicans are in jeopardy — Pennsylvania, Montana and Rhode Island among them.

Officials at both party committees said they were working together.

"We've anticipated a challenging cycle and have been working closely with the NRSC for the past year to strategically allocate our resources," said Tracey Schmitt, spokeswoman for the RNC.

"We've been working as a team for well over a year in planning how we were going to approach these races on every level," said Mark Stephens, executive director of the NRSC.

The RNC's targeted races are Sen. Mike DeWine's re-election effort in Ohio; Sen. Jim Talent's bid for a new term in Missouri, and Bob Corker's drive to hold the Tennessee seat of retiring Majority Leader Bill Frist.

It is not clear how they were chosen. All three races are close, according to public and private polls. They are among eight or nine competitive races around the country — most of them for seats currently in Republican hands — that will determine which party controls the Senate when it convenes in January.

The officials who described the firewall strategy did so on condition of anonymity, saying they were not authorized to speak publicly.

Yet the move is evident in reports filed with the Federal Election Commission. They show the Republican National Committee is paying for polling and television advertising independently. By law, those involved are not permitted to coordinate their activities with the candidates or their campaigns. Coordination is permitted between the two independent groups, though, and Stephens said they share pollsters and ad-making firms.

According to the reports on file, the RNC has spent roughly $2.8 million to help DeWine in his race against Rep. Sherrod Brown and nearly $1 million so far in Tennessee, where Corker is running against Rep. Harold Ford Jr. The party has put about $150,000 into Talent's race against Claire McCaskill.

The NRSC, chaired by Sen. Elizabeth Dole, R-N.C., has also invested heavily in advertising and related expenses in those races, spending about $2.4 million so far in Missouri, $3 million in Ohio and $1.5 million in Tennessee.

While Stephens and Schmitt stressed the cooperation between the two committees, neither had a ready explanation when asked why the RNC had decided to step out on its own when it could simply have transferred funds directly to the senatorial committee.

Nor was it clear why the RNC had decided to scrap the division of responsibilities in use as recently as this summer's Rhode Island GOP senatorial primary. In that case, the RNC paid for get-out-the-vote operations, while the senatorial committee ran ads.

In the case of House campaigns, the RNC has not reported commissioning any polls or paying for any television advertising. Carl Forti, a spokesman for the House campaign committee, said he was not aware of any such effort.

The competitive situation is different in the Senate, though, where the GOP senatorial committee has been at a financial disadvantage with its Democratic counterpart in fundraising. In its most recent report, the National Republican Senatorial Committee said it had $18.6 million in the bank as of the end of August, compared to $29.8 million for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee.

With Giuliani, G.O.P. Focuses On 9/11 Role (NYT)

By Richard Pérez-peña

The New York Times, October 9, 2006

At the Detroit Tigers' stadium last week, a visiting troop of children — many wearing Tiger orange and full of the fevered air of the playoffs — met Rudolph W. Giuliani, who declared his lifelong allegiance to their enemy of the moment, the Yankees.

DOJ_NMG_0077136

But when the fourth and fifth graders had a chance to put questions to Mr. Giuliani, the first one had nothing to do with the Tigers-Yankees series. Instead, Cristina Sauceda asked, "How did you feel when they destroyed the towers, and what did you do to make people feel better?"

Wherever he goes these days, Mr. Giuliani can count on fielding essentially the same question, one based on an image stamped so deeply into the national psyche that even a 10-year-old sees it.

Nearly as often, people ask its corollary: Will he run for president?

Mr. Giuliani has little to say about 2008, and a great deal to say about Sept. 11, 2001. He rarely brings up the World Trade Center attack directly; he does not have to. No matter where he goes — South Carolina, Florida, Michigan and Illinois, just in the past several weeks — other people do it for him. That will surely be the case on Thursday, when he makes his much-anticipated first public appearance in two years in New Hampshire, which holds the first presidential primary in the nation, where he will speak at a fund-raiser for Republican state legislative candidates.

He says he does not yet know if he will be a presidential candidate. He has no campaign apparatus and his positions on divisive social issues — from abortion to gay rights to gun control — put him at odds with most in his party.

Yet as Mr. Giuliani traverses the country, raising money for Republican candidates and building alliances that could serve him in a national campaign, polls show he has emerged as a leading candidate for the Republican presidential primaries — largely because of how he guided a wounded city in the weeks after the trade center attack.

And Mr. Giuliani has embraced that role as 9/11 hero and national security authority. At stop after stop, he delivers the same message: that the nation is still in grave danger, that the war in Iraq must be won, that measures like the Patriot Act and electronic eavesdropping are essential to defeating terrorists.

Never mind that Mr. Giuliani has come in for some sharp criticism back in New York — about workers sickened by toxic dust at ground zero, about his disgraced former police commissioner, Bernard B. Kerik, and even about his handling of the trade center attack.

There is little indication that his noble image from 9/11 has been tarnished in the heartland.

For many loyal Republicans — and more than a few independents and Democrats — his national security message seems to work, blotting out the central question facing his candidacy: whether a supporter of legal abortion, gay civil unions, immigrants' rights and gun control; a thrice-married, Catholic New Yorker whose split with his second wife took place publicly and none too neatly, can win Republican presidential primaries and caucuses.

"I'm well to the right of Rudy on social issues," said Sid Dinerstein, chairman of the Republican Party in Palm Beach County, Fla., after an appearance there by Mr. Giuliani two weeks ago. "But this is a man who, when it comes to dealing with bad guys, has infinite courage."

In August, at a fund-raising dinner in Charleston for South Carolina's very conservative Republican Party, Mr. Giuliani spoke about port security. When the party faithful had a chance to pose questions, they did not ask him about abortion or gays — only reporters did that.

Mr. Giuliani is never asked about recent charges that he, among others, did not do enough to protect rescue workers at the trade center site from inhaling toxic dust.

Nor is he asked about his friend, former police commissioner and former business partner, Mr. Kerik, whom President Bush nominated to be homeland security secretary in December 2004, with Mr. Giuliani's support.

Mr. Kerik withdrew his nomination as questions were raised about unpaid taxes involving his nanny, ties to people accused of involvement in organized crime, an illegal gift and an unreported loan. Just 19 months after his cabinet nomination, he pleaded guilty to two misdemeanors.

Federal investigators are now looking into whether Mr. Kerik illegally taped the husband of Jeanine F. Pirro, the Republican candidate for attorney general, at Ms. Pirro's behest.

Asked whether he knew anything about Mr. Kerik and the heartache he may have caused Mr. Giuliani in New York, Chris Rants, the Republican speaker of the Iowa State House of Representatives, who has avidly been courted by presidential candidates, said, "I don't have any idea what you're talking about."

What about ground zero air quality? "I still don't know what you're talking about," he said.

But the doubts persist, including those about Mr. Giuliani's stand on social issues. Many Republicans and political analysts say the most pertinent question about Mr. Giuliani is whether polls showing him at or near the top of the presidential primary field reflect support that is broad but thin.

"My opinion of the mayor is completely centered around 9/11," Mr. Rants said. "That's how everybody has their impression, and it's a good impression.

"But to be honest," he added, "I don't have a clue what he thinks about India or China, or education, or immigration reform, or Social Security. I don't even know what he thinks about ethanol and renewable fuels."

DOJ_NMG_0077137

Mr. Giuliani himself declines to answer questions about his political future, including handicapping how he might fare in Republican primaries, and instead offers praise for the other contenders and for this year's candidates for lesser offices.

"I don't want to get in the way of 2006," he said recently. "These are important elections that are coming up."

But when he is asked about 9/11, he talks effusively. Regarding Cristina Sauceda's question, Mr. Giuliani gave an answer that, even for an adult audience, would have been extremely long (10 minutes), grim ("We had to figure out how many body bags to order"), and emotionally wrenching ("Every time I was told" that someone he knew had been killed, "my heart would take a beat, and I would say to myself, 'I can't think about that right now' ").

He is often greeted like a star. But when the people who cheer Mr. Giuliani at rallies are asked what they know about him, some say he cleaned up a crime-ridden city, all of them talk about Sept. 11, and many concede that they can go no further.

"I can't forget the display of leadership and courage and compassion that day," said Mike Medina, a Miami-Dade County corrections officer who attended a rally on Sept. 27 for Republican candidates in nearby Dania Beach where Mr. Giuliani spoke. "That goes a long way."

Not far enough, according to Larry J. Sabato, director of the Center for Politics at the University of Virginia. He said that if Mr. Giuliani runs, his views on social issues, and his more recent travails, will find their way into attack ads, and the conventional wisdom will prevail.

"Pro-choice is the heart of his problem with Republicans, just as it always was, and it cannot be overcome," Mr. Sabato said. Mr. Giuliani does well in polls "because the activists have no clue so far," he said. "If they've heard this stuff, they've forgotten it."

Mr. Sabato and other political analysts said that even if other contenders shied away from attacking Mr. Giuliani on abortion or gay rights, independent groups supporting those candidates would not. They might even try to undermine his security credentials, and cite the former mayor's decision to put the city's emergency operations center in the trade center.

But Frank Luntz, a Republican pollster, said the poll results are no illusion, and that no one should rule out Mr. Giuliani.

"The abortion issue will hurt him in Iowa, the gun control position will hurt him in New Hampshire, but both are less important than the character and the attributes of the man," said Mr. Luntz, who did some work for Mr. Giuliani in the 1990's but no longer works for campaigns. "In a senate race, they want to know where you stand on issues. In a presidential campaign, they want to know who you are."

In The Race For Governor Of Michigan, The Struggling Economy Is Topic A (NYT)

By Monica Davey

The New York Times, October 9, 2006

THREE RIVERS, Mich., Oct. 4 — If for much of the country the economic signs seem relatively healthy, they do not in places like this town. A plastics plant nearby closed days before Christmas, a company that makes mirror parts for cars has shrunk and the mayor says he heard talk, just this month, of possible cuts at a factory that makes drive shafts.

And so, while elections in other regions have turned to matters like national security, the war in Iraq and Congressional scandal, Michigan's races for governor and, to a lesser degree, the United States Senate are hinging this year almost entirely on the struggling economy and the question of who is to blame for it.

In the state's cloud of sinking numbers, Republicans hope for an opportunity to pick up two positions. In other states with once-robust industrial bases, including Ohio, Indiana and Pennsylvania, economic worries are playing a similar, if far more subtle and layered, role this fall.

"We've thought about moving south," said Deb Hallock, 44, who said she had lived in Three Rivers for 20 years but lost her home about a year ago when she and her husband could no longer pay the mortgage. Ms. Hallock makes pizzas at a fast-food restaurant; her husband makes cargo trailers at a factory but had no job when they were evicted. "I don't really know what a governor can do to stop all of what's happening here, but I wish someone would do something."

Gov. Jennifer M. Granholm, an enormously popular Democrat when she took office four years ago, now faces a serious challenge from Dick DeVos, the former president of the Amway Corporation and the son of a co-founder.

While campaigning, Mr. DeVos regularly ticks off dire statistics: with major cuts at the Detroit-area automobile companies, Michigan's unemployment rate of 7.1 percent is one of the worst in the nation; the state has lost 85,000 jobs in the last four years; and it has ranked second in the number of young people moving elsewhere.

In a testy first debate between the candidates in early October, the answers to questions on almost every topic seemed to circle back to this single issue. Mr. DeVos, who says his own business acumen is just the medicine Michigan needs, said Ms. Granholm was responsible for failing to create "the atmosphere" for job creation in Michigan despite the economic recovery plan she talked about at nearly every campaign stop.

DOJ_NMG_0077138

"I find it amazing," Mr. DeVos said in the debate, "to hear the governor say the plan is working when the people of Michigan aren't."

Ms. Granholm, who said hers was the most aggressive economic recovery plan in the nation, seemed to sidestep responsibility for what has happened here, saying she had "stepped into this current" in a state that had long depended on cars for its livelihood.

"The question is, Why did we get here, and how are we going to get out?" Ms. Granholm said.

Elsewhere, the economic questions are less extreme, less consuming and, in some cases, far more ambiguous. For the most part, challengers in nearby states have bemoaned economic failures, while incumbents have pointed to opposing, upbeat economic signs or stayed mainly silent on the matter.

In Ohio, the loss of manufacturing work, along with political corruption and scandal, has contributed to "a generally sour atmosphere" among voters, said Herbert Asher, a political science professor emeritus at Ohio State University.

Sherrod Brown, the Democratic challenger to Senator Mike DeWine, has worked to remind voters of their economic portrait, "a thriving manufacturing base dismantled piece by piece," in the words of Mr. Brown's spokeswoman, Joanna Kuebler.

Indiana's economy has improved. But Russell L. Hanson, a political scientist at Indiana University, said the recovery had been slow and spotty in parts of the state, especially where the auto industry's troubles had affected Indiana's component suppliers — something the challengers in several competitive House races have made an issue.

A complicated picture has also emerged in Pennsylvania, with candidates, even those from the same political party, pointing to opposing signs as evidence of the relative healthiness, or the horror, of the state's economy. Gov. Edward G. Rendell, a Democrat, has boasted of new job creation. But Bob Casey, another Democrat and an ally of Mr. Rendell, who is running against Senator Rick Santorum, a Republican, has complained of an environment in which tuition and health care costs are rising while incomes cannot keep up.

In Michigan, meanwhile, no candidate is boasting.

Mr. DeVos and Ms. Granholm pepper their speeches, commercials and Web sites with proposals for reversing the economic tide. Mr. DeVos has pressed for change, proposing that the state speed the granting of permits for businesses and that the tax on businesses known as the Single Business Tax be ended.

His campaign has scoffed at Ms. Granholm's efforts, like a Cool Cities program to give grants to cities for economic development, as too paltry. He has also suggested she did not try hard enough to persuade the Japanese to open a Honda factory in Michigan.

"A cool city is one where you get a job," said John Truscott, Mr. DeVos's director of communications. "We never thought we would surpass Mississippi in a race for the bottom, but we're there."

Mr. DeVos, a relative political newcomer from Ada who aides say has poured about $17 million of his own money into the race, began advertising in February, which helps explain how every voter interviewed in towns in the Kalamazoo area, like Three Rivers, and near Lansing said they knew his name.

For a time, polls showed Mr. DeVos even or slightly ahead of Ms. Granholm, but more recent surveys suggest she has pulled ahead slightly. In a survey of 600 likely voters taken this month for The Detroit News and several television stations, Ms. Granholm was leading, with 46 percent saying they would vote for her, compared with 40 percent for Mr. DeVos; the margin of error was four percentage points. But of those polled, 12 percent said they were undecided.

Ms. Granholm, a former federal prosecutor and a former state attorney general, said she was pressing to diversify the state's economy into fields like alternative energy, life sciences and domestic security; wanted to double the number of college graduates in Michigan within a decade; and hoped to change the way the state handles work force training for those without jobs.

And while Mr. DeVos has tried to blame Ms. Granholm for the state's struggles, in an interview, she directed the blame elsewhere: to circumstances beyond her control ("No other state is the automotive capital of the world"); to the Bush administration ("He has sat idly by while the industry reels"); and even to Mr. DeVos, who supported the trade agreements, Nafta and Cafta, that she said had helped leave the Michigan economy in a wreck.

"If we had diversified our state 10 years ago, we wouldn't be here," Ms. Granholm said. "I'm going to go anywhere and do anything to change the economy of Michigan."

Similarly, in the Senate race here, Debbie Stabenow, the Democratic incumbent, and Mike Bouchard, a sheriff and her Republican challenger, have each touted economic recovery plans: "Jobs Agenda" for her and "Renewing Michigan's Economy" for him.

But at a Laundromat in Three Rivers, all the plans in the world could not convince Steve Brunn that Michigan could be turned around. Like others here, Mr. Brunn, 54, said he was doubtful that any campaign promise would add up to jobs after all the commercials were over and the votes were in.

"We're being batted back and forth between the Republicans and Democrats," he said. "DeVos is talking like everybody else — he wants to make change — but what is he really going to do to change this? We're competing with these other countries, and there are no answers."

Thomas Lowry, who for 11 years has been mayor of Three Rivers, said this town of 7,400 still had its share of manufacturing companies, though the numbers, he said, seemed to shrink little by little each year. The echoes reach far beyond the factories, Mr. Lowry said. The diner downtown loses business. More and more "for sale" signs fill front yards along quiet streets.

Even his own business, a bookstore in the center of downtown, has seen the sale of magazines, a minor luxury item for many, fall off. "It ripples everywhere," he said.

Mr. Lowry, who said he expected to vote for Ms. Granholm, said he was not sure to what extent the voters would hold their political leaders responsible for all that had happened — and all that had not. "There's something about our species, though, that wants a scapegoat," he said.

Firings Of State Workers Found To Violate Law (BSUN)

By Jennifer Skalka

The Baltimore Sun, October 10, 2006

ANNAPOLIS -- A legislative committee investigating the Ehrlich administration's personnel practices has concluded that workers were fired "based on political considerations in violation of constitutional rights and state law," and is recommending stronger protections for state employees, according to a draft report provided Monday to reporters.

"Some administration officials admitted, reluctantly, that political affiliation was a consideration in the decision-making process," says the 135-page report, the work of the bipartisan State Employee Rights and Protections Committee, which has been investigating Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr.'s staff since August 2005.

The legislative committee, whose work Republicans say is an election-year smear, does not recommend legal action in response to the firings. But committee lawyers determined that, unlike in past administrations, Ehrlich used the state appointments office -- which traditionally makes political recommendations for membership to boards and commissions -- as a clearinghouse for hiring and firing, and that party affiliation was a likely factor.

The governor said Monday that the committee's work over the past year is evidence of the Democratic-led General Assembly's misplaced priorities.

"They held more hearings on this particular issue than pedophiles, sex offenders and BGE combined ... all to conclude that our administration brought in people dedicated to carrying out the goals of this administration," Ehrlich said.

Taking office in January 2003 as Maryland first GOP governor in more than three decades, Ehrlich promised to shake up agencies accustomed to Democratic administrations.

"We must overturn the status quo in state government and whenever possible bring in fresh blood, with new ideas," the governor wrote to a state agency head in a confidential memorandum reviewed by the commission.

Leading Democrats soon heard complaints of indiscriminate firings and the targeting of low-level employees, and they began the inquiry after revelations arose about the activities of a longtime aide to the governor, Joseph F. Steffen Jr.

The committee's four Republicans issued a separate 40-page rebuttal Monday, criticizing Democrats for spending more than $1 million in taxpayer money on the investigation and accusing them of timing the report's release to potentially affect next month's gubernatorial election. Democrats dispute the cost estimate.

The minority report says that former workers who testified under oath "repeatedly misstated facts and failed to corroborate many aspects of their wrongful testimony with documents." It concludes that the committee did not find proof of "illegal personnel actions" by the Ehrlich administration.

Sen. J. Lowell Stoltzfus, the minority leader from the Eastern Shore and a committee member, acknowledged "stupid behavior" by some state workers who conducted firings. But he called the panel's work "a very expensive partisan joke."

"You can't legislate against crassness; you just can't do that," Stoltzfus said. "For the most part, this administration has bent over backward to incorporate the Democrats."

The report of the committee, which will meet Thursday in Annapolis to consider revisions, reserved particularly pointed language for Steffen, who left the administration in February 2005. Nicknamed "Prince of Darkness" by the governor, Steffen kept a grim reaper figurine on his desk. He told the committee that employee lists he was given included party affiliation.

"Mr. Steffen was placed on the executive floors at [the Department of Human Resources] and the [Department of Juvenile Services], on the payroll of the Governor's Office and coordinated with the Appointments Office to identify candidates for termination," the report says.

"Placing a qualified consultant in the agencies to perform such a function would have been reasonable. ... Placing Mr. Steffen in such a role was not and the purpose was most likely to identify candidates for termination for political reasons."

The committee sought to determine whether state workers in an employment category called "at will" were terminated because they were Democrats or to make room for Ehrlich loyal ists. About 7,000 state workers are at-will, according to the report, and can legally be fired without cause, though not for political beliefs.

Sixty people contacted the committee to share their stories, the report said. Not all testified, however. Some of those who appeared before the panel did so voluntarily. Others, including Steffen, were subpoenaed.

The committee also heard from Ehrlich administration officials, including three -- Steffen, Gregory J. Maddalone and Craig B. Chesek -- who declined under oath to answer many questions about their roles in firing state workers or instructions they were given by the state appointments office. The committee has since filed lawsuits compelling them to testify.

The report indicated that Maddalone and Chesek -- who were dispatched to state departments, much like Steffen, to target workers for firing -- are due in court Oct. 26. Steffen is scheduled to appear Oct. 25.

Sen. Thomas M. Middleton, a Southern Maryland Democrat who co-chaired the committee, said their testimony is crucial in shaping the committee's final recommendations.

"The main players, it just seemed like they had extreme memory loss," Middleton said. "We haven't found anything that is illegal, but we found stories that were conflicting so that alone causes extreme suspicion."

The report noted that under Ehrlich, the methods used in firing workers were inconsistent across departments and perhaps most "dramatic" at the Public Service Commission, where several employees were escorted from the building by security guards and their photographs were posted in the lobby.

"There was substantial evidence that most of the terminated employees who testified were doing a good job, and there was no evidence that any of them posed any security risk," the report says.

Middleton said he expects the committee to offer legislation during the General Assembly session that begins in January.

The report recommended 10 changes, including that the law should make clear that state workers cannot be fired to make room for someone else based on the new employee's "political affiliation, belief or opinion."

State law must also be changed, the report says, to clarify that only people in the employing agency, not the appointments office, can fire a state worker.

The report also suggests that state employees should be notified in writing of their rights when hired and that the state should study the need for the at-will designation.

Sen. Brian E. Frosh, a Montgomery County Democrat who sits on the committee, said state workers, especially those who have served with distinction for many years, deserve better from their employer than they have received from Ehrlich.

Investigation Faults Ehrlich In Firing Of State Workers (WP)

By Matthew Mosk

The Washington Post, October 10, 2006

The firings of dozens of mid-level state workers early in the tenure of Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. may, in some instances, have violated those employees' constitutional rights and run afoul of state law, a 14-month investigation has concluded.

An attorney hired by leaders of the majority-Democratic legislature to oversee an investigation of the Republican governor's personnel practices wrote a 130-page draft report and shared his findings yesterday with lawmakers.

Among them:

· The governor dispatched loyalists into state agencies to identify people to fire.

· Several employees were fired for no reason other than their political views.

· Officials in the Ehrlich administration were evasive or not credible in defending their personnel decisions while testifying before the legislature's Special Committee on State Employee Rights and Protections.

"The sudden and random terminations exacted a considerable human toll," committee counsel Ward B. Coe III wrote in his draft.

Ehrlich described the document as "farcical" and mocked the legislative committee, which consists of eight Democrats and four Republicans, for spending as much time as it did to produce it. "I think the people of Maryland need to hear what they paid over a million dollars for," Ehrlich said.

Republicans on the committee issued a "minority report," which determined that the investigation had been partisan and consumed money and time that could have been devoted to more pressing concerns.

"There's nothing substantive there," said Senate Minority Leader J. Lowell Stoltzfus (Somerset). "There is no definite finding. There was nothing proven that demonstrated that the law was broken."

Under Maryland law, "at will" employees -- about 6,000 of the 50,000 state workers -- may be hired and fired by the governor without explanation. With rare exception, though, the law requires that personnel decisions be made "without regard to the employee's political affiliation, belief, or opinion."

Coe's report, which will be released formally this week, marks the conclusion of a saga that began in early 2005, when Ehrlich fired a longtime political operative for boasting about a whisper campaign against the governor's chief political rival, Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley (D).

During the first two years of Ehrlich's tenure, that operative, Joseph Steffen, worked in three state agencies, fostering a reputation as a hatchet man by placing a figurine of the Grim Reaper on his desk and telling co-workers he had a "death list" of people who were marked for dismissal. He signed e-mails "POD," which stood for his nickname: "Prince of Darkness."

Firings followed. Ehrlich's top aides put the count last year at 284. Ehrlich's predecessor, Parris N. Glendening (D), fired 65 workers during the first three years of his administration.

Ehrlich administration officials have said the turnover was a natural byproduct of the 2002 election, which put a Republican in the governor's office for the first time in a generation.

No one was singled out for partisan views, Ehrlich officials said.

But some changes were made to help Ehrlich move the state in a new direction. "The governor has said he wants people on the same page," his communications director, Paul E. Schurick, said in a June 2005 interview.

The turnover concerned Democrats in the legislature. And the investigation that followed has validated those concerns, said Sen. Brian E. Frosh (D-Montgomery), who was one of the first to urge a review.

Coe, as committee counsel, interviewed more than 60 current and former state employees, taking sworn testimony from more than 20.

"It's not pretty for the Ehrlich administration," Frosh said yesterday. "It makes clear that many of the firings were illegal, and many more were inappropriate."

Coe's report makes its most direct case when addressing the termination of Vincent Gardina, a Democrat on the Baltimore County Council who was hired as a project manager at the Maryland Environmental Service.

Ehrlich aides learned that Gardina was on the payroll eight months after Ehrlich took office, the report says. Soon after, the report says, a deputy in the governor's appointments office called Gardina's boss and told him that "Gardina 'needs to go' because he is 'too political.' "

An e-mail exchange followed and ended with an e-mail from the governor's deputy, dated Sept. 9, 2003, saying: "you can let Vince Gardina go. We have signed off on this end." Gardina was dismissed by a letter dated Sept. 16, the report says. It concludes that "there is substantial evidence that the termination of Vincent Gardina was based on his political activities in violation of [state law] and his constitutional rights."

Other findings in the report focus on the dismissals' effects on the functioning of state government. In a number of instances, the report highlights dismissals of workers who had outstanding performance reviews.

At the state's Public Service Commission, which regulates utilities, five workers were dismissed on one day. The chairman, an Ehrlich appointee, defended those moves, but the review found his explanation wanting.

"It is difficult to reconcile the Chairman's view that he was improving the Commission when he failed to consult with other commissioners regarding the terminations, failed to review personnel files and failed to consult with the supervisors of two of the employees who were terminated," the report says.

Stoltzfus said yesterday that although Coe was hired with support from both parties -- and had conducted a well-received review of the state's savings and loan crisis 20 years ago -- the lawyer was "snookered" this time by Democrats.

The investigation, based mostly on the testimony of disgruntled former state workers, was generated by Steffen's ill-advised boastings and the actions of a few other misguided aides, Stoltzfus said. "I saw some crass behavior by certain people who first came in to work for the governor," he said. "It was a new regime. They behaved in a way they shouldn't have. But you can't legislate for crass behavior."

Del. Luiz R.S. Simmons (Montgomery), a Democrat on the committee, said he agrees that the investigation did not uncover "a reign of terror." But there were "serious abuses," he said.

"Unfortunately, the Republicans decided at the outset that they did not want to be bothered with the facts," Simmons said. "They do not understand . . . it was wrong to dismiss these people."

Coe's report found two major flaws with the Ehrlich administration's handling of personnel matters. The firings "were not reasonably calculated to improve the performance of State government," the report says, and the firings demoralized the state workforce veterans.

"Employees who were the primary providers for their families were suddenly without jobs through no fault of their own," Coe wrote.

Out Of The Oval Office But Still In The Loop (WP)

SECOND ACTS

Presidential Lives and Legacies After the White House

By Mark K. Updegrove

Lyons Press, 321 pp., $24.95

Franklin Pierce may have been a rather forgettable president, but the remainder of his life proved even more unsatisfying. "After the White House," he lamented, "what is there to do but drink?"

More and more, lately, as it turns out. In the modern era, there are books to write and corporate boards to serve on and the mashed potato circuit to travel. There are funds to raise, charities to aid, libraries to build and globes to trot. There's good to be done. And there's money to be made.

The end of a presidency no longer means the end of influence, as Mark K. Updegrove documents in a lively and highly readable review of the post-Oval Office years of the United States' last nine former chief executives. "Second Acts: Presidential Lives and Legacies After the White House" traces a fascinating evolution from Harry S. Truman's impoverished political exile in Missouri to Bill Clinton's profitable, peripatetic shadow presidency in New York.

The White House afterlife holds "more promise and potential than ever before," Updegrove argues. Former presidents "now often have their own agendas and aggressively pursue them independent of those in power," and, "With the advent of globalization in a world dominated by the U.S., the opportunity for formers to make their marks has increased significantly."

What to do with our former commanders in chief has often vexed a country that does not believe in permanent power. Until George Washington retired to Mount Vernon after two terms as president, the world had few examples of rulers voluntarily surrendering their thrones, but it has become a hallmark of American democracy.

A number of former presidents continued to play a role long before globalization, of course. John Quincy Adams served 18 years in the House of Representatives after his single term in the White House, arguably accomplishing more as an outspoken abolitionist. Andrew Johnson was appointed to the Senate after his broken presidency, though he died just months later. William Howard Taft realized his life's ambition by serving as chief justice of the United States following his reelection defeat.

A few others tried to return to the office they left. Ulysses S. Grant maneuvered for the Republican nomination in 1880, only to be denied. Theodore Roosevelt, angered by his successor, Taft, bolted from the Republicans and ran as the Bull Moose candidate in 1912, only to hand the election to Democrat Woodrow Wilson. Just one former president managed a comeback, Grover Cleveland, who lost reelection in 1888 but won a second term four years later.

With the 22nd Amendment to the Constitution, that route is no longer available to two-term presidents such as Clinton and George W. Bush. Yet with actuarial tables being what they are, formers are emerging from office with more years of vigorous life still ahead of them. Each of them in his own way wrestles with how to remain relevant without crossing lines of propriety that only he sets.

Writing books has become de rigueur. Truman left office with only a $1,300 annual pension from his military service, since in those days former presidents had no retirement, much less the office allotments and Secret Service protection they get now. So he wrote a two-part autobiography for $600,000, though he estimated that after taxes and expenses he netted only $37,000. By the time Clinton wrote his memoirs -- one book that was so endless the publisher split it in two for the paperback version -- an ex-president could take in a reported $12 million.

Richard M. Nixon and Jimmy Carter both became prolific writers, churning out books that went beyond their personal stories in an effort to shape politics and policies -- and reinvent their legacies. Gerald R. Ford became the first to join corporate boards, a move that was seen as unseemly by some of his predecessors but has become more common. Ronald Reagan further broke barriers by accepting $2 million for appearances in Japan.

George H.W. Bush and Clinton both have second acts of another sort -- the first saw his son elected president while the second may yet see his wife win the job. But Updegrove also recounts the unusual friendship that seems to have developed between the 41st and 42nd presidents as they travel the world to help victims of the Asian tsunami and Hurricane Katrina.

Updegrove, a former publisher of Newsweek and executive at Time magazine who now works at Yahoo Inc., casts no judgment on any former president's choice and doesn't endorse any particular model. He seems to go along with the conventional wisdom that Carter's Nobel Prize-winning humanitarian efforts at home and abroad have made him the best former president, although he acknowledges that Carter's successors have all been irritated at one time or another with what they saw as grandstanding freelance diplomacy.

DOJ_NMG_0077143

For the book, Updegrove had interviews with Ford, Carter and Bush, among others, but they don't seem to add all that much new. Many of the stories will feel familiar to Washington readers who follow the presidency closely. But they do peel back the curtain a bit on the lives of our former leaders in an entertaining and illuminating way.

And one Washington reader who may want to pick up "Second Acts" is the current occupant of the White House, who has just 27 months to go before he leaves office at age 62 and has to decide what to do with the rest of his life.

Baker is a White House correspondent for The Washington Post and author of "The Breach: Inside the Impeachment and Trial of William Jefferson Clinton."

Different Bridges (WT)

By Claude R. Marx

The Washington Times, October 10, 2006

Former Sen. John Danforth is in many ways a political dinosaur. That is unfortunate because the world would be a better place if people like him were not nearly extinct.

Mr. Danforth, who served three terms as a Republican senator from Missouri before retiring in 1995, is a moderate conservative with strong religious beliefs who does not think compromise is a four-letter word. He longs for the days when those on both sides of the political aisle took a more centrist approach to problem solving and had greater respect for their adversaries.

He discusses his views, including a plea for the Republican Party to become less beholden to the demands of Christian conservatives, in his engaging memoir/political tract, "Faith and Politics: How the 'Moral Values' Debate Divides America and How to Move Forward Together."

Mr. Danforth, an ordained Episcopal minister, does not equate centrism with political mushiness or an abandonment of core beliefs. Rather, he sees it as a way to create a fairer and more just world by including and respecting a variety of worldviews.

He contends that the best leaders are those without an inflated view of their own importance or the certitude that their views are the only right ones.

"[I]f we are less confident about our capacity to know and implement God's will, and if our faith brings modesty about ourselves and our politics, our effectiveness is more likely. I believe that such modesty is, or at least should be, Christianity's gift to American politics," he writes.

He cites the Republican Party's efforts to overturn court decisions allowing relatives to unplug the feeding tube of Terri Schiavo as evidence of an unhealthy mingling of religion and politics that betrays the party's true conservative heritage.

"It was a threat to some of our most heartfelt values. It was Big Brotherism in the extreme, an exercise of the raw and awesome power of the federal government,' he writes.

To avoid repeats of that approach, he calls for religious people in politics to practice a "ministry of reconciliation." This would, he maintains, focus on increasing reasoned dialogue aimed at finding common ground on, among other things, applying religious values to politics. He is careful to note, however, that there is a difference between allowing religious beliefs to form one's worldview and trying to write those ideas into public policy.

Mr. Danforth's goals are well intentioned and achievable on a limited basis, but current political dynamics probably preclude long-term change in the direction he seeks.

For starters, those at the ideological extremes have an easier time boiling down their views into a sound bite, an all-too-frequent means of political discourse. Besides, the certitude with which those on the far left and far right express their views has a certain appeal for those who like their solutions in neatly wrapped packages. The adage that the "squeaky wheel gets the grease' is an apt description of the current state of affairs, where noise and dogmatism often win out over reasoned discourse.

President Bush once famously said that "I don't do nuance," and that is a worldview shared by liberals and conservatives alike. The Danforth approach requires a great deal of nuance and splitting the difference.

Though current polls indicate that the public is displeased with both parties, that does not generally translate into electing more centrists who share Mr. Danforth's commitment to bridging the ideological divide.

Mr. Danforth's views on moral and social issues are neither strictly conservative nor liberal. He opposes abortion and gay marriage but is against a constitutional amendment banning the latter practice. At the same time, he favors expanding stem-cell research and opposes both the death penalty and mandatory school prayer.

Those positions make him hard to pigeonhole — not necessarily a bad thing — but also make him someone who is not completely comfortable in either political camp.

That is a good perspective from which to try to find a fresh approach to solving the nation's problems. Mr. Danforth does an admirable job of that in "Faith and Politics."

Read Spitzer's Lips (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 10, 2006

No one is giving Republican John Faso much chance to beat Eliot Spitzer in their race to be the next New York Governor. But the Republican's campaign has already done a public service in prompting the Democratic attorney general to make a no-new-taxes pledge.

Mr. Faso, a former leader of Republicans in the state assembly, is campaigning for a significant supply-side tax cut for the state that is one of the two or three most heavily taxed in the U.S. Mr. Spitzer won't go that far, but during his debate recently with Mr. Faso he pledged, "There will be no tax increase in a Spitzer administration."

Plenty of politicians have made the same pledge to win elections, only to renege later. They include former Virginia Governor and possible Democratic Presidential candidate Mark Warner, current New Jersey Governor Jon Corzine and, most famously, George Herbert Walker Bush.

It's nonetheless significant that Mr. Spitzer is sounding a more moderate economic bent now that he may soon be responsible for the Empire State's economy as Governor. It's easy to play the scourge of business as AG when a Republican is in the state house. But as Governor, he will inherit the same miserable regulatory and tax climate that has made upstate New York a dead zone for new business and so difficult for young people to stay in the state.

Here's a prediction: If Mr. Spitzer does win next month, he'll also soon be calling for reform of Sarbanes-Oxley because it's driving capital out of New York City.

They Debate, We Nap (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, October 10, 2006

You didn't miss much by not tuning into Saturday night's gubernatorial debate. And that's by design.

DEBATE? WHAT DEBATE? The Dodgers were playing, for Pete's sake (granted, not very well). Plus, it was a Saturday night, when hardly anyone watches TV anyway. Who would schedule a debate for a time when nobody would watch, unless they didn't want you to see it?

Exactly. No one wanted you to see the debate between Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger and challenger Phil Angelides, except for maybe Angelides. It was a ho-hum affair in the midst of a ho-hum campaign for an office that is monumentally important but for which relatively few people will vote. For Schwarzenegger, it came down to "Angelides likes taxes." For Angelides, it was "Schwarzenegger likes Bush." And that was pretty much it.

Political debates have long been more about theater than substance, and they are a notoriously poor opportunity for viewers to bone up on the issues or delve deeply into policy. They are stage-managed affairs, full of well-rehearsed quips and zingers that the candidates try to make seem spontaneous. No one is ever swayed by a policy point uttered in a debate, although experts talk endlessly afterward about whether a candidate's performance might have impressed some mythical typical voter watching intently from the sofa.

But until now, debates at least held some practical and ritual significance. They were a way of separating the political nerds, who had been paying close attention anyway, from the vast majority of voters, who zero in on the campaign only when necessary. The subtext of debate night has typically been: For those of you who haven't paid attention until now, election season has begun and it's time for you to learn who the candidates are. So here they are. Here's how they look and act. Check them out and see if any of them strike you as leaders.

Recently, though, political debates have aimed for a lower profile. Campaign managers and political consultants like working with a relatively small and predictable population of voters. Through focus groups, demographic studies and voting statistics, the professionals know how these voters act and what to do to get their support. The last thing campaign honchos need is a huge and unmanageable TV audience hanging on every word and thinking that maybe they, too, just might go to the polls on election day. So we get a lackluster debate like Saturday's, scheduled for the smallest possible exposure, in which the unspoken message from the political establishment is "Just stay home."

The worst part of it is that the political professionals know how to dumb down the elections and keep us at home, and they know how to make that work for their candidates. Too bad it doesn't work so well for the rest of us.

The Cost Of An 'Adequate' Education (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0077145

By Eric A. Hanushek

The Wall Street Journal, October 9, 2006

The nation is watching to see what happens with New York City school finance. After a dozen years in the courts, the case of Campaign for Fiscal Equity (CFE) v. New York is now back at the Court of Appeals for a final judgment about the added appropriations that the legislature must send to the city. This judgment is, however, unlikely to be the final statement. If the legislature must come up with an incredible sum of money close to the more than $5 billion currently on the table, it may well balk, precipitating a true constitutional crisis.

New York's school-finance case may be the most visible in the nation, but it is certainly not unique. Almost half of the states today have an "adequacy" case in their courts. Only five states have never faced a school-finance case during the past three decades. New York, however, is on center stage this week. Because of the size of the judgment, the New York decision could send shock waves through state legislatures across the country.

Earlier this year New York's intermediate court called for an added appropriation of $4.7 to $5.6 billion per year to go to New York City schools. The state, with Attorney General Eliot Spitzer helming the defense, appealed this decision. Final oral arguments will be given tomorrow, marking at least a culmination in the legal battle, though likely not the last word in the fight.

New Yorkers tend to view this case with righteous indignation: The legislature simply failed to provide the city schools with adequate resources. After all, they argue, the trial court, after listening to seven months of testimony, found this to be a clear violation of the state constitution and slapped a precise dollar value on what it saw to be the magnitude of that violation.

Unfortunately, in determining the cost of an "adequate" education, the court relied heavily on the questionable analysis of consultants hired by the plaintiffs. Their analysis, labeled a "professional judgment model," was advertised as a scientific determination of the amount of spending necessary to secure an "adequate" education for every New York City student. Yet, this analysis violates virtually every principle of science and, as a result, has produced a politically saleable but scientifically unsupportable answer to the problem.

The consultants' approach was to hire a series of New York school personnel to describe what a school that could meet the state's learning standards would look like. These school people were told explicitly to pay no attention to where the money might come from. They should just dream. The fact that they did their dreaming after the court had declared New York's funding formula to be unconstitutional gave an implicit legitimacy to any flights of fancy they might have. In addition, any recommendations they made would likely have a direct impact on their own schools, creating an inherent conflict of interest.

The consultants took the wish lists of these different panels and calculated what the various elements would cost. Perhaps worried that the school personnel did not dream big enough, the consultants did the cost calculations in a way designed to obtain the maximum spending needed. Any thoughtful trade-offs or proposals for different ways to achieve the state's student learning goals were eliminated by the consultants.

As one might expect, the final wish list came with a truly large dollar value attached to it. Spending an additional $5.6 billion on city schools amounts to an increase of $1,000 per year in the average tax bill of every household in New York state. This figure would require a 25% increase in tax rates if funded with the state income tax. Of course, the $1,000 per household figure is clearly an underestimate. It would be difficult to give the city alone such a big funding boost without Buffalo, Rochester, Syracuse and Yonkers lining up to demand their "adequate" share.

One would be hard pressed to overestimate the potential danger posed by these costing-out studies. Consultants are active in virtually every one of the adequacy cases in the nation. Even though they use a variety of methods to affix the dollar value of an adequate education, each clearly represents nothing more than junk science. Many courts are duped by the studies, perhaps not surprisingly given the politics of the cases. But the reality remains: Setting appropriate education funding amounts for New York, or any other state, is beyond the authority of science.

The New York Constitution, like those for the U.S. and for other states, vests the appropriations and spending functions in the political branches of government, not in the courts. Therefore, the New York legislature -- regardless of the exact appropriations set by the courts -- may choose to view any court judgment on appropriations as not binding. If this argument were to prevail, it would precipitate a clear constitutional crisis. If this were the case, however, New York's legislature would likely not seek any direct confrontation, but would instead drag out deliberations for as long as possible.

The parties may reach some sort of compromise. Certainly Eliot Spitzer, now New York's leading gubernatorial candidate, has hinted at bringing about a resolution if he assumes office.

Nonetheless, it will be a hollow victory. Extensive experience and scientific study shows that simply providing more money to schools is not likely to be a very effective policy. There is no reason to expect student achievement in New York City to improve if such a spending policy were enacted. Indeed, the consultants in these adequacy cases are always very careful to avoid claiming that added funds will have any effect on student outcomes. Unfortunately the political paralysis created by these cases stops any consideration of more productive reforms. Instead of talking about performance incentives to districts and schools or linking funding to student outcomes, discussion is stymied by debates over how to raise the money and which districts will be hurt by any change in funding.

Courts in other states will be influenced by what happens in New York -- particularly because of the magnitude of this settlement. If the Court of Appeals continues on the current course, other state courts will be encouraged to follow suit. On the other hand, if the court acknowledges that its role is not appropriating state spending, it could enable New York to return to consideration of policies that might truly fix our schools.

There is no doubt that the children of New York need help. Their achievement levels and their graduation rates need improvement, but this justifies neither bad court decisions nor poor policies.

Bush Warns N Korea But Options Are Limited (FT)

By Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, October 10, 2006

Although President George W. Bush delivered a stern warning to North Korea over the consequences of its nuclear test, analysts say the US has few options but to rely on its international leverage, which has been severely weakened by the war in Iraq.

Critics say the Bush administration blundered in trying to confront North Korea in late 2002 just as it was committing itself to invading Iraq.

"The Bush administration deserves particular criticism," said Gary Samore, vice-president of the independent Council on Foreign Relations in New York. "They had unrealistic expectations of what they could achieve through pressure. The US ability to coerce North Korea is quite limited, especially in the middle of a war with Iraq."

US relations with China, already under strain over its support for Iran and Sudan, will be further tested as the US pushes for a tough response through the UN Security Council. Russia's drift towards war with a US-backed Georgia also complicates US efforts to get its way with Moscow.

Washington is seeking UN approval for 13 measures, most crucially inspections of cargo moving in and out of North Korea and a ban on trade in "dual use" materials that could be applied to development of weapons of mass destruction. Less controversial is the proposed ban on selling "luxury goods" to North Korea.

US ambitions to set up a global network of allied states willing to intercept suspect cargo by land, sea and air led to the formation in 2003 of the Proliferation Security Initiative. China has refused to join, however. It would be wary of giving a blanket approval for such interceptions, and analysts in Washington rule out a full naval blockade.

"That's an act of war that could get out of hand if challenged by North Korea," Mr Samore commented. "The US is not in a position to start a conflict on the Korean peninsula."

Wang Guangya, the Chinese envoy to the UN, called on the Security Council to respond "firmly, constructively and prudently". Ted Galen Carpenter of Washington's Cato Institute warned of a chill in Sino-US relations, saying the US might view "prudent" as "a synonym for weak".

North Korea may be calculating that the punishment it might suffer from China and South Korea will be short-lived as they weigh up the dangers of a nuclear-armed regime imploding under economic duress.

Minxin Pei, director of China studies at the Carnegie Endowment think-tank, said Beijing was angry at having its "face rubbed in the dirt" by North Korea but its priority was to "contain the fallout rather than punish". China might restrict energy supplies to North Korea but was unlikely to cut off all food supplies or support blanket interdictions, Mr Pei commented.

Even before the test, US officials did not hide their frustration with what they saw as China's foot-dragging. But some are starting to concede that the US might have overestimated China's influence and even the extent of its intelligence gathering.

The crisis over North Korea may also affect the impasse over Iran's nuclear ambitions. The failure of US policy towards Pyongyang had already influenced a shift towards a more pragmatic approach in dealing with Tehran.

For U.S., A Strategic Jolt After North Korea's Test (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, October 10, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 9 — North Korea may be a starving, friendless, authoritarian nation of 23 million people, but its apparently successful explosion of a small nuclear device in the mountains above the town of Kilju on Monday represents a defiant bid for survival and respect. For Washington and its allies, it illuminates a failure of nearly two decades of atomic diplomacy.

DOJ_NMG_0077147

North Korea is more than just another nation joining the nuclear club. It has never developed a weapons system it did not ultimately sell on the world market, and it has periodically threatened to sell its nuclear technology. So the end of ambiguity about its nuclear capacity foreshadows a very different era, in which the concern may not be where a nation's warheads are aimed, but in whose hands its weapons and skill end up.

As Democrats were quick to note on Monday, four weeks before a critical national election, President Bush and his aides never gave as much priority to countering a new era of proliferation as they did to overthrowing Saddam Hussein.

Mr. Bush and his aides contend that Iraq was the more urgent threat, in a volatile neighborhood. But the North's reported nuclear test now raises the question of whether it is too late for the president to make good on his promise that he would never let the world's "worst dictators" obtain the world's most dangerous weapons.

"What it tells you is that we started at the wrong end of the 'axis of evil,' " former Senator Sam Nunn, the Georgia Democrat who has spent his post-Congressional career trying to halt a new age of proliferation, said in an interview. "We started with the least dangerous of the countries, Iraq, and we knew it at the time. And now we have to deal with that."

Mr. Bush's top national security aides declined Monday to be interviewed about whether a different strategy over the past five years might have yielded different results. But Stephen J. Hadley, the national security adviser, has described the administration's approach to North Korea as the mirror image of its dealings with Iraq. "You'll recall that we were criticized daily for being too unilateral" in dealing with Saddam Hussein, Mr. Hadley said. "So here we are, working with our allies and friends, stressing diplomacy."

But at the same time, he said the administration had made a conscious decision not to draw "red lines" in dealing with Kim Jong-il's government because "the North Koreans just walk right up to them and then step over them," just to show they can. Other aides say that, lines or no lines, the North simply decided to race for a bomb — and finally made it.

North Korea announced its nuclear breakout in early 2003, kicking out international nuclear inspectors and very publicly beginning its drive to turn its stockpiles of spent nuclear fuel rods into a small arsenal of weapons. Focused then on the coming war with Iraq, Mr. Bush and his administration chose to set no limits.

But foreign policy, as Mr. Nunn says, is "all about priorities," and until Monday the closest Mr. Bush came to drawing a red line for the North was in May 2003, when he declared that the United States and South Korea "will not tolerate nuclear weapons in North Korea."

The Central Intelligence Agency's estimates in the years since have been that the United States has been tolerating exactly that — a small arsenal of nuclear fuel sufficient to produce six or more weapons.

Notably, Mr. Bush did not repeat that threat on Monday morning. Instead, he drew a new red line, one that appeared to tacitly acknowledge the North's possession of weapons. The United States would regard as a "grave threat," he said, any transfer by North Korea of nuclear material to other countries or terrorist groups, and would hold Mr. Kim's government "fully accountable for the consequences of such actions."

To critics of Mr. Bush's counterproliferation policy, this seemed a recognition that the North had successfully defied American, Chinese and Japanese warnings about building weapons and testing them, and was now simply trying to manage the aftermath. North Korea, it appears, is taking a page from Pakistan's strategic playbook: it exploded its first nuclear device in 1998, endured three years of sanctions, and now has emerged as a "major non-NATO ally" of the United States.

Mr. Bush's aides say that if Mr. Kim believes he, too, can expect the world to impose a few sanctions and then lose interest in the issue, he is wrong. "He is really going to rue the day he made this decision," Christopher R. Hill, the assistant secretary of state for East Asian and Pacific affairs, said of Mr. Kim on Monday. But Mr. Bush's critics charge that the threat may be empty. As they see it, Mr. Kim watched the Iraq war and drew a simple lesson: that broken countries armed with nuclear weapons do not get invaded, and do not have to worry about regime change.

"Think about the consequences of having declared something 'intolerable' and, last week, 'unacceptable,' and then having North Korea defy the world's sole superpower and the Chinese and the Japanese," said Graham Allison, the Harvard professor who has studied nuclear showdowns since the Cuban missile crisis. "What does that communicate to Iran, and then the rest of the world? Is it possible to communicate to Kim credibly that if he sells a bomb to Osama bin Laden, that's it?"

Mr. Allison was touching on the central dilemma facing Washington as it tries to extract itself from the morass of Iraq. Whether accurately or not, other countries around the world perceive Washington as tied down, unable or unwilling to challenge them while 140,000 troops are trying to tame a sectarian war.

Divining North Korea's true intentions is always difficult; there is no more closed society on earth. But the broad assumption inside and outside the United States government is that Mr. Kim's first priority is the survival of his government. And the second is that without a nuclear weapon, he believes his government would have no way of staving off the larger, richer powers around it: China, Japan, South Korea and the United States.

All have fought over control of the Korean Peninsula in decades past, and to Mr. Kim's mind, presumably, the prospect that the North could lash out is the only reason they have stayed at bay.

Mr. Kim may have calculated, many experts believe, that at this point there is little more that the Bush administration can do to him. The United States has imposed sanctions on his country since the end of the Korean War. The new crackdown on the banks through which the North conducts many of its illicit activities — counterfeiting, missile sales, trade in small arms — are being choked off, a step the North Korean leaders presumably see as part of a strategy of bringing them down.

It may be years, or decades, before historians know whether Iraq played into Mr. Kim's calculations about when to conduct a nuclear test. But clearly, managing simultaneous crises around the world is straining the system in Washington, and posing the Bush administration with more direct challenges than many believe it can handle at one moment.

That returns Mr. Bush to the problem he faced when he came to office, and that his aides have never stopped arguing about: whether the best way to contain North Korea is to further isolate it, or to draw it out of its paranoid shell. The nuclear test may force Washington to pick a strategy.

Bush's 'Axis Of Evil' Comes Back To Haunt United States (WP)

By Glenn Kessler And Peter Baker, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, October 10, 2006

Nearly five years after President Bush introduced the concept of an "axis of evil" comprising Iraq, Iran and North Korea, the administration has reached a crisis point with each nation: North Korea has claimed it conducted its first nuclear test, Iran refuses to halt its uranium-enrichment program, and Iraq appears to be tipping into a civil war 3 1/2 years after the U.S.-led invasion.

Each problem appears to feed on the others, making the stakes higher and requiring Bush and his advisers to make difficult calculations, analysts and U.S. officials said. The deteriorating situation in Iraq has undermined U.S. diplomatic credibility and limited the administration's military options, making rogue countries increasingly confident that they can act without serious consequences. Iran, meanwhile, will be watching closely the diplomatic fallout from North Korea's apparent test as a clue to how far it might go with its own nuclear program.

"Iran will follow very carefully what happens in the U.N. Security Council after the North Korean test," said Robert J. Einhorn, senior adviser at the Center for Strategic and International Studies (CSIS). "If the United Nations is not able to act forcefully, then Iran will think the path is clear to act with impunity."

Michael E. O'Hanlon, a Brookings Institution scholar and co-author of the new book "Hard Power: The New Politics of National Security," said the U.S. response to North Korea will have ripple effects. "Iran will certainly watch what happens. North Korea watched what happened with Pakistan and decided that the world didn't punish Pakistan too hard or too long," he said. "Iran will certainly notice if North Korea gets treated with kid gloves."

Political strategists debated the domestic implications of the North Korean test with midterm elections four weeks away. Some Republicans predicted it would take the focus off the Mark Foley congressional page scandal and remind voters that it is a dangerous world best confronted by tough-minded leaders. Some Democrats argued it would be seen as another failure of Bush's foreign policy and moved quickly to try to pin blame on the Republicans. "Is this going to help Republicans?" asked Jim Manley, spokesman for Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.). "The answer to that is absolutely not. This is another significant foreign policy failure for the administration."

In Bush's 2002 State of the Union address, a speech designed to shift the political debate from a battle against al-Qaeda to a possible confrontation with Iraq, the president mentioned North Korea, Iraq and Iran and declared: "States like these, and their terrorist allies, constitute an axis of evil, arming to threaten the peace of the world. By seeking weapons of mass destruction, these regimes pose a grave and growing danger. . . . In any of these cases, the price of indifference would be catastrophic."

All three issues came to a head in 2003: The United States invaded Iraq and discovered no weapons of mass destruction; North Korea began to obtain weapons-grade plutonium from fuel rods that had been under international observation; and Iran disclosed that it had made rapid progress with a previously secret uranium-enrichment program.

In contrast to its handling of Iraq, the administration has tried to resolve the North Korean and Iranian nuclear breakouts with diplomacy. But progress has been slow, in part because the United States has been reluctant to hold bilateral talks with either country except within the context of broader talks with other nations.

Former senator Sam Nunn (D-Ga.) faulted the administration for focusing on Iraq first, when greater threats loomed in North Korea and Iran. "We started with Iraq in the 'axis of evil' side, when we thought they did not yet have nuclear weapons, and that sent the signal to others that they better get them quick," he said. "I think we started on the wrong end of that."

The administration launched a full-court press yesterday at the Security Council, proposing elements of a tough resolution that would call for imposing an arms embargo and a series of legally binding U.N. financial and trade sanctions. The United States also called for international inspections of all trade in and out of North Korea to enforce the sanctions.

U.S. officials yesterday were focusing especially closely on the reaction of China, long North Korea's main benefactor. The Chinese government publicly denounced the test in unusually strong language, and a senior U.S. official said the private comments of Chinese officials were equally strong. While China has been reluctant to pressure North Korea, fearing a collapse of the government and mass refugees on its border, "the question is whether a chaotic North Korea is worse than a nuclear North Korea," the official said, speaking on the condition of anonymity because of the diplomatic sensitivities.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice appears likely to make a trip to the region soon to further build support for a tough response by China, Japan and South Korea. Several experts predicted that although China's leadership is angry enough to support some sanctions, it always will stop short of putting enough pressure on Pyongyang to force its collapse. "Full-up sanctions I don't see happening," said former White House Asia expert Michael J. Green, now at CSIS.

James B. Steinberg, President Bill Clinton's deputy national security adviser and now dean of the Lyndon B. Johnson School of Public Affairs at the University of Texas at Austin, said the North Korea test will raise a larger question that echoes Ronald Reagan's most famous 1980 campaign line -- "With respect to the axis of evil," Steinberg said, "are you better off today than you were four years ago? . . . It's clear that the answer is we're worse off with respect to the nuclear proliferation problem in both North Korea and Iran than four to six years ago, and I would argue we're worse off in our overall security because of the situation in Iraq."

Democrats Assail Bush's N. Korea Policy (AP-Y)

By Liz Sidoti, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 10, 2006

Democrats seized on North Korea's brazen act to criticize President Bush's record in confronting the communist regime, contending the administration's focus on Iraq ignored legitimate threats.

Democratic Sen. John Kerry, the president's rival in 2004 and a potential 2008 candidate, assailed Bush's policy as a "shocking failure," and said, "While we've been bogged down in Iraq where there were no weapons of mass destruction, a madman has apparently tested the ultimate weapon of mass destruction."

One month before midterm elections, North Korea's reported nuclear test provided Republicans an opportunity to shift the focus from their embarrassing — and politically explosive — congressional page scandal to national security, an issue the GOP considers its strength.

Sen. Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the Senate's second-ranking Republican, accused Democrats of playing partisan politics with a nuclear weapons threat. "Listening to some Democrats, you'd think the enemy was George Bush, not Kim Jong Il," he said.

Seizing on North Korea's actions to argue Republicans are stronger on security than Democrats is riddled with pitfalls and leaves the GOP's standard-bearer — Bush — as well as his rank-and-file vulnerable to criticism.

The president long has faced complaints that he has failed to sufficiently address North Korea and the threat has festered on his watch.

In the nearly five years since Bush labeled North Korea part of an "axis of evil" with Iran and Iraq, Kim Jong Il's government has withdrawn from the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty, announced it has nuclear weapons, refused to return to six-nation talks and launched seven missiles into the Sea of Japan, including a long-range Taepodong-2.

On Sunday, North Korea said it conducted its first-ever nuclear test.

"The Bush administration has for several years been in a state of denial about the growing challenge of North Korea, and has too often tried to downplay the issue or change the subject," said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev.

"We had the opportunity to stop North Korea from increasing its nuclear power, but George Bush went to sleep at the switch while he pursued his narrow agenda in Iraq," added Sen. Bob Menendez, a Democrat in a tough campaign in New Jersey.

Republicans, in turn, sought to deflect the criticism by lodging some of their own. They voiced their frequent claim that Democrats are weak on security — and dredged up Democratic votes they said illustrated their point.

House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, accused Democrats of standing in the way of work on a missile defense program. "It is now clear that such a position would weaken America's national defense and put Americans in danger," he said.

"Sherrod Brown's far left national security positions more troubling in light of North Korean missile test," the Senate Republicans' campaign committee said in a release that claims Brown voted a dozen times since 1993 to cut funding for ballistic missile defense.

Mindful of the tricky political subtext, some Republicans issued more carefully worded statements or refrained from attacking Democrats altogether.

DOJ_NMG_0077150

GOP Sen. Rick Santorum, facing a bitter re-election battle, said in a barely veiled reference to Democrats — "North Korea's actions cause great concern. This is no time for inexperienced, weak leaders."

House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., and others directed their anger at the North Koreans, with the speaker calling the test "a desperate act of a criminal regime."

The GOP's campaign to convince voters that Democratic rule is dangerous for the country was sidetracked when Rep. Mark Foley, R-Fla., resigned amid revelations that he sent sexually explicit electronic messages to teenage males who once worked as House pages. That set off infighting among Republicans — and knocked the party off its strong-on-safety message.

North Korea's Success Is Diplomacy's Failure (MCT)

By Tim Johnson

McClatchy Newspapers, October 10, 2006

BEIJING - In the end, every strategy failed to slow North Korea's nuclear march.

The United States used bullying as much as diplomacy, only to let a weapons program incubate and grow, leading to Monday's nuclear test.

South Korea's "sunshine policy" provided the North with aid, but got nothing in return on nuclear policy.

China, a big brother to North Korea, thought Pyongyang would heed its advice not to roil the waters of East Asia, but it didn't.

"Everybody's a loser," said Moon Chung-in, a political scientist at Yonsei University in Seoul and a frequent adviser to South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun.

North Korea trumpeted its new deterrent as "a great leap forward," casting itself as victorious. But analysts say pressure on the Hermit Kingdom will build, making Pyongyang a likely loser as well.

"North Korea succeeded in gaining nuclear weapons, but now it will get all kinds of sanctions from neighboring countries," Moon said.

In China, some analysts flayed Washington for not engaging Pyongyang directly in talks, and said North Korea had slid irreversibly into the global nuclear club.

"North Korea has succeeded in its nuclear ambition. The U.S. can do nothing at all now," said Shen Dingli, director of the U.S. Study Center at Fudan University in Shanghai.

Under the watch of the Bush administration, North Korea dropped out of the nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty, booted nuclear monitors, strengthened its missile capabilities, reprocessed nuclear fuel, and built what experts say is an arsenal of at least half a dozen nuclear bombs, maybe more.

North Korea now joins Russia, China, the United States, France, Britain, India and Pakistan in wielding nuclear weapons. Israel, though not an admitted nuclear power, is also believed to have hundreds of nuclear weapons.

In Seoul, President Roh publicly wrung his hands over the failure of policies toward North Korea, admitting that appeasement is unlikely to last in its present form.

"It could be said that the engagement policy has not been effective in resolving the North Korean nuclear crisis," South Korea's Yonhap news agency quoted Roh as saying.

Beijing issued a firm statement condemning North Korea for "brazenly" ignoring the worldwide opposition to its nuclear test, and demanded that it "abide by its pledges on denuclearization."

China in 2003 offered to host talks with the two Koreas, Russia, the United States and Japan on the nuclear crisis. It hosted five rounds of talks before they hit deadlock last year.

The nuclear test highlighted the fact that China, as a major supplier of energy and food to North Korea, never wanted to exercise its leverage to forestall the test. Indeed, some analysts say top Chinese leaders have a greater stomach for a nuclear-armed North Korea, with the turmoil it brings, than for the collapse of the Kim Jong Il regime, which could take away a key friendly buffer state and send refugees into China.

"Many people believe a nuclear North Korea is not necessarily a bad thing for China," said Jin Linbo of the China Institute of International Studies.

But China's public posture was different. It has long called for a nuclear-free peninsula, and its inability to achieve that goal will tie its hands as Washington and Tokyo push for severe sanctions against Pyongyang in the U.N. Security Council.

"China's efforts to solve the nuclear problem by peaceful talks has failed, the mechanism of the six-party talks has failed, and China's attempt to maintain security in the region has failed," said Zhang Liangui, a North Korea expert at the school for senior Communist Party officials in Beijing.

"There aren't many cards for China to play right now," Zhang added, saying he believes China will go along with U.N. sanctions against the North.

DOJ_NMG_0077151

East Asia, unlike Europe, has no security architecture that links nations. In East Asia, countries only have bilateral alliances with the United States.

"It plays into the hands of (recently installed Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo) Abe, who can justify greater defense spending," said Peter M. Beck, a Northeast Asia expert for the International Crisis Group, which advocates peaceful crisis resolution.

"It also plays into the hands of hard-liners in Seoul, who say, 'What do we have to show for nine years of sunshine policy?'" he said.

The already-battered Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT), which limits nuclear development and calls for global disarmament, also took a new hit, Beck said. It is under the NPT cloak that Western powers are trying to curb Iran's nuclear program.

Pyongyang's nuclear test, Beck said, "sends a signal to the world that even the most failed regime can defy the will of the United Nations and the United States."

The director of the International Atomic Energy Agency, Mohamed ElBaradei, said in a statement that the breaking of an international moratorium on nuclear testing, which had lasted for nearly a decade, and the emergency of another country with nuclear weapons capacity was "a clear setback to international commitments to move towards nuclear disarmament." He said the test added new urgency to the need for a legally binding universal ban on nuclear testing. The Comprehensive Nuclear Test Ban Treaty has not been ratified by enough countries to bring it into force. The United States and North Korea are among those who have not ratified it.

Condemnation Swift, But Options Are Limited (USAT)

By Bill Nichols

USA Today, October 10, 2006

WASHINGTON — World leaders found themselves in a familiar position Monday: harshly condemning the reclusive communist regime in North Korea for thumbing its nose at the international community.

North Korea's latest provocation, an announcement it had conducted an underground nuclear test, prompted a flurry of tough talk from around the globe.

China, a key supplier of food and oil to North Korea, called the action “brazen.” The United Nations Security Council went into emergency session to consider new sanctions. President Bush, the third in a succession of American presidents to try to forestall a North Korean nuclear arsenal, called the test “unacceptable.”

Despite the hard-edged rhetoric, foreign policy analysts and nuclear experts pointed out the obvious: World powers have tried to bully, threaten, cajole, entice, sanction and sweet talk North Korea into the community of nations for 50 years, without success.

“North Korea is really the land of bad options,” said Kurt Campbell, a foreign affairs analyst at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, a Washington think tank, and a Pentagon official during the Clinton administration. “Horrible options.”

The United States has signaled it won't mount a military response. An attack on North Korea could prompt a counterattack on Seoul. That would suck in the 28,000 U.S. troops in South Korea and endanger millions of civilians.

An alternative is economic sanctions. North Korea's isolated populace of 22 million has already endured severe poverty and famine for decades, not to mention almost total isolation under a totalitarian regime. Researchers at Johns Hopkins University estimate that as many as 2 million North Koreans died of hunger and related diseases during the mid-1990s.

Even without ready options, the United Nations was a hub of activity Monday as diplomats on the 15-member Security Council tried to craft a resolution in response.

The United States circulated a draft resolution obtained by the Associated Press late Monday that demands North Korea return to six-party talks and imposes sanctions for Pyongyang's “flagrant disregard” of the Security Council's appeal not to detonate a device.

Among the proposed draft measures: international inspection of all cargo to and from North Korea to limit the spread of nuclear, chemical and biological weapons; bans on luxury goods to and from the North; a ban on North Korean ships docking in any port, or any North Korean aircraft from taking off or landing in any country if they carried arms, nuclear or ballistic missile-related material or luxury goods; and travel restrictions on high-ranking North Korean officials.

In deliberations among council members, “No one defended (North Korea), no one even came close to defending it,” said John Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations.

North Korea remained defiant. Its ambassador, Pak Gil Yon, said the U.N. Security Council should congratulate North Korea for its test instead of passing “useless” resolutions.

DOJ_NMG_0077152

North Korea has refused for a year to attend six-nation international talks aimed at coaxing it to disarm. Instead, Pyongyang has called for direct talks with Washington and for the United States to drop sanctions it imposed to punish North Korea for alleged counterfeiting.

Ted Galen Carpenter, a foreign policy analyst with the Cato Institute, a Washington think tank, said North Korea's rationale for the test is to improve its bargaining position in future talks, as India and Pakistan appeared to after testing in 1998. “This is part of a long-term strategy,” he said. North Korean officials “concluded a good many years ago that the way to retain clout is to have a nuclear arsenal. I suspect Pakistan is their model.”

Some foreign policy analysts suggest that the apparent test should jar the United States and key allies to try new strategies.

“This is a terrible event,” said Daryl Kimball, executive director of the Arms Control Association, a non-proliferation group in Washington. “This is perhaps the worst non-proliferation event in the history of the nuclear age in the sense that it could have been avoided if … diplomacy had been more effective.”

Possible options:

·Direct talks with the United States. Bush has refused North Korea's demand for one-on-one dialogue. Both New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, who dealt with Pyongyang as U.N. ambassador in the Clinton administration, and former secretary of State James Baker say it's time to rethink that strategy.

Richardson proposes direct talks in which the United States would promise not to attack North Korea and to give Pyongyang aid in exchange for its agreement to end its nuclear program. Baker, in a television interview Sunday, said, “It's not appeasement to talk to your enemies,” including North Korea.

·Creative use of aid. Michael O'Hanlon, a foreign affairs analyst at the Brookings Institution, a Washington think tank, suggested specific offers of help to the impoverished North Korean people — tied to tougher restrictions on North Korean nukes.

·Pushing China. The United States could promise to withdraw all troops from South Korea if China can pressure the North to disarm, Carpenter said.

China, which has had influence with its communist neighbor in the past, has been cool about using strong-arm tactics because of fears that a collapse of North Korea could result in thousands of refugees streaming into China.

Most Korea watchers agree that Monday's apparent test would roil the region by adding North Korea to the group of nations with nuclear weapons: the United States, Russia, China, Britain, France, India and Pakistan.

(Israel, believed to possess nuclear weapons, has not acknowledged having an arsenal.)

The nuclear ambitions of North Korea and bizarre behavior of its leader, Kim Jong Il, have long rattled Japan, South Korea and China and prompted talk in Tokyo and Seoul that those nations should go nuclear as well.

The test will “transform the security environment in North Asia, and we will be entering a new, dangerous nuclear age,” said Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe.

Kimball said the controlled explosion would allow North Korea to test the performance of its nuclear weapons technology against design goals and make adjustments. He and other nuclear analysts said the fact that North Korea could explode a nuclear device was not surprising, given longtime suspicions about the advanced state of Pyongyang's nuclear program.

North Korea may have enough plutonium for as many as 13 nuclear weapons, according to the Institute for Science and International Security, a Washington think tank. Seismic data and air analysis aren't enough to tell experts whether North Korea is able to miniaturize a nuclear device to fit into a warhead on a missile.

North Korea tested seven missiles in July, including a long-range missile capable of reaching the United States. That missile, the Taepodong-2, failed within a minute. Six shorter-range missiles fell into the Sea of Japan.

David Albright, a former U.N. nuclear inspector and president of the Institute for Science and International Security, expressed surprise that the North Koreans staged only one explosion. Pakistan and India each carried out half a dozen tests over several days in 1998.

“You grab the opportunity when you can to test several times,” Albright said. He called the North Korean test “more of a demonstration than an attempt to learn as much as they could about nuclear weapons.”

He added: “They'll learn something even with one, but they could have learned more.”

The reasons for the timing of the test weren't clear — made even more mysterious by Kim Jong Il's track record of unpredictability. Kim took power in 1994 after the death of his father, dictator Kim Il Sung.

The younger Kim is known for quirks, among them his passion for Hennessy cognac and James Bond films. “You never know how to take this guy, because he does erratic things,” said Rep. Curt Weldon, R-Pa., who has talked with Kim seven times.

North Korea conducted some of its most recent missile tests on the evening of July 4 in the United States, suggesting it wanted to send a message. Monday's test came:

DOJ_NMG_0077153

·One day after the ninth anniversary of Kim's assuming his father's titles. While he became the de facto ruler in 1994, he didn't formally succeed him until Oct. 8, 1997.

·A day before South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki Moon was nominated as the next U.N. secretary-general.

Richardson said his big concern is that North Korea appears to have given up on the multiparty talks with the United States, China, Japan, Russia and South Korea and adopted “a bunker mentality.” Hard-liners appear to have won debate in Pyongyang, he said. “Unless that changes, they're going to keep building more nuclear weapons.”

Jim Walsh, a North Korea expert at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, said Pyongyang apparently has decided it is willing to weather new sanctions in order to gain the status and respect of a nuclear nation.

“They've made a decision to bite the bullet,” Walsh said of North Korea. “For all the brave talk by the U.S. and Japan, there isn't a hell of a lot they can do.”

U.S. Urges Sanctions On North Korea (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz And Colum Lynch, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, October 10, 2006

The White House pushed yesterday for aggressive new sanctions on North Korea, including measures to limit trade in military and luxury items, as Pyongyang's claim that it conducted an underground nuclear test defied the administration's efforts to stop the spread of weapons of mass destruction.

Japan, Russia, South Korea -- and, significantly, China, North Korea's closest ally -- joined the United States in condemning the reported test, giving the Bush administration hope that it might unify the international community against Pyongyang. But U.S. officials acknowledged uncertainty about whether that would translate into strict U.N. sanctions, given China's traditional reluctance to lean heavily on its ally.

There were questions yesterday about the strength and success of the reported North Korean explosion, but there was little doubt among White House officials, lawmakers and outside experts that the action added a volatile new ingredient to an already dangerous world environment.

President Bush, acknowledging he could not confirm that a nuclear test occurred early yesterday in North Korea, said that the claim was nonetheless a "provocative act" and that he is "committed to diplomacy." Noting that North Korea has transferred missile technology to Iran and Syria, Bush also seemed to draw a sharp line that he warned Pyongyang not to cross.

"The transfer of nuclear weapons or material by North Korea to states or non-state entities would be considered a grave threat to the United States, and we would hold North Korea fully accountable of the consequences of such action," Bush told reporters at the White House.

If the test is confirmed, North Korea will be the eighth member of the club of declared nuclear powers -- and one led by a reclusive Stalinist dictator known for cruelty and unpredictability.

Rep. Jim Leach (R-Iowa), chairman of the House International Relations subcommittee on Asia, said the action could prod Japan to drop its non-nuclear position, encourage Iran to harden its stance in negotiations over its own reported nuclear program and make it difficult to stop North Korea from marketing weapons to "undesirable parties."

The new claim also promised to renew scrutiny of the Bush administration's handling of North Korea and more generally its efforts to confront rogue states, just as crucial midterm elections are approaching. North Korea has ignored repeated warnings from the Bush administration on nuclear and missile testing.

Democrats quickly seized on the new North Korean claim as evidence that Bush has bungled his foreign policy, and even some conservatives voiced concern that the initial White House response yesterday was not stern enough.

"Unfortunately, on the Bush Administration's watch, North Korea's nuclear arsenal has grown to as many as a dozen bombs," Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) said in a statement. "Distracted by Iraq and paralyzed by internal divisions, the Bush Administration has for several years been in a state of denial about the growing challenge of North Korea, and has too often tried to downplay the issue or change the subject."

Sen. Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.), the majority whip, said of the Democrats: "It doesn't make any difference what [Bush] does, they just come out and trash him." McConnell said in an interview that he hopes that China might be encouraged to sign on to a plan for tough sanctions on North Korea, noting a Chinese Foreign Ministry statement that said Pyongyang "defied the universal opposition of international society and flagrantly conducted the nuclear test."

"For China, that's pretty tough language," McConnell said, echoing a statement voiced privately by Bush administration officials.

At the United Nations yesterday, the Bush administration proposed an arms embargo and financial and trade sanctions on North Korea, as well as international inspections of all trade going in and out of the country to enforce them. The measures were contained in a U.S. draft resolution presented to the 15-nation council yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0077154

John R. Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, told diplomats at a closed-door emergency session that the U.S. initiative is designed to limit North Korea's ability to import or export nuclear and ballistic missile technology and hinder its capacity to raise illicit money, citing the alleged manufacture of counterfeit U.S. dollars, senior council diplomats said.

The draft resolution would also bar the import of all luxury goods and demand that North Korea cease its nuclear activities and restart multiparty talks aimed at resolving the nuclear crisis. The resolution would give North Korea 30 days to comply with council demands or face "such further action as may be needed."

Britain and France voiced support for sanctions on North Korea but stopped short of endorsing the draft resolution.

Japan's U.N. ambassador, Kenzo Oshima, said his government "sees eye to eye" with the Americans on many of the proposals. The Japanese, in fact, offered amendments that in some cases go further; Japan called for a ban on all North Korean exports, for instance, and a ban on North Korean ships or aircraft calling on foreign countries.

China, meanwhile, cautioned that the Security Council should pursue only diplomatic means to persuade North Korea to stop its nuclear activities.

China's U.N. ambassador, Wang Guangya, said that Beijing opposes the North Korean test and that it is ready to discuss "how the Security Council could react firmly, constructively and prudently with regard to this challenge." But he declined to say whether Beijing would support a sanctions resolution. "The door to solve this issue from a diplomatic point of view is still open," he said.

Privately, U.S. officials said they are hopeful after private conversations with the Chinese that Beijing is sufficiently angry with North Korea to sign on to the U.S. plan.

"This was really a direct challenge to the Chinese, and indications are that they are not taking this lightly," said one senior U.S. official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitive deliberations. "We are hopeful that they will exert whatever influence they have left with the North Koreans."

Leach and Rep. Tom Lantos (Calif.), the ranking Democrat on the International Relations Committee, urged the administration to open direct talks with the North Koreans, which the White House has resisted except in the context of broader negotiations with China, Japan, Russia and South Korea.

"My impression is that the administration is profoundly divided in their approach to North Korea," Lantos said. "I am convinced that there are very senior people in the administration who agree with me that dialogue is needed."

But former House speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.), who has been critical of the administration's efforts on North Korea, drew a different lesson.

"We keep trying to find an official diplomatic technique for dealing with a regime that violates every norm of human decency," he said, adding that the administration needs to step up efforts to undermine the government by trying to get food and supplies to North Koreans via unofficial channels.

Pentagon Assesses Responses, Including A Possible Blockade (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

The New York Times, October 10, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 9 — Now that North Korea seems to have made good on its threat with what appears to be a nuclear test, United States military commanders and civilian policy makers are refining plans in the event that President Bush orders a blockade of North Korean shipments to prevent the sale of a completed bomb or nuclear components.

Senior officers say Navy and Air Force combat and surveillance equipment are already in the region, and more could be deployed rapidly.

Still, any unilateral effort by the United States to cordon off North Korea by sea and air could founder along the country's lengthy land border with China.

"This is a tough question," one senior official with years of experience in military planning said Monday, speaking as did others on the condition of anonymity because he was discussing classified war plans. "The only good options were before North Korea got the bomb. There are no good options now."

For five decades, the American military has written war plans and deployed forces for a worst-case situation in the Korean peninsula: a major artillery, missile and ground attack from north to south across the demilitarized zone.

But a conventional war is no longer the most pressing military threat. It is nuclear proliferation.

Many staff officers contend that North Korea's ballistic missile and nuclear programs are not primarily intended as part of a plan for a land attack on South Korea.

If anything, North Korea probably regards its effort to develop a nuclear arsenal as a deterrent against an attack by the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0077155

The North Korean nuclear efforts could also be intended to press South Korea for diplomatic and economic gain, and to hold Japan, another important American ally, at risk, gaining even more leverage against the United States.

Given that geopolitical geometry, American military officers and senior policy makers say, the Pentagon's abilities in the region, along with those of South Korea and Japan, are sufficient against the shifting North Korean military threat.

While land combat is not an imminent threat, Pentagon and military officials say, the prolonged deployments of ground forces in Iraq and Afghanistan have doubtless complicated planning for the Korean Peninsula.

Should more ground forces be required for South Korea, only a handful of combat brigades stand ready in the United States, Pentagon and military officials say. To bolster the force, additional combat units now getting ready for tours in Iraq could be pointed to the Pacific instead, with troops already in Iraq staying there longer than planned.

Although the decision to move a full combat brigade of American ground forces from South Korea to Iraq in 2004 generated much public debate on the peninsula, the Pentagon more quietly has shifted substantial numbers of heavy Air Force bombers and attack aircraft from the United States to bases throughout the region to offset the decrease in ground forces. The Air Force's stealth bombers, with intercontinental range, are also available from their base in the American Midwest.

Navy aircraft aboard carriers in the Pacific are on call, as are submarines equipped with a range of conventional and nuclear missiles. The most modern Patriot antimissile batteries have also been assigned to the region, as well as Aegis cruisers with abilities designed to track and shoot down missiles.

"Taken together, this has added a tremendous amount of capability more appropriate for the threat right now," a senior Defense Department official said.

Pentagon officials acknowledge that the sustained deployments to Iraq and Afghanistan have heightened the risks that would be faced if there were a Korean conflict because important equipment is committed to the Middle East.

Weapons systems that officers call "enablers" are routinely in short supply and are heavily engaged in Iraq and Afghanistan; they include intelligence equipment like the pilotless Predator surveillance aircraft. Likewise, large stockpiles of precision-guided munitions have been placed within striking range of Iraq and Afghanistan. While those weapons are also in the Pacific arsenals, senior officials would have to weigh the risk to both military theaters and decide how best to allocate limited resources.

Even senior commanders agree that the commitments to Iraq and Afghanistan have imposed risks on the American military, an assessment contained in a classified report to Congress last year from the departing chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Gen. Richard B. Myers.

General Myers wrote that the concentration of troops and advanced weapons in Iraq and Afghanistan limited the Pentagon's ability to deal with other potential armed conflicts.

Major combat operations elsewhere in the world, if ordered by the president, still would succeed — but would be more protracted and would produce higher casualties among American forces and foreign civilians, General Myers wrote. A range of senior officers have said that assessment still stands.

One of the most significant and worrisome complications is that American intelligence agencies have no confidence that they can locate all of North Korea's weapons depots, development laboratories, nuclear command centers and leadership hide-outs — though American intelligence abilities are said to have worried the North Korean leadership in the past.

American intelligence officials concluded that Kim Jong-il, the North Korean leader, went into hiding during the final buildup to the invasion of Iraq in 2003 because he feared that he, too, might be tracked and attacked.

After North Korea's newest announcement, military analysts continued Monday to assess whether its announcement that it had tested a nuclear device, in defiance of international opinion, represented a calculation by Mr. Kim that he was less vulnerable now — or that he needed to join the elite club of declared nuclear powers to deter a possible American attack.

World Condemns North Korea (LAT)

Science: Seismic waves probably came from a nuclear explosion, but a weak one; Pressure: China may hold the key to forcing Pyongyang into serious negotiations; Impact: The test is seen as having a des

UNITED NATIONS — International condemnation poured down on North Korea on Monday for its announced nuclear test, as scientists tried to determine whether the underground blast was a successful nuclear explosion and diplomats conferred on how to contain the rogue regime.

The U.N. Security Council swiftly denounced the North Korean action and began work on a U.S.-sponsored resolution aimed at punishing the country for violating a moratorium on nuclear testing.

DOJ_NMG_0077156

The measures advocated by the United States include an international arms embargo, a ban on all trade relating to weapons of mass destruction, a freeze on funds linked to North Korea's missile and nuclear programs or its suspected counterfeiting of U.S. dollars, and a ban on trade in luxury goods.

The U.S. proposal also would authorize international inspection of cargo to and from North Korea to prevent the regime in Pyongyang from selling nuclear technology to other countries or armed groups.

China and Russia, which had been North Korea's grudging protectors on the Security Council, seemed ready to join in at least some sanctions. Both nations hold veto power at the council, and China in particular would be key to any effort to enforce sanctions. Ambassadors of the five permanent council members worked on refining a resolution throughout the day, with meetings expected to continue today.

China has the greatest leverage over North Korea, its isolated and impoverished neighbor, because it supplies more than 70% of the nation's fuel and 40% of its food, according to intelligence analysts in the region. Beijing has been resistant to economic sanctions because officials fear that punishing North Korea too harshly could push the country — already subject to periodic famine — over the edge, resulting in a flood of refugees into China's neighboring Liaoning and Jilin provinces and spurring domestic instability.

U.S. intelligence officials accept the North Koreans' claim that they set off a nuclear device, but they note that the magnitude of the explosion was small by nuclear standards — less than a kiloton, a fraction of the power of the atomic bombs the United States dropped on Japan in World War II. The relatively small size of the explosion makes some scientists and intelligence experts believe there may have been a problem with the test or a flaw in the design of the device.

World leaders voiced their concern about the prospect of having North Korea as the latest entrant to the club of nuclear powers. They urged the North's leader, Kim Jong Il, to give up the country's nuclear program and return to negotiations.

Officials in Washington and other world capitals pointed to two potentially grim outcomes from North Korea's becoming a nuclear weapons state: a nuclear arms race in East Asia and an effort by Pyongyang to export atomic weapons.

Some U.S. military officials said Monday that Japan might come to believe that its only assurance against attack from North Korea would be to build its own nuclear bomb, reviving the Cold War doctrine of mutually assured destruction, often referred to by the acronym MAD. Even before the North Korean test, Japan's new prime minister, Shinzo Abe, had argued for a greater role for Japan's military.

"The question is: Does Japan develop nuclear weapons?" said an Army officer with extensive experience in the Korean peninsula, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss the matter publicly. "Do you have MAD all over Asia?

"It is very much in China's interest and Russia's interest to get North Korea back in the box," the official said. "China does not want to see a nuclear Japan."

President Bush, in his response to the North Korean announcement, focused on the danger of a spread of nuclear technology.

"Once again, North Korea has defied the will of the international community, and the international community will respond," Bush said after speaking by phone to the leaders of China, South Korea, Russia and Japan.

"Today's claim by North Korea serves only to raise tensions, while depriving the North Korean people of increased prosperity and better relations with the world" through talks, Bush said.

Bush criticized North Korea for passing missile technology to Syria and Iran, calling the Pyongyang regime "one of the world's leading proliferators." He said that if North Korea passed on nuclear know-how, it would be "a grave threat to the United States, and we would hold North Korea fully accountable [for] the consequences of such action."

The Chinese Foreign Ministry issued a sharply worded statement Monday in which it termed North Korea's action "brazen" even as it called for calm.

"The Chinese side strongly demands the North Korean side to abide by its pledges on denuclearization and to stop any action that would worsen the situation," it said.

China rarely speaks bluntly in public about its neighbor. Nor does it tend to issue statements within hours of an event, as it did Monday. Both actions indicate the gravity Beijing attaches to North Korea's announcement.

China has used its leverage with North Korea in the past. In early 2003, it reportedly turned off North Korea's oil supply for a few days, ostensibly because of "technical problems." That move quickly brought Pyongyang back to international negotiations it had abandoned.

Russian leaders also denounced Pyongyang's news. In Moscow, President Vladimir V. Putin said he would coordinate actions with the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0077157

"Russia definitely denounces the tests conducted by North Korea," Putin said at a Cabinet meeting, according to the Russian news agency Interfax. "And this is not just a question of Korea itself. It is a question of the enormous damage done to the process of nonproliferation of weapons of mass destruction in the world."

But the U.N. ambassadors from Russia and China cautioned against abandoning diplomacy in the heat of the crisis.

Russian Ambassador Vitaly Churkin called for "cool heads" in dealing with the crisis, and Chinese Ambassador Wang Guangya said his government would support a "firm, constructive but prudent reaction from the council." He pointedly did not mention sanctions, saying that "the door to solve this issue from a diplomatic point of view is still open."

In an emergency Security Council meeting Monday morning, U.S. Ambassador John R. Bolton presented 13 elements for a resolution aimed at punishing North Korea.

He said both China and Russia seemed ready to join the rest of the council in the punitive action. "No one defended it. No one even came close to defending it," he said of the declared nuclear test. "We'll see how the negotiations go, but I think we're off to an important start here," Bolton said.

The United States has been urging other countries to join it in economic sanctions imposed last year aimed at shutting down North Korea's alleged money laundering and counterfeiting of U.S. dollars.

Russian officials also said they could enforce sanctions if the U.N. adopted them. "We have a very small border with North Korea," Churkin said. "I assure you there is no problem monitoring that part of the border."

In the shadow of the North Korean crisis, the Security Council also formally nominated South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki-moon to be the U.N.'s next secretary-general. The nomination will be passed on to the General Assembly for approval this week. Ban would take office when Kofi Annan steps down Dec. 31.

Ban held a news conference in Seoul to accept the nomination amid the flurry of discussions about Pyongyang. He said the decision was an honor for him and his country.

"This should be a moment of joy, but instead I stand here with a very heavy heart" because of the announcement of the nuclear test, he said.

Ban has said that as secretary-general, he would like to be personally involved in negotiations with North Korea, drawing on his expertise from three years of participation in international talks over the North's nuclear program.

He said he did not consider it a conflict of interest to be involved in an issue so integral to his country's well-being. "I would like to deal with North Korea personally, even go there, because I have experience and a deep understanding of this complex issue," he said in a recent interview. "I know I will be able to do my job as secretary-general with impartiality."

Bush Rebukes North Korea; U.S. Seeks New U.N. Sanctions (NYT)

By Warren Hoge And Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, October 10, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Oct. 9 — The United States proposed tough new United Nations sanctions on North Korea on Monday after its reported test of a nuclear weapon, and President Bush warned the North that he considered its activity a potential threat to American national security.

At an emergency meeting of the United Nations Security Council, the United States pressed for international inspections of all cargo moving into and out of North Korea to detect weapons-related material and a ban on all trading in military goods and services with the country.

At the White House, President Bush called the North Korean test “a threat to international peace and security” and condemned it as a “provocative act.”

But Russia and China, which have veto power and have consistently opposed tough sanctions, did not signal that they were ready to go along with the American proposal. Britain, France and Japan said they were also pressing for strong sanctions, which the Council is expected to debate in the coming days.

Coming just one month before the November midterm elections, North Korea’s reported test had immediate political ramifications. Democrats were already using their campaigns to argue that the war in Iraq had made the United States less secure by diverting attention away from threats like North Korea; now they are using the North’s claim to hammer away at their theme.

DOJ_NMG_0077158

Mr. Bush also issued a pointed, albeit carefully worded, warning to the North not to export any nuclear technology it might have. In the past, North Korea has sold its weapons systems to other countries.

"The transfer of nuclear weapons or material by North Korea to states or nonstate entities would be considered a grave threat to the United States," Mr. Bush said. "And we would hold North Korea fully accountable of the consequences of such action."

The president has not used the phrase "grave threat" in the past with respect to North Korea, and analysts interpreted the remark as a signal that the White House was, in effect, raising the threshold on what kind of actions it would be willing to accept from the North, given that diplomacy has so far not worked.

"He has finally drawn a very clear red line, which is essentially: we know you have nukes, don't even think about proliferating," said Mike Chinoy, an expert in Korean security at the Pacific Council on International Policy, a research institution in Los Angeles.

"It's kind of always been the unspoken administration red line," Mr. Chinoy said, "because the reality is that, whatever the harshness of their rhetoric, the Bush administration has not been able to actually stop North Korea from staging this nuclear breakout."

Democratic Party strategists quickly circulated a "talking points" memorandum to Democratic candidates, urging them to cast the reported North Korean nuclear test as "a colossal foreign policy failure of the Bush administration." Several picked up on that theme.

Claire McCaskill, a Democratic candidate for the Senate from Missouri, convened a conference call with Richard Ben-Veniste, a member of the commission that investigated the Sept. 11 attacks, to talk to reporters about North Korea. Representative Harold E. Ford Jr., the Democratic Senate candidate in Tennessee, issued a statement to reporters, as did Senator Robert Menendez, the New Jersey Democrat in a tough re-election fight.

"Today's nuclear test by North Korea confirms our worst fears and illustrates just how much the Bush administration's incompetence has endangered our nation," Mr. Menendez said in the statement, adding, "While George Bush bogged our military down to topple a regime that had no weapons of mass destruction, a brutal dictator in North Korea has strengthened a nuclear arsenal that has the potential to threaten the West Coast of the United States."

Republicans were more muted in their reactions; Senator Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the Republican whip, issued a brief statement that did not mention Mr. Bush's leadership at all, but simply called North Korea's claim a "confrontational move designed only to destabilize the region."

White House officials insisted that despite the talk of sanctions at the United Nations, the administration's goal remains persuading North Korea to return to the six-nation talks and give up its nuclear program. Those negotiations have dragged on for more than two years with no substantive results, and North Korea left them 13 months ago.

Mr. Bush spent more than an hour on the telephone Monday morning in separate calls to leaders of the four nations, aside from the United States and North Korea, that are participating in those talks: Japan, China, South Korea and Russia.

Asserting Washington's determination to protect Japan and South Korea, its principal allies in the region, Mr. Bush said the United States "will meet the full range of our deterrent and security commitments."

He was careful to say that intelligence officials were still working to confirm North Korea's statement about its test. But he said that "such a claim itself constitutes a threat to international peace and security."

China, North Korea's closest supporter and neighbor, called the action a "flagrant" violation of international opinion and said it "firmly opposes" North Korea's conduct. Russia's president, Vladimir V. Putin, said his country "absolutely condemns" the test.

John R. Bolton, the American ambassador to the United Nations, reported that the 15 members of the Security Council were "solid" in deploring the North Korean move, and he said he hoped for swift action. But by Monday evening the Council adjourned its deliberations and set further meetings for Tuesday while, Mr. Bolton said, they received instructions from their capitals.

Richard A. Grenell, Mr. Bolton's spokesman, said the United States was merging its suggestions with those from Japan and that a draft resolution was being composed on that basis.

In its 13-point proposal, the United States urged the Security Council to require North Korea to dismantle its nuclear program, suspend its building of ballistic missiles, freeze assets and transactions associated with the development of unconventional weapons, impose a ban on trade in luxury goods and prevent abuse of the international financial system, a reference to North Korean counterfeiting activities.

According to a draft amendment, the Japanese want to place additional restrictions on North Korean ships, aircraft and products, and prevent North Korean officials from being able to move outside the country's borders.

Japan is also suggesting that the secretary general "actively engage in this matter."

DOJ_NMG_0077159

Earlier Monday, the Security Council formally nominated Ban Ki-moon, the foreign minister of South Korea, as the new secretary general, succeeding Kofi Annan when he retires Dec. 31. Mr. Ban had said in a Seoul news conference that he intended to make peace on the Korean Peninsula a high priority.

Mr. Bolton said the new resolution ought to be drawn up under Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter, which makes sanctions mandatory and militarily enforceable.

It is a procedure that China and Russia, both permanent members, traditionally resist. It was eliminated from the resolution passed in July condemning North Korean missile launchings.

While Wang Guangya, the Chinese ambassador, said Beijing condemned the North Korean action, which it had warned North Korea against taking, he turned aside questions on whether China would now support a sanctions resolution.

He said only that the Council should "react firmly, constructively and prudently," adding that "the door to solve this issue from a diplomatic point of view is still open."

Vitaly I. Churkin, the Russian ambassador, also declined to state whether Moscow's view on sanctions had changed. "I think the North Koreans will be facing a very serious attitude on the part of the Security Council," he said, without elaborating.

Moscow and Beijing would be particularly affected by the American call for border inspections of shipments in and out of North Korea since the borders involved are theirs.

U.S., Japan Lead Push To Sanction Pyongyang (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, October 10, 2006

NEW YORK -- The United States and Japan yesterday pressed the U.N. Security Council to approve tough new sanctions against North Korea, amid near-universal condemnation of Pyongyang's claim that it had tested a nuclear weapon.

Among the proposed steps was a forcible stopping and searching of ships traveling to and from North Korean ports to prevent the export of nuclear materials.

President Bush, speaking at the White House, said the North had "once again defied the will of the international community, and the international community will respond."

Mr. Bush warned that any attempt by Pyongyang to export its nuclear technology to rogue states "would be considered a grave threat to the United States, and we would hold North Korea fully accountable for the consequences of such action."

The purported test was sharply criticized by all of North Korea's neighbors, U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan, the leaders of the five permanent members of the Security Council and Mohamed ElBaradei, head of the United Nations' International Atomic Energy Agency.

North Korean officials said yesterday that they had conducted an underground nuclear test at a barren location in the country's northeast, sparking an intense day of diplomacy in New York and in capitals around the world. The purported test came just three days after the Security Council unanimously denounced the idea.

U.N. Ambassador John R. Bolton said yesterday that Washington and Tokyo are seeking a resolution under Chapter 7 of the U.N. Charter, which allows the council to impose military, economic and diplomatic penalties on nations to protect international peace and security.

Mr. Bolton said he was impressed by the unanimity of the council's approach to the North, in a morning session that lasted barely half an hour.

"No one defended [the missile test]; no one even came close to defending it," the U.S. representative said.

The Security Council meets again today on the crisis.

China, North Korea's main ally, has been reluctant in the past to support harsh measures against the North. But Mr. Bolton said Beijing had not objected when the tough measures were first outlined to Security Council ambassadors at yesterday's closed emergency session.

"I didn't see any protectors of North Korea in that room this morning," Mr. Bolton said.

Wang Guangya, China's U.N. ambassador, said his country was "formally opposed to [North Korea's] nuclear test."

"China is ready to discuss with other council members to see how the Security Council could react firmly, constructively, and prudently with regard to this challenge," he said.

Mr. Wang did not say whether Beijing would support the coercive Chapter 7 measures, but he noted that "the door to solve this issue from diplomatic point of view is still open."

Christopher Hill, the State Department's point man on the North Korean nuclear issue, told CNN that U.S. policy now would be designed to "make [North Korean leader] Kim Jong-il rue the day he made the decision" to proceed with the test.

U.N. diplomats said privately that Mr. Bolton told the Security Council session that Washington would view a North Korean attack on South Korea or Japan as an attack on the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0077160

The U.S.-Japan draft resolution, in addition to urging North Korea to return to stalled regional talks on its nuclear program, proposed a range of sanctions against the secretive communist regime in Pyongyang, including:

·The inspection of all cargo shipped to and from North Korean ports to prevent nuclear proliferation.

·A travel ban on some North Korean officials.

·A ban on trade in luxury goods and military items with the North.

·A requirement that U.N. states freeze all assets related to North Korea's weapons and missile programs.

·Increased scrutiny and prohibitions on North Korean financial transactions that could support nuclear or military programs.

Pyongyang's U.N. ambassador, Pak Gil-yon, told reporters that the test would help "the maintenance and guarantee of peace and security in the Peninsula and the region." He said other nations should "congratulate" the North for its success.

A North Korean official said the United States should agree to hold direct talks with his government on security guarantees to avert a situation in which Pyongyang would feel compelled to launch nuclear-armed missiles, South Korea's Yonhap News Agency reported today.

"We want this situation to be concluded before the unhappy situation arises in which we fire nuclear missiles, and this depends on how the United States acts," the official was quoted as saying in Beijing on the condition of anonymity.

"What we want is North Korea's safety, including a guarantee of our regime," the official said.

North Korea did have one defender yesterday. Iran, which the United States and its European allies say is running its own clandestine nuclear weapons program, said on its state radio that U.S. "pressure and humiliation" had led North Korea to conduct the test.

North Korea's Political, Economic Gamble (WP)

By Anthony Faiola And Maureen Fan, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, October 10, 2006

Analysts Say Risks Include Loss of Key Regional Aid

TOKYO, Oct. 9 -- North Korea may have gained bragging rights on Monday as the world's newest nuclear power, but the pivotal question now is whether the secretive communist government can survive the political fallout.

While the United States and Japan have long pushed for a hard line against North Korea, there were early indications Monday that South Korea and China, the North's chief benefactors, may be reconsidering their support for the government of Kim Jong Il. There were also concerns that Pyongyang's claims of a nuclear test could touch off an arms race in Northeast Asia.

Analysts said any major development would threaten stability in the strategically vital region, in which the United States has long maneuvered diplomatically among friend and foe.

China and South Korea have poured billions of dollars in aid and investment into the North, effectively propping up Kim's government under the assumption that any collapse there would send millions of desperate refugees pouring across the country's borders. The risk of such an economic calamity, they have gambled, has outweighed the risk of a nuclear-armed North Korea.

But the announcement of a test, analysts said, may have represented a tipping point. In a telephone call with U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, China's foreign minister condemned North Korea for having "ignored universal opposition of the international community," the Chinese Foreign Ministry said in a statement. The minister, Li Zhaoxing, also stressed that the Chinese government was "resolutely opposed" to the nuclear test.

South Korea, meanwhile, immediately halted delivery of an emergency assistance package to help the North deal with recent floods. President Roh Moo Hyun suggested that his country's "sunshine policy" of engagement -- of which he was a vocal supporter -- had failed.

"The South Korean government at this point cannot continue to say that this engagement policy is effective," Roh said in a nationally televised speech. "Ultimately, it is not something we should give up on, but objectively speaking, the situation has changed. Being patient and accepting whatever North Korea does is no longer acceptable."

Any shift in policy by China or South Korea would be at least partly based on the anticipated reaction of Japan, the nation that today feels most threatened by North Korea's ballistic missiles. Analysts have assumed that a nuclear-armed North Korea would lead Tokyo to accelerate plans to redraft its pacifist constitution and rearm itself with a more aggressive military.

Last week, a U.S. congressional report went as far as to suggest that a test by the North could set in motion a domino effect in which Japan, South Korea and perhaps Taiwan pursue their own nuclear weapons, touching off an arms race that would dramatically escalate the consequences of any regional disputes.

Although some observers were quick to caution that China's criticism of North Korea might not necessarily translate into action, there was little question that the reported test had deeply embarrassed China. The Chinese government has taken the lead in the diplomatic effort to denuclearize North Korea at long-stalled six-party talks in Beijing, bringing the United States, Japan, Russia, and South Korea and North Korea to the table.

"It's a big slap to China," Zhu Feng, a professor of international studies at Peking University, said of the North's test. "It's time for a new approach, because we just got humiliated. For four years, we have been so good to North Korea, trying to make the right conditions for Kim Jong Il to abandon nuclear weapons in exchange for normalization with the U.S. and Japan and a lot of economic aid. China's goodwill has been relentlessly wasted."

Analysts said China will now be faced with heightened international pressure to accept tougher economic sanctions and reduce or even cut its aid -- including oil shipments -- to coerce Pyongyang back to the negotiating table. China's options are limited now, and although analysts say it will probably harden its stance against North Korea, it has in the past drawn the line at any action that would endanger Kim's government.

In effect, Beijing will have to make a difficult decision.

"If China votes for sanctions at the U.N., the China and North Korea relationship will break up," said Shi Yinhong, a professor of international relations at People's University in Beijing. "And if the United Nations really passes financial sanctions toward North Korea, the risk of a society collapse of North Korea is high."

For its part, Japan is likely to take an even harder line than before. The country's new prime minister, Shinzo Abe, on Monday vowed a tough response, saying he would "immediately consider taking stern measures."

Those are likely to include a ban on millions of dollars' worth of annual remittances sent home by North Korean nationals living in Japan.

But even coupled with sharper sanctions from the United States, analysts say, the pressure brought to bear on North Korea is unlikely to be enough without the full support of Beijing and Seoul.

Analysts say Kim has already succeeded in at least one way. With its declaration of a nuclear test, North Korea has made the price of a military solution to the standoff -- something Bush administration officials had largely dismissed given North Korea's arsenal of ballistic missiles and its million-man army -- even higher. Some suggested Monday that it may already be too late to turn back the clock.

"North Korea's message is that no matter how hard South Korea, Japan, the United States gang up on them, they won't budge," said Seung Joo Baek of the Seoul-based Korea Institute for Defense Analyses. "They want to be recognized as a nuclear power. They are assuming that it is the only thing that will keep them safe. We will have to wait and see if they are right."

Fan reported from Beijing. Special correspondent Joohee Cho in Seoul contributed to this report.

Angry China Likely To Toughen Korea Stand Somewhat (NYT)

By Joseph Kahn

The New York Times, October 10, 2006

BEIJING, Oct. 9 — China's punctilious Foreign Ministry reserves the word hanran, which translates as brazen or flagrant, for serious affronts to the nation's dignity by countries that have historically been rivals or enemies.

When the previous Japanese prime minister visited the Yasukuni Shrine, which China condemns as honoring Japan's World War II-era militarism, he was described as "brazen." When the United States bombed the Chinese Embassy in Belgrade in 1999, Beijing called that act "flagrant."

North Korea, a longstanding ideological ally, has had increasingly testy relations with China in recent years. But it was not until Monday, moments after North Korea apparently exploded a nuclear device, that China accused it of a "brazen" violation of its international commitments.

The wording is just one indication that a nuclear test would cross a red line for China, which has devoted years of painstaking diplomatic effort, and staked its delicate relationship with the United States, on the premise that it could deliver a peaceful, negotiated solution to the nuclear standoff with North Korea.

That policy, Chinese analysts say, seems to have failed, and North Korea's action leaves Beijing little choice but to take a tougher approach. But Chinese leaders still see highly punitive sanctions as unpalatable and counterproductive, and the country's elite remains sharply divided over how far to distance China from its neighbor, and how closely to embrace the Bush administration, several senior Chinese foreign policy experts said.

"Hanran" has been applied to North Korea for the first time. But Japan and the United States, which favor the sharpest response to North Korea's test, have been "hanran" for years.

"China is disappointed and angry and will be willing to support stronger sanctions," said Jin Canrong, a foreign policy expert at People's University in Beijing. "But I think that is different from saying there will be a drastic change. It is still a question of the right balance."

DOJ_NMG_0077162

The reason there is unlikely to be a major policy change, Mr. Jin and other experts here said, is that North Korea has sharply increased tensions without fundamentally changing China's calculation of its national interests.

Its priorities remain, first and foremost, promoting internal economic development, the key to longevity for the ruling Communist Party. China's cautious, authoritarian leaders concluded long ago that generating high growth in its gross domestic product required a benign relationship with the world's major powers, secure borders and open markets — in a word, stability.

China would like to achieve a denuclearization of the Korean Peninsula but has shown few signs of accepting war or a forced change of government as an acceptable way to achieve that goal.

"The core of the issue is not nuclear weapons," said Shen Dingli, a leading security expert at Fudan University in Shanghai. "The core of the issue is peace and stability. That is still strongly in China's interest."

While China has begun to think like a big power in some respects, its foremost strategic priority has been reclaiming Taiwan, or at least preventing the island from becoming formally independent of mainland China.

Conflict in North Korea or the toppling of Kim Jong Il's government there could upset both of those goals, Chinese analysts say. A war is viewed as the worst outcome, potentially creating a wave of refugees into China and even risking a broader engagement that could threaten the extended period of harmony in Northeast Asia.

Even peaceful change in North Korea could bring a new pro-American government to China's northeastern border as it faces continuing uncertainty over how to handle the pro-American government in Taiwan, off its southeastern coast.

"China must continue to look at North Korea through the prism of Taiwan," Mr. Shen said. "You cannot expect China to abandon its ally completely while America continues to back Taiwan and allow the independence movement to thrive there."

But analysts say it also cannot afford to alienate the United States, and Beijing has recently taken steps to repair its frayed relationship with Japan. Those ties may well depend on moving to punish North Korea for its nuclear test, and at least experimenting to see if firm pressure on North Korea will bring it back to the bargaining table.

China provides, by some estimates, 70 percent of North Korea's fuel and food and could almost certainly create severe economic hardship there by slowing shipments across its long, barren border.

In addition, China has joined the United States in seeking to crack down on North Korean counterfeiting of American dollars and Chinese yuan, as well as on the use of Chinese banks to launder profits from illicit North Korean exports of drugs including amphetamines. Tighter financial sanctions could further deprive North Korea of already scarce hard currency.

The question is how far down that path China can go, to maintain its cooperation with the Bush administration without foreclosing the possibility of luring North Korea back to negotiations.

"China has tried to persuade North Korea that talking with the outside world is in its interest," said Zhang Liangui, an expert on North Korea at the Central Party School, a research organization in Beijing run by the Communist Party. "Now China will have to demonstrate that there is a price to pay for ignoring that advice."

Mr. Zhang said North Korea's announcement amounted to a slap in the face for China. Even if the goal remains a negotiated solution, he said, China must first show that it is prepared to take a much tougher line before North Korea will bargain in earnest.

Susan L. Shirk, a State Department official responsible for East Asia during the Clinton administration, said she believed that the nuclear test could prove to be a turning point for China's approach to the problem. It will, she said, force China to choose between North Korea and a United States-led international consensus rather than split the difference between the two.

She said the timing of North Korea's announcement — the day after President Hu Jintao was visited by Japan's new prime minister, Shinzo Abe, and said they had made progress repairing troubled relations — also underscored the stakes for China's leadership.

"If they do not act strongly they could undo what they have worked to achieve with Japan, while also seriously straining relations with the U.S.," she said. "North Korea has really boxed them in."

Even so, many Chinese analysts still view North Korea as a strategic asset. It may be irresponsible and unruly, but it belongs more to China than to the United States. Sacrificing an ally to help achieve America's goals of stopping the spread of nuclear weapons may require a much stronger consensus within the Chinese elite.

"I do not believe that Chinese leaders are willing to expend major political capital on this issue," Mr. Jin of People's University said. "They would much prefer to follow the consensus. At the moment there is a heated debate, but no consensus of that kind."

U.N. Weighs Sanctions Against N. Korea (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0077163

The world lined up against North Korea on Monday for staging a nuclear test denounced even by key allies. President Bush called it "a threat to international peace and security," and the U.N. Security Council weighed severe sanctions to punish the impoverished communist nation.

There was no talk of military action. But the Security Council quickly condemned North Korea's decision to flout a U.N. appeal to cancel the test after the reclusive regime announced it had set off an underground atomic explosion.

Russia was the only country to say it had "no doubts" over the North Korean claim. The U.S. and other experts said the explosion was smaller than expected and they had yet to confirm it was nuclear.

But the reaction of world governments reflected little doubt that they were treating the announcement as fact.

The 15-nation council urged Pyongyang to return to stalled talks, refrain from further tests and keep its pledge to scrap its clandestine weapons program.

Bush said the North Korean action "constitutes a threat to international peace and security" and requires "an immediate response" from the Security Council, though he stressed the U.S. remained committed to diplomacy.

The United States circulated a draft U.N. resolution late Monday that would condemn North Korea's nuclear test and impose tough sanctions on the reclusive communist nation for Pyongyang's "flagrant disregard" of the Security Council's appeal not to detonate a device.

The draft, obtained by The Associated Press, incorporates proposals circulated by the U.S. earlier in the day to prohibit all trade in military and luxury goods and crack down on illegal financial dealings.

It adds new calls from Japan to ban all countries from allowing any North Korean ships in their ports or any North Korean aircraft from taking off or landing in their territory if they carried arms, nuclear or ballistic missile-related material or luxury goods.

In addition, the Japanese proposals would impose travel restrictions on high-ranking North Korean officials, create a Security Council committee to monitor implementation of the sanctions, and ask the secretary-general "to actively engage in this matter."

The U.S. draft also seeks to prevent any North Korean financial transactions resulting from illicit counterfeiting, money-laundering and narcotics, and "any abuses of the international financial system" that could contribute to the transfer or development of banned weapons.

By comparison, the Security Council cut air links to Libya in 1992 to force Moammar Gadhafi's government to hand over two indicted men for trial in the 1988 bombing of a Pan Am jetliner over Lockerbie, Scotland. After Saddam Hussein's Iraq invaded Kuwait in 1990, the council banned the sale or supply of any commodities or products from either country using their flag vessels.

Japan's U.N. Ambassador Kenzo Oshima, the current council president, said earlier that all council members "emphasized that the response of the council should be strong, swift and very, very clear in its message and its action."

But just how long it will take members to agree on a resolution remains to be seen.

Council experts started discussing the proposals in meetings Monday afternoon and were expected to meet again Tuesday morning.

But it was unclear whether China and Russia — the North's closest allies — would support some of the tough measures, which also include international inspection of all cargo to and from North Korea to limit the proliferation of nuclear, chemical and biological weapons and to ban any material that could be used in the production of weapons of mass destruction.

Before the experts meeting, the ambassadors from the five veto-wielding council nations — the U.S., Britain, France, Russia and China — met with Oshima.

U.S. Ambassador John Bolton told reporters afterward that everybody agreed within 30 minutes that the council should condemn the action and respond quickly, saying "that's remarkable" to have such a unanimous decision.

But he wouldn't speculate when the council might act, noting that Japan and others already had other suggestions for the text.

"The fact is that in our half-hour, full council meeting this morning, there was no one who even came close to defending this test by North Korea," Bolton said.

The United States, France, Britain and Japan want the resolution under Chapter 7 of the U.N. Charter, which deals with threats to international peace, breaches of the peace and acts of aggression. It allows the council to authorize measures ranging from breaking diplomatic ties and imposing economic and military sanctions to taking military action to restore peace.

With U.S. forces strapped by the twin wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, the Bush administration repeatedly has said it has no plans to invade North Korea and discussion of military action was absent on Monday.

Neither Russia nor China would say whether they support a resolution that could pave the way for sanctions.

"I think we have to react firmly," China's U.N. Ambassador Wang Guangya said. "But also I believe that on the other hand the door to solve this issue from a diplomatic point of view is still open."

DOJ_NMG_0077164

Russia's U.N. Ambassador Vitaly Churkin said the North Koreans "will be facing a very serious attitude on the part of the Security Council and the entire international community," but he said the council needs to discuss whether that will include sanctions.

South Korea's nuclear envoy said Tuesday after returning from Beijing that China appeared to have dropped opposition to tough U.N. sanctions.

"China seems to have different position than it had before on a Chapter 7 resolution," Chun Young-woo told The Associated Press

"I think (China) will employ all available means to prevent North Korea from further aggravating the situation and to bring them back into diplomatic efforts," Chun said after returning from a two-day trip and meetings with Chinese officials.

Still, he said Beijing reiterated its commitment to a peaceful diplomatic solution to the issue.

The reported test came one day after the ninth anniversary of reclusive North Korean leader Kim Jong Il's accession to power and a day before the 61st anniversary of the ruling North Korean Workers' Party.

There were no signs of heightened alert by security forces in Pyongyang. People also laid flowers by a statue of Kim Il Sung, the current leader's late father.

The test also coincided with the Security Council vote Monday to nominate South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki-moon to succeed Kofi Annan as the next U.N. secretary-general. The 192-nation General Assembly is expected to approve the recommendation later this month.

Ban said one of his priorities, if approved, would be to work to resolve the North Korean crisis.

North Korea remained defiant. Pak Gil Yon, the North's U.N. ambassador, said the Security Council should congratulate the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, known as the DPRK, instead of passing "useless" resolutions or statements.

"The nuclear test in the DPRK will greatly contribute in increasing the world deterrence of the DPRK" and will contribute "to the maintenance and guarantee of peace and security in the peninsula and the region," he said.

The United States and its allies, and many of North Korea's neighbors, took the exact opposite view.

"This shows why we need actions and not just words about North Korea," Bolton told The Associated Press.

Although North Korea has long claimed it had the capability to produce a bomb, the test would be the first proof that it had done so.

If the test is confirmed, North Korea would join the current members of the nuclear club — the United States, Russia, Britain, France, India, Pakistan and China. Israel is widely believed to have the bomb but has not publicly declared.

Officials worried that a nuclear armed North would dramatically alter the strategic balance of power in the Pacific, and would undermine already fraying global anti-proliferation efforts.

While voicing concerns, Japan's Prime Minister Shinzo Abe, after meeting with the South Korean leader in Seoul, called for a "calm, yet stern response." The situation marked his first major foreign policy test since his recent election.

South Korea said it had put its military on high alert, but it had noticed no unusual activity among North Korea's troops.

Bolton told the Security Council that Washington would consider an attack on Japan or South Korea an attack on the United States, according to U.N. diplomats who spoke on condition of anonymity because the remarks were made at a closed council meeting.

The United States has defense agreements with the two Asian allies and thousands of U.S. troops are stationed in South Korea and Japan.

China said the North "defied the universal opposition of international society and flagrantly conducted the nuclear test" and urged the North to return to six-party nuclear disarmament talks.

Russian President Vladimir Putin told his Cabinet that Moscow "certainly condemns the test conducted by North Korea."

British Prime Minister Tony Blair said the test was a "completely irresponsible act."

Only Iran, which also faces Security Council action over its disputed nuclear program, expressed understanding for North Korea's action.

Iranian state radio blamed the North's reported nuclear test on U.S. pressure, saying the test "was a reaction to America's threats and humiliation."

The North has refused for over a year to attend six-party international talks aimed at persuading it to disarm, demanding instead that the U.S. drop financial sanctions it has imposed to punish Pyongyang alleged counterfeiting and money laundering. It pulled out of the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty in 2003 after U.S. officials accused it of a secret nuclear program, allegedly violating an earlier nuclear pact between Washington and Pyongyang.

Impoverished and isolated, North Korea has built up its military and nuclear programs while relying on foreign aid to feed its 23 million people since its state-run farming system collapsed in the 1990s following decades of mismanagement and the loss of Soviet subsidies.

DOJ_NMG_0077165

South Korea said the nuclear test was conducted at 10:36 a.m. Monday (9:36 p.m. EDT Sunday) in Hwaderi near Kilju city on the northeast coast.

The North's official Korean Central News Agency said the test was successful, with no leak of radiation, and this was "a stirring time when all the people of the country are making a great leap forward in the building of a great prosperous powerful socialist nation."

South Korean officials said Tuesday they believe that North Korea tested a nuclear weapon as it claimed, but that it would take about two weeks to determine if the test was successful.

The North is believed to have enough radioactive material for a half-dozen bombs. It insists its nuclear program is necessary to deter a U.S. invasion.

The North has active missile programs, but it isn't believed to have an atomic bomb design small and light enough to be mounted on a long-range rocket that could strike targets as distant as the United States.

Reports about the size of the explosion were conflicting, ranging from South Korea's geological institute estimating it was the equivalent of 550 tons of TNT to Russia's Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov saying it was the equivalent of 5,000 to 15,000 tons of TNT.

A U.S. government official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the political sensitivity of the situation, said the seismic event could have been a nuclear explosion, but its small size was making it difficult for authorities to pin down.

Global Fury At N Korea Nuclear Test Claim (FT)

By Anna Fifield, David Pilling And Mark Turner

Financial Times, October 10, 2006

The major powers united in their condemnation of North Korea's claim to have tested a nuclear weapon on Monday, but could not reach immediate agreement at an emergency session of the United Nations Security Council on the scope of punitive sanctions proposed by the US.

North Korea described the underground explosion in a northern province bordering China and Russia as an "historic event that brought happiness to our military and people". It said there had been no radioactive leakage.

US and South Korean experts measured the explosion as a earthquake of magnitude 4.2 on the Richter scale. Scientists were poring over seismic and other data but could not confirm a nuclear explosion. However, several said the blast appeared significantly smaller than would have been expected from a plutonium bomb and could have been a dud.

At the UN, the US presented a list of 13 proposed measures that included the authorisation of international inspections of cargo to and from North Korea and the blocking of illicit financing activities, such as counterfeiting.

John Bolton, US ambassador to the UN, said Monday night that Russia and China were not throwing up obstacles and there was no disagreement over the need for a binding "chapter seven" resolution.

Chris Hill, the US envoy to six-party negotiations with North Korea that have been mediated by China but stalled since last November, said: "We are not going to accept that North Korea with its starving population is going to join the nuclear club."

The US and its allies would ensure that Kim Jong-il, North Korea's leader, "rued the day" and would be made to pay, Mr Hill said. He refused to say what measures the US would take, admitting that China would be a "key country" in the outcome.

Hu Jintao, China's president, took a measured approach in his telephone conversation with George W. Bush, the US president. Mr Hu said no actions should be taken that would lead to escalation or loss of control of the situation and urged caution, dialogue and negotiation.

Delivering a brief televised statement from the White House, Mr Bush said he had spoken to the leaders of China, Russia, South Korea and Japan and that they agreed that North Korea's actions were "unacceptable and deserve an immediate response by the United Nations Security Council".

Mr Bush accused North Korea of having already provided missile technology to Iran and Syria.

Shinzo Abe, Japan's new prime minister said the development constituted a "serious threat [that] would transform in a major way the security environment of north east Asia."

Roh Moo-hyun, South Korea's president, said his government was "losing its momentum" for continued dialogue with North Korea.

North Korea Condemned For Nuclear Testing (MCT)

By Tim Johnson

McClatchy Newspapers, October 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0077166

BEIJING - Condemnation poured in from throughout the world Monday over North Korea's report that it has tested a nuclear weapon as financial markets wobbled in East Asia.

The United States and Japan pledged "decisive action" against Pyongyang at the U.N. Security Council.

In open defiance of the U.N. Security Council, which warned it on Friday not to test, North Korea said it conducted "a safe and successful underground nuclear test" which "caused absolutely no radiation" leakage. It called the test a "great leap forward" in its defensive capabilities.

If true, the test would leave East Asia on the cusp of an arms race. North Korea previously declared it had nuclear weapons, but had never tested one to prove it.

The Security Council condemned the test. The U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, John Bolton, said the United States would push for tougher measures to prevent North Korea from producing or exporting weapons of mass destruction or missiles.

U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan said: "This action violates international norms of disarmament and non-proliferation, as well as the current international moratorium on nuclear testing. It aggravates regional tensions in and around the Korean Peninsula, and jeopardizes security both in the region and beyond."

South Korea called the test an "intolerable provocative act" and put its military on heightened alert. Its chief spy agency said another nuclear blast might be in the offing.

South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun's government suspended a shipment of emergency relief aid to North Korea and said the national security council was reviewing a "sunshine policy" that appeased North Korea with huge investment.

The projects under review include the Kaesong joint industrial zone and a tourism business at Mount Geumgang in the North, which draws hordes of cash-paying South Koreans.

Any freeze on those projects would be a blow to the cash-strapped North.

President Bush spent 15 minutes on the telephone with Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe as Abe prepared to leave Seoul at the end of a two-day fence-mending trip to China and South Korea. The two vowed "decisive action," Japan's Kyodo news agency said.

At a news conference in Seoul, Abe called for "very strong measures" against North Korea and warned that the region may "be entering a new, dangerous nuclear age."

Experts around the world differed on the size of the nuclear blast, which reportedly occurred in an underground shaft near Kilju, a town near North Korea's northeastern coast not far from the border with China.

South Korea's semi-official Yonhap news agency said the blast triggered a tremor with a 3.58 to 3.7 magnitude, similar to what a nuclear explosion would cause.

It said the power of the explosion was equivalent to around 550 tons of TNT explosives, less than a twentieth of the size of the U.S. atomic bomb dropped on the Japanese city of Hiroshima during World War II. But Russian Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov said it was far more powerful, in the range of 5 to 15 kilotons.

China, Russia, Australia, Britain and a number of other countries condemned the nuclear test, calling on North Korea to return to six-nation disarmament talks.

China, which maintains a lifeline of oil supplies to North Korea, appeared stunned, describing the test as "brazen." "The Chinese government is firmly opposed to this," a government statement said.

British Prime Minister Tony Blair labeled it a "completely irresponsible act."

"This is a desperate act of a criminal regime," House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert said in Washington. "We are neither threatened nor impressed, but resolved to restore stability to the Pacific Rim."

But a policy expert in Seoul said he doubted that the world could coax North Korea's nuclear genie back in the bottle. "In the medium and long term, I think we have to learn to live with a nuclearized North Korea," said Moon Chung-in, a professor at Seoul's Yonsei University.

A Chinese scholar said North Korea believes it can get away with nuclear development, just as India and Pakistan did a decade ago, and weather tough sanctions.

"The North Korean leader believes that by testing a nuclear weapon, he will get a more favorable environment where he can survive," said Jin Linbo of the China Institute of International Studies, a Beijing think tank.

Despite its traditional support for North Korea, China may not oppose putting teeth in a new resolution, a security expert in Beijing said.

"If North Korea still refuses to back off from its nuclear ambitions, it is possible that China will agree with military sanctions. As China's ambassador to the U.N., Wang Guangya, said, no one can protect North Korea if it continues to develop nuclear weapons," said Zhang Liangui, a foreign affairs expert at China's ruling party Central Party School.

The nuclear test jolted financial markets. The Japanese yen skidded to an eight-month low against the dollar. Stocks in Seoul slumped 2.6 percent, and shares slid in Hong Kong, Singapore and Sydney. Markets in Japan were closed for a holiday.

DOJ_NMG_0077167

Ruled by Kim Jong Il, one of the world's last totalitarian leaders, North Korea said only last week that it would test a nuclear weapon. Pyongyang announced in February 2005 that it had succeeded in making a nuclear bomb. Foreign intelligence officials say North Korea may have at least six to eight nuclear bombs now.

A nuclear test, if confirmed, would generate pressure within the United States and from Japan to take military action to curb North Korea's military program.

North Korea has said it is building nuclear weapons to forestall a military attack by the United States to topple the Kim regime, which President Bush once described as part of an axis of evil.

News of the alleged test gave added urgency to Abe's visit to Seoul. Earlier Monday, Abe concluded a one-day summit with China's three top leaders that put a thaw in chilly relations between China and Japan, regional rivals. It was the first summit of its kind since 2001.

Abe, who has been in office for less than two weeks and is a staunch conservative, was given red carpet treatment in Beijing, in an apparent snub to North Korea. China and Japan capped the summit with a statement that they had reached "a turning point" in their tense relations.

Abe, who at 52 is Japan's first leader born after the war, used frank language about his nation's wartime role, saying that Japan's "deep remorse" had not ebbed.

"I said we shall look at past history squarely," Abe said, adding that Japan knew it "had caused tremendous damage and suffering to the people of countries, especially Asian countries, and left scars among those people."

Tough Talk From Seoul, If Little Will For A Fight (NYT)

By Norimitsu Onishi

The New York Times, October 10, 2006

SEOUL, South Korea, Tuesday, Oct. 10 — South Korea warned on Monday that it would “sternly deal” with North Korea’s announcement that it conducted a nuclear test, saying that the action could lead to a “nuclear arms buildup” in the region.

President Roh Moo-hyun said that South Korea would coordinate its response with other countries, though he did not give details and suggested that he was not ready to give up yet on his country’s “sunshine policy” of engaging North Korea.

“This is a grave threat to peace, not only on the Korean Peninsula but in the region,” said Mr. Roh, whose government has been accused by critics both in and outside South Korea of coddling North Korea.

Mr. Roh said that South Korea “has lost ground in arguing for dialogue” against calls for stronger punitive measures, including economic sanctions, against North Korea.

The government’s response to the nuclear test was firmer and quicker than its reaction to North Korea’s missile launches in early July, when Mr. Roh remained silent for days and avoided harsh criticism.

Still, there was some ambiguity in his remarks, and experts in South Korea remained divided Monday over whether a nuclear test would simply re-emphasize the hard reality that the policy of engagement is the lesser of evils in dealing with its unpredictable and irascible neighbor.

The two Koreas were fierce cold war enemies until the late 1990’s. But the “sunshine policy” under Mr. Roh and his predecessor, Kim Dae-jung, has transformed South Korean attitudes. Increasingly, North Koreans have been viewed here as misunderstood cousins who must be prodded into behaving, and a national consensus has emerged that pits South Korea against the Bush administration, which has sought to isolate and confront North Korea.

“There is a general consensus in South Korea, not only among politicians but also in the general population, that engagement is the right policy,” said Han Sung Joo, a former ambassador to the United States. “But it doesn’t mean we have to rationalize this nuclear test.”

Mr. Han said that in the near future, South Korea’s assistance to the North would probably have to be limited to humanitarian aid. He said that plans to expand major projects to help North Korea develop its economy would probably be put on hold.

Analysts said that North Korea’s action would weaken Mr. Roh and the governing Uri Party, but that the damage would not decisively help the opposition Grand National Party.

“When you look at the opposition’s policies toward North Korea, you see that they are 95 percent in agreement with the ruling party’s,” said Choi Kang, a security expert at the Institute of Foreign Affairs and National Security in Seoul. “Both emphasize the need to push the North to democratize, to reform internally, by engaging it. What differs is the means. The opposition emphasizes the need for reciprocity — it shouldn’t be unconditional.”

“It’s too premature to say this is the end of the engagement policy,” Mr. Choi said.

South Korea’s priorities remain peace and stability on the peninsula, so few South Koreans favor confronting North Korea and possibly causing a military conflict or its collapse. The United States, in contrast, is concerned about nuclear proliferation.

DOJ_NMG_0077168

"Does South Korea share these concerns?" said Andrei Lankov, a Russian expert on North Korea at Kookmin University in Seoul. "No. If some crazy regime in Central America goes nuclear, or if terrorist groups or rogue states obtain nuclear arms, South Korea will never become a target.

"In the short term, South Korea will have to show solidarity with the international community and freeze exchanges with the North," he added. "But then they will start looking for a pretext to resume exchanges."

Others contend that the American unwillingness to negotiate directly with North Korea, as the North has sought, is to blame for the failure to soften North Korea's stance.

"That's why hard-liners in the North Korean government have gained a stronger voice," said Han Hong Koo, a historian at Sungkonghoe University in Seoul.

"There will be great pressure on the South Korean government to abandon its engagement policy," he added. But, "North Korea is already suffering from economic sanctions and is already isolated. There's no other card."

Japan Now Seems Likely To Rally Behind New Prime Minister's Call For A Stronger Military (NYT)

By Martin Fackler, International Herald Tribune

The New York Times, October 10, 2006

TOKYO, Oct. 9 — The last time North Korea tested a powerful new weapon, in 1998 when it fired a ballistic missile over the largest Japanese island, Japan reacted by upgrading its military and swinging politically to the right.

North Korea's claim that it tested a nuclear weapon on Monday appears likely to push Japan even further down the same nationalist path. Many political analysts say the test, which has yet to be confirmed, could weaken public support for the pacifism Japan adopted after World War II and prompt it to seek a growing regional security role.

But could the crisis be big enough to force Japan to break what might be its ultimate postwar taboo and go nuclear itself?

This is what some in East Asia have speculated it would do if the isolated and erratic Communist government to its north suddenly conducted an atomic bomb test. But for now, analysts say, domestic opposition runs too deep for Japan to reverse its renunciation of nuclear weapons.

"The nuclear test may prove to be an even bigger shock to public opinion" than the 1998 missile, said Yasunori Sone, a professor of political and policy analysis at Keio University in Tokyo. "It will get a minority of people here calling for Japan to build nuclear weapons."

The most likely result of North Korea's actions, analysts say, would be to rally public opinion around Japan's new prime minister, Shinzo Abe, and his calls for taking Japan in a more assertive direction. The crisis may also increase Mr. Abe's chances of revising the Constitution to allow Japan to possess full-fledged armed forces.

There have been no calls yet here to build atomic weapons. Still, that is not a far-fetched notion. Japan is known to have stockpiles of weapons-grade atomic material, used in its civilian nuclear power and research programs, and some studies have said it would be able to construct a bomb in a matter of months.

But Mr. Sone and other analysts say that despite North Korea's claim of a weapons test, Japanese proponents of acquiring nuclear weapons will remain a minority on the far-right fringe. Analysts say going nuclear would face broad and emotional opposition in Japan, which remains the only nation to have suffered atomic bomb attacks.

The prospect of a nuclear Japan might also send shudders through the rest of Asia, where memories of Japan's wartime aggression are still raw. Some fear it could even set off a new Asian arms race.

Mr. Abe appeared to be trying to take a leading role in responding to the crisis, analysts here said. He and other Japanese leaders were quick to condemn the reported test, saying Japan was working closely with the United States, its closest ally, and Asian neighbors like South Korea and China to find a response.

Speaking in Seoul, where he was meeting with President Roh Moo-hyun, Mr. Abe criticized the test as a "serious threat to the security of Japan and South Korea, and of neighboring countries."

"We have agreed that we must respond resolutely," Mr. Abe said in a news conference after the meeting. "We have entered a new and more dangerous era."

He also said Japan was considering imposing economic sanctions against North Korea and increasing its participation in a missile defense shield that it is developing with the United States. He said Japan had requested an immediate meeting of the United Nations Security Council.

In Tokyo, Yasuhisa Shiozaki, the chief cabinet secretary and top government spokesman, said Japan would try to work with the United States to seek United Nations action, possibly including global economic sanctions. "We will lodge a stern protest and condemn" the test, he said.

If North Korea has exploded a nuclear device, analysts said the effects on Japanese public opinion might take time to appear. When North Korea test-fired a multistage Taepodong missile over Japan in 1998, Japan's initial reaction was muted, but public opinion ended up moving sharply in favor of building a stronger defense.

That allowed Japan to begin adding weapons that once would have been unthinkable, including Japan's first spy satellite, a troop transport ship now under construction that experts say could serve as a small aircraft carrier, and aerial tankers that would allow Japanese fighter jets to refuel in midair to reach North Korea and other countries.

For now, analysts said most of Japan's action was likely to come on the diplomatic front. They also said the crisis offered an unexpected chance for Japan to patch up its ties with South Korea and China.

"This crisis allows Mr. Abe to say that all three countries face a shared enemy," Mr. Sone of Keio University said. "This is a chance for him to improve relations with Asia."

U.S. Doubts Korean Test Was Nuclear (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, October 10, 2006

U.S. intelligence agencies say, based on preliminary indications, that North Korea did not produce its first nuclear blast yesterday.

U.S. officials, speaking on the condition of anonymity, said that seismic readings show that the conventional high explosives used to create a chain reaction in a plutonium-based device went off, but that the blast's readings were shy of a typical nuclear detonation.

"We're still evaluating the data, and as more data comes in, we hope to develop a clearer picture," said one official familiar with intelligence reports.

"There was a seismic event that registered about 4 on the Richter scale, but it still isn't clear if it was a nuclear test. You can get that kind of seismic reading from high explosives."

The underground explosion, which Pyongyang dubbed a historic nuclear test, is thought to have been the equivalent of several hundred tons of TNT, far short of the several thousand tons of TNT, or kilotons, that are signs of a nuclear blast, the official said.

The official said that so far, "it appears there was more fizz than pop."

A successful nuclear detonation requires a properly timed and triggered conventional blast that splits atoms, setting off the nuclear chain reaction that produces the massive explosions associated with atomic bombs.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said assessing the validity of North Korea's claim of a successful nuclear test could take several days.

"We need to find out precisely what it is that took place yesterday, and that is something that's going to take awhile for the scientists and others to work through," Mr. Snow said.

"Nobody could give me with any precision how long it will take until they can say with certainty what happened."

Nuclear bombs make big waves, with clear signatures that make them fairly easy to detect, analyze and confirm that they were caused by splitting atoms. But smaller blasts -- as North Korea's appears to have been -- are trickier to break down, scientists told the Associated Press.

"It takes days, dozens of lab hours, to evaluate results. Now we can have only a rough estimate," said Russian nuclear physicist Vladimir Orlov of the Moscow-based Center for Policy Studies in Russia, a nonproliferation think tank.

Elements of the blast were detected by U.S. and allied sensors as it was set off in an underground tunnel in the north-central part of North Korea. U.S. intelligence agencies have been monitoring several tunnels thought to be nuclear test facilities and have not ruled out Pyongyang's conducting another test.

U.S. officials said the test was timed to coincide with several anniversaries in North Korea, including the end of mourning for the death of North Korean leader Kim Jong-il's father, Kim Il-sung. The test was thought to have been linked to the commemoration.

North Korea's military thinks that joining the world's seven other acknowledged nuclear powers is key to preserving the power of the communist regime.

There were wide variations in seismic data of the North Korean blast. The French atomic agency estimated about 1 kiloton, and South Korea's geological institute said half of that. But Russia's defense minister expressed "no doubt" that North Korea detonated a nuclear test and said the force of the underground blast was equivalent to 5,000 to 15,000 tons of TNT.

"People have different ways of cross-cutting the data and interpreting them," said Lassina Zerbo, director of the International Data Center at the nuclear-test-ban preparatory commission, which is based in Vienna, Austria.

The Bush administration is pushing for the United Nations to adopt economic sanctions against North Korea that would include a blockade of all goods moving into and out of the country.

Key to the imposition of the tough sanctions will be support from China and Russia, two states that in the past opposed sanctions.

The most immediate impact of the underground test is that U.S. officials fear Japan will take steps to develop nuclear weapons as a deterrent.

Official North Korean press for the past several years has been asserting that the United States is planning a pre-emptive nuclear attack on North Korea over its secret uranium-enrichment program.

Intelligence reports from several years ago indicated that North Korea was engaged in a covert program to develop a uranium-based nuclear program with the help of Pakistani nuclear scientist Abdul Qadeer Khan. The Khan network supplied centrifuges and nuclear-weapons design techniques to Libya, Iran and North Korea.

What U.S. officials have been unable to confirm is whether North Korea received small warhead design information from the Khan network.

Chinese-language documents on how to build a nuclear warhead for missiles were found in Libya and were supplied by Khan network associates. U.S. intelligence officials think Iran and North Korea received similar warhead design documents.

North Korea in July conducted flight tests of seven missiles including a long-range Taepodong-2.

U.S. officials think the plutonium for the pit of the North Korean device was produced by the reactor at Yongbyon, the regime's declared nuclear facility.

U.S. intelligence agencies estimate that North Korea has some 88 pounds of plutonium and that about 13 pounds were used in the recent test.

The remaining plutonium is enough for North Korea to make about six bombs.

Device Produced A Small Yield, Maybe Due To Flaw (LAT)

By Greg Miller And Karen Kaplan

The Los Angeles Times, October 10, 2006

WASHINGTON — Shock waves emanating from North Korea on Monday probably came from the explosion of a nuclear device, but one that did not achieve its full potential because of a failure or a design flaw, U.S. intelligence officials and weapons experts said.

Analysts believe the explosion produced about 3% of the power of the bombs dropped on Hiroshima and Nagasaki more than 60 years ago, raising questions about whether a bigger device malfunctioned, or the regime in Pyongyang was testing only a component of a larger weapon.

The combination of the low strength of the explosion and the failure in July of a missile test over the Sea of Japan is likely to reinforce intelligence assessments that North Korea remains years away from developing a nuclear warhead that could be fitted to a missile and delivered any significant distance, let alone to the shores of the United States.

Still, officials said Monday's test demonstrated that North Korea had crossed a dangerous technological threshold, and they added that the blast served as an experiment from which Pyongyang could garner valuable information it could use to improve its nuclear designs.

"Often you learn as much from a failure as you do a success," said Anthony Cordesman, a former Defense Department official and a military expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies. "If you have a test, even if it is only partly successful, you've proven not only you can do it but that you're on the way to developing more sophisticated systems."

Cordesman and others said it could be days before U.S. intelligence agencies and independent scientists are able to reach firm conclusions as to the nature of the test. Experts will analyze the seismic signature of the explosion, and attempt to collect atmospheric samples by "sniffer" spy planes.

Estimates of the force of the explosion were based on comparisons of seismic readings taken from monitoring stations in nations surrounding North Korea with seismic measures of past nuclear explosions.

The characteristics of the "seismic pulse" have usually enabled officials to rule out earthquakes or natural phenomena. But officials said the relatively small size of Monday's blast might make it difficult to use seismic data to determine whether the explosion was caused by a nuclear device or conventional explosives. Analysts haven't ruled out that the seismic shock could have been caused by conventional explosives, but a consensus seemed to be forming Monday that a nuclear device had been detonated.

American and foreign intelligence agencies are expected to focus on detecting and measuring telltale radioactive particles in atmospheric samples collected by planes and unmanned aerial vehicles routinely patrolling the coastline of the Korean peninsula.

DOJ_NMG_0077171

The Vienna-based Comprehensive Nuclear Test Ban Treaty Organization, which monitors the globe for possible nuclear activity, said it probably would take about 72 hours to gather all the information necessary to judge whether the seismic event in North Korea was a nuclear explosion.

North Korea claimed that it had completely contained the radioactive fallout from the explosion. But experts were skeptical, saying it would require a level of technical sophistication North Korea was unlikely to possess to prevent the release of any contamination into the atmosphere.

"Sooner or later something escapes," said Daniela Rozgonova, a spokeswoman for the test ban group. "Then we will know for sure."

The test was underground and probably carried out in a horizontal tunnel under a mountain, said David Albright, a former weapons inspector who now directs the Institute for Science and International Security. Unlike vertical tests, which leave a massive crater, he said, horizontal tests leave little external trace.

Experts said that using conventional explosives to create a blast of the magnitude recorded Monday — equivalent to about half a kiloton of TNT — would be difficult to accomplish.

"A kiloton would be 2 million pounds of TNT," said Arthur Lerner-Lam, associate director for seismology and geology at Lamont-Doherty Earth Observatory at Columbia University. "It takes a lot of technology to get all of that to go off at once."

As a result, officials and experts focused on other, more plausible, explanations for the small yield.

Officials said North Korea could have detonated a small device in order to conserve fissile material. American intelligence agencies believe North Korea probably has enough plutonium for about eight nuclear weapons — other estimates suggest it could build between four and 13 weapons — and does not possess any enriched uranium.

Pyongyang also may have been testing a component of a larger system, but experts said such a step would be highly unusual because of its limited experimental value.

As a result, a consensus seemed to be emerging among analysts and experts that North Korea conducted a test of a full-scale device, but one that failed to compress the plutonium fuel at rates capable of producing maximum yield.

"The lower yield could be because of bad luck or bad design," said Michael Levi, a nuclear weapons expert at the Council on Foreign Relations.

"The fizzle of a 15- to 20-kiloton weapon would be about a kiloton or two," added Owen Cote, associate director of the security studies program at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

American intelligence agencies have struggled to collect meaningful data on North Korea's nuclear program, and have scant information on Pyongyang's ability to make a warhead small enough to mount on a medium- or long-range missile. North Korea's test in July of a long-range missile ended in failure.

Pakistan's nuclear bomb, built on a Chinese design, can be put atop a ballistic missile, but it is not clear whether these design details were passed on to the North Koreans as part of the proliferation network operated by Pakistani scientist Abdul Qadeer Khan.

Monday's test may not provide any answers because the weight of a nuclear weapon — as opposed to its yield — would not necessarily be detectible from an underground test.

"You could test a device as big as a house," said Gary Samore, who handled nuclear proliferation issues on the Clinton administration's National Security Council. "There is no way to verify that from the seismic activity we'll get."

Low Yield Of Blast Surprises Analysts (WP)

By Dafna Linzer, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 10, 2006

The explosion set off by North Korea yesterday appears to have been extremely small for a nuclear blast, complicating U.S. intelligence efforts to determine whether the country's first such test was successful or signaled that Pyongyang's capabilities are less advanced than expected, several senior U.S. and foreign government officials and analysts said.

A variety of seismic readings around the world yesterday appear to have resulted from no more than a half-kiloton explosion, three officials said -- equivalent to 500 tons of TNT and far smaller than the 21- to 23-kiloton plutonium bomb the U.S. military dropped on Nagasaki, Japan, in August 1945.

A senior intelligence official called it a "sub-kiloton" explosion detonated inside a horizontal mountain tunnel and said its low yield caught analysts by surprise. "For an initial test, a yield of several kilotons has been historically observed," the official said.

A U.S. government official said the North Koreans, in a call to the Chinese shortly before the test was conducted, said it would be four kilotons. The official said it is possible the explosive yield was as low as 200 tons. France and South Korea both issued sub-kiloton estimates, and officials dismissed as inaccurate an early Russian estimate that the blast resulted from a five-to-15-kiloton explosion.

President Bush said early yesterday that U.S. experts were "working to confirm North Korea's claim." By the end of the day, intelligence officials were still piecing together data and waiting to review intercepted communications that might shed light on what exactly the North Koreans set out to accomplish in the test and how it was conducted.

If confirmed, North Korea's ascension into a growing nuclear club -- joining the United States, Britain, France, Russia, China, India and Pakistan -- would likely have a major impact on efforts to halt the spread of nuclear weapons. (Israel is widely believed to have nuclear weapons, although it apparently has never conducted a test.) It is the only country to walk away from the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty and then violate its central tenet -- a commitment to refrain from building nuclear weapons.

Intelligence and administration officials said yesterday they believed North Korea had managed a nuclear test of some sort, but because of the secrecy of the Pyongyang regime and the lack of scientific data, some observers would not eliminate the possibility that the blast was created by conventional explosives.

The relatively small size of the explosion, along with North Korea's public statement that the test did not produce any radioactive leakage, led some to question how well the test had gone. Small amounts of leakage are normal during nuclear tests, though it can take several days for the ventilation to register. One U.S. official said radiation detectors in the region were being monitored for any signs in the air from the nuclear test.

One analyst, who was not authorized to speak publicly about the topic, said North Korea's statement on leakage may have been political, rather than technical: "It could be their way of showing that they are a member of the nuclear club, as advanced, responsible and capable as other states." Another said the statement may have been intended to lessen environmental concerns in neighboring countries.

Intelligence officials were looking at four possibilities to explain the size of the blast, the most likely of which appeared to be that only a fraction of the device's core exploded. If that were the case, the test would still be considered successful, officials said, because some plutonium was exploded. But it may also lead the North Koreans to conduct additional tests to determine what went wrong.

It is also possible, two analysts said, that Pyongyang used less plutonium because it has less stockpiled than U.S. intelligence believed. Considered more unlikely by experts were theories that the North Koreans had succeeded in manufacturing a smaller, more sophisticated nuclear device or that engineers had set out to test the device's design rather than its yield.

"A low yield can be a failure in design or it can be bad luck," said Michael A. Levi, a nuclear expert at the Council on Foreign Relations. "Anything is possible," he said, including simulating a low-yield nuclear explosion by using large quantities of TNT, as the U.S. military had planned to do last summer.

"But you don't hear anyone who thinks it's a conventional [explosives] test," he said.

One senior government nuclear specialist said it is hard to discern a nuclear detonation from a conventional one just by looking at seismic data. "Explosions are explosions," the analyst said. "They push equally out in all directions and that's what you see at a distant seismic station; you just see the explosion force and you can't tell."

To discriminate between the two, intelligence experts also rely on a string of gas and radiation detectors.

The Bush administration had been expecting a nuclear test for months and was briefly relieved after a set of North Korean ballistic missile tests failed in July. Intelligence analysts in the U.S. government think Pyongyang is still years away from being able to marry a nuclear device to an advanced delivery system.

"I don't think we perceive a great threat that North Korea will attack anyone with nuclear weapons," said Robert J. Einhorn, who was assistant secretary of state for nonproliferation until 2001. "One of the main threats is that in desperation, it might sell its nuclear assets. Another danger is that eventually the government might collapse into chaos, and then we won't know who is in control of those assets."

Bomb Fallout Explosion By North Koreans Imperils Nuclear-Control Effort (WSJ)

By Evan Ramstad , Jay Solomon And Gordon Fairclough

The Wall Street Journal, October 10, 2006

U.S. Pushes U.N. Sanctions, Including Military Steps; China to Play Critical Role Blast Smaller Than Expected

North Korea's claim that it successfully exploded a nuclear device signals a major failure of U.S. and Chinese diplomacy and threatens to unravel the international treaty system that has worked to contain the spread of nuclear bombs for nearly 40 years.

The blast, which took place near the northeastern town of Kilju, was apparently small by nuclear standards, suggesting the test may not have been entirely successful, or may have been made with conventional explosives. South Korean geologists estimate the explosion had less than 4% of the force of the atomic bomb dropped by U.S. pilots over Hiroshima 61 years ago.

Although the U.S. and its allies already suspected that North Korea had produced a small number of nuclear weapons, a publicly announced test is frightening because it represents such a brazen flouting of the system for controlling the spread of nuclear arms. North Korea's action might encourage other states -- Iran, Japan, Taiwan, or even Saudi Arabia and Egypt -- to go nuclear.

"The biggest threat is not North Korean missiles hitting Hollywood," said Robert Alvarez, a former U.S. Energy Department adviser who worked on shutting down North Korea's nuclear program in the 1990s. "The real risk is the unraveling of the nonproliferation regime. That is not something we should take lightly."

U.S. diplomats are hoping to turn the announcement into a plus for American policy by bringing together nations that have previously hesitated to take a hard line on North Korea -- in particular China and South Korea. U.S. officials want the United Nations to back measures that would effectively cut off North Korea's interaction with the global financial system and its ability to import or export materials for weapons of mass destruction. Washington wants to ratchet up the pressure by having the U.N. authorize military force to back up sanctions. That could include a threat to inspect any vessel leaving or entering North Korea.

While the U.N. Security Council unanimously condemned the reported North Korean nuclear test, it is unclear whether the Security Council is ready to endorse the U.S. ideas -- which are precariously close to declaring war on North Korea. Until now, South Korea and China, which provide much of North Korea's food and energy, have favored negotiations over sanctions. Some Bush administration officials would like to see economic pressures topple the North Korean regime, but that is what China and South Korea -- which share borders with the country -- fear most.

Japan, which has taken the lead in calling for sanctions against North Korea, may now push harder to strengthen its military. "The test opens Pandora's box in Northeast Asia," said Han Seung Soo, a former South Korean ambassador to the U.S. and U.N. and former president of the U.N. General Assembly. "The strategic position of every country just took a dramatic change for the worse."

Another concern is that North Korea, a big exporter of missiles to Iran, Syria and Pakistan, could also sell nuclear weapons to other countries, or use its smuggling networks to provide weapons technologies to al Qaeda and other terrorist groups.

North Korea is the first state to withdraw from the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty and then follow up by declaring itself a nuclear power and claiming to test a weapon. Security Council members are also pressing Iran to halt sensitive nuclear activities that could produce fuel for nuclear weapons and were set to discuss possible actions against Tehran this week.

China's position on sanctions will be critical. Beijing fears losing a buffer zone against U.S. troops in South Korea and wants to avoid a North Korean collapse, which could send millions of impoverished refugees fleeing into China. The tradition of close ties between China and North Korea dates to the 1950-53 Korean War when China fought on North Korea's side against U.S.-led U.N. forces.

China's Foreign Ministry condemned the North Korean test but also called for a "peaceful resolution through consultation and dialogue" and said the response should be "cool-headed."

Some Chinese analysts said Beijing may be ready to take a tougher line against Pyongyang in the wake of the failure of six-party talks spearheaded by Beijing. The talks bringing together the two Koreas, the U.S., China, Japan and Russia have been held off and on since 2003.

"Chinese leaders have lost all hope in North Korea," said Chu Shulong, a professor at Tsinghua University in Beijing. "The soft approach didn't work, so they have to take a harder stance." Mr. Chu said China may back U.N. sanctions and could cut off its exports of oil, electricity and fertilizer to North Korea, although it would probably continue sending food and medicine on humanitarian grounds. In July, China voted in favor of limited sanctions after North Korea test-fired a long-range missile and six military rockets into the waters between the Korean peninsula and Japan.

China had set itself up as a mediator to work for a nuclear-free Korean peninsula, reflecting its ambitions in global diplomacy. Chinese leaders took great pride in the six-party talks, which were hosted in Beijing, the only place where North Korean negotiators felt comfortable.

Mei Renyi, director of the U.S. Studies Center of Beijing Foreign Studies University, said North Korea's announcement puts China in a difficult spot because it took a "leadership position" in the talks. "For a long time, all the countries in the Asia-Pacific region tolerated North Korea's nuclear threat, but its nuclear test today puts it in total isolation," he said.

For the Bush administration, the claim of a nuclear test represents a failure for its goal of blocking the spread of weapons of mass destruction. For more than five years, the Bush administration has been split internally over how to handle North Korea. Betraying that lack of consensus, it has engaged in off-and-on multilateral negotiations with Pyongyang while pursuing limited pressure tactics aimed at discomfiting the regime there. The approach delivered neither a diplomatic breakthrough nor a breakdown of the regime of North Korean leader Kim Jong Il, as advocated by U.S. hard-liners.

John Bolton, ambassador to the U.N.,15 discusses the U.N. Security Council's immediate response to North Korea's actions.

The North Korean announcement likely has more symbolic than military value. North Korea already possesses a strong deterrent against military attacks through its arsenal of rockets and missiles aimed at the South Korean capital of Seoul, a city of 10 million just 30 miles from the Korean border.

Global markets yesterday largely ignored North Korea's announcement. U.S. and Japanese stocks were virtually unchanged, although South Korea's benchmark stock-market index closed down 2.4%.

North Korea's test device exploded with a force of 550 tons of TNT, according to an estimate by South Korean geologists. That is 200 times the size of the truck bomb that destroyed the federal building in Oklahoma City in 1995. Even if it is proved that North Korea tested a nuclear device and not conventional explosives, analysts say North Korea still probably has some more work to create a functioning nuclear weapon.

U.S. officials said they are trying to ascertain what was tested. The blast "was far smaller than most people would have predicted," a U.S. official said yesterday. Nonetheless, he said, "we have to take what the North Koreans say at face value."

During a midday television news program broadcast in North Korea yesterday, an anchorwoman read the official announcement with a smile. "The nuclear test was conducted with indigenous wisdom and technology, 100%," she declared.

North Korea's weakening economic position may have driven its decision to go ahead with the test. It is chronically short of food. Washington has also tried to limit North Korea's ability to use the international banking system. Mr. Kim may have concluded that a nuclear test will give North Korea the bargaining chip it needs to loosen the straitjacket tightening around it. It is the logic of an extortionist, but it has served North Korea well in the past.

"The tests are clearly in response to the financial sanctions and their comprehensive nature," said Selig Harrison, a Washington-based academic who met with senior North Korean officials in Pyongyang last month. "They see sanctions as moves toward forcing regime change." International aid organizations note that North Korea's food production has been reduced this year by extensive flooding that hit districts around Pyongyang.

Members of the World Food Program, the U.N. food aid agency, say they are seriously constrained in their ability to meet the food needs of more than six million vulnerable North Koreans. The WFP could largely run out of funds for North Korea early next year without more donations from member countries. The U.S. and Japan virtually stopped food aid in 2003, although South Korea and China have been providing significant assistance. "The public distribution system is under extraordinary stress," John Powell, a WFP deputy executive director, said in an interview late last month.

For years, North Korean leaders have believed their future hinges on reaching some type of accommodation with the U.S. After South Korea's economic and military strength surpassed the North's in the late 1970s, the North's longtime leader, Kim Il Sung, decided the country needed nuclear-weapons capability. He chose the small city of Yongbyon, 60 miles north of Pyongyang, for a nuclear-power plant in 1980.

North Korea signed the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty in 1985 but pulled out in 1993 as suspicions grew that the Yongbyon plant was part of a weapons program. The next year, North Korea agreed with the U.S. to close the Yongbyon reactor and store its spent fuel. In return, the U.S. promised to help build two nuclear reactors and move toward normalizing relations with the North. In October 2000, then-Secretary of State Madeleine Albright visited Pyongyang and met with Mr. Kim, raising hopes for a further thaw.

Mr. Bush, however, has a deep personal dislike for Mr. Kim and his government, aides say. At a summit meeting last year, he lectured South Korean President Roh Moo Hyun over Seoul's willingness to engage with Pyongyang despite human-rights abuses in the North, diplomats say.

In his 2002 State of the Union address, Mr. Bush branded North Korea as part of an "axis of evil" along with Iraq and Iran. Relations rapidly soured as North Korea lifted the freeze on its nuclear program, reopened Yongbyon and reprocessed its spent fuel.

That was the latest threat to the international community's effort to contain the spread of nuclear weapons. The principal vehicle has been the nonproliferation treaty, which was concluded in 1968. While allowing five nations -- the U.S., Britain, France, Russia and China -- to have nuclear weapons, the treaty requires all other signatories to forswear them. Under the treaty, nations such as South Africa and Belarus have unilaterally dismantled their weapons programs.

In recent years nonsignatory countries, including Pakistan, India and Israel, have developed weapons systems independently, weakening the treaty. Meanwhile Iran has challenged the treaty's efficacy by carrying out a nuclear program that it says is for peaceful purposes but that Western nations believe is aimed at producing a weapon. A separate agreement, the Comprehensive Nuclear Test Ban Treaty, forbids nuclear tests but the U.S. hasn't signed it.

In September 2005, the six-party talks on North Korea produced a tentative agreement for the North to abandon its nuclear-weapons pursuit in exchange for economic and energy assistance from the five countries. At nearly the same time, the U.S. threatened penalties against a bank in Macau, China, suspected of helping the North engage in money laundering. About $24 million in North Korean money has been frozen in the bank while local authorities investigate, and U.S. officials believe some of the money may be Kim Jong Il's own.

North Korea then abandoned the September agreement and pulled out of the six-party talks. It insisted instead on two-way negotiations with the U.S., a proposal Washington rejects.

Some counterterrorism experts in Washington believe the threat of North Korean weapons proliferation is so acute that Washington should consider a virtual cordon sanitaire of North Korea.

"We'll have to do challenging inspections," says David Asher, who until last year helped lead a State Department effort to curb Pyongyang's illicit business. "We're trying to stop their transnational criminal activities. But they haven't stopped. We're going to have to be extremely good at what we do."

Blast May Be Only A Partial Success, Experts Say (NYT)

By William J. Broad And Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, October 10, 2006

The North Korean test appears to have been a nuclear detonation but was fairly small by traditional standards, and possibly a failure or a partial success, federal and private analysts said yesterday.

Throughout history, the first detonations of aspiring nuclear powers have tended to pack the destructive power of 10,000 to 60,000 tons — 10 to 60 kilotons — of conventional high explosives.

But the strength of the North Korean test appears to have been a small fraction of that: around a kiloton or less, according to scientists monitoring the global arrays of seismometers that detect faint trembles in the earth from distant blasts.

“It’s pretty remarkable that such a small explosion was promptly apparent on seismometers all over the world,” said Paul Richards, a seismologist at Columbia University’s Lamont-Doherty Earth Observatory in Palisades, N.Y. “The detection of this was really good. You can’t hide these kinds of things, even very small tests.”

A senior Bush administration official said he had learned through Asian contacts that the North Koreans had expected the detonation to have a force of about four kilotons. Because classified information was involved and there was lingering uncertainty, he would not let his name be used.

Philip E. Coyle III, a former director of weapons testing at the Pentagon and former director of nuclear testing for the Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory, a weapons design center in California, said the small size of the test signaled the possibility of what might be described as a partial success or a partial failure.

“As first tests go, this is smaller and less successful than those of the other nuclear powers,” he said.

Perhaps the North Koreans wanted to keep it small, he added. “But if it turns out to be a kiloton or less,” Dr. Coyle said, “that would suggest that they hoped for more than that and didn’t get it.”

The United States Geological Survey said it had detected a tremor on the Korean Peninsula of 4.2 magnitude, which translates into an explosive force of roughly 1,000 tons. The agency listed 20 seismic stations as having initially picked up the blast’s shockwave, including nearby ones in China, Japan and South Korea as well as distant ones in Ukraine, Australia, Nevada and Wyoming.

The Russian defense minister, Sergei B. Ivanov, told the Itar-Tass news agency that the Russian government believed the strength of the blast to have been 5 to 15 kilotons. The basis for his claim was not immediately clear.

In Washington, intelligence officials said they were still in the early stages of evaluating the North Korean blast. But one said analysts had estimated its force at less than a kiloton.

“We have assessed that the explosion in North Korea was a sub-kiloton explosion,” said the intelligence official, who, like others, spoke on condition of anonymity because they were discussing classified information.

It will probably take several days to determine with confidence if the explosion was in fact nuclear, the official said. He added that so far, sensors had not detected radiation leaking from the blast site. But federal and private experts said it seemed unlikely that the North Koreans had faked an underground nuclear blast with a large pile of conventional high explosives.

First, they said, the political risks involved would seem disproportionate. More important, federal and private analysts said, the United States has long had spy satellites observing the North Korean site and appears to have found no signs of chemical explosives being unloaded.

"It's difficult to fake it when you know people are looking down on you," said Dr. Richards of Columbia. "The execution of a chemical explosion would be hard to hide."

Dr. Coyle, the former director of nuclear testing at Livermore, said small tests were more likely to leak radioactivity than large ones, because the intense heat and gigantic shock waves of bigger blasts tended to melt and pulverize nearby rock into impregnable barriers.

Experts said the United States, Japan and the Comprehensive Nuclear Test Ban Treaty Organization had equipment that could sniff the air and water around North Korea for signs of radioactivity.

The South Koreans estimated the seismic magnitude of the blast at roughly 3.6. William Leith, the coordinator of seismic monitoring at the United States Geological Survey, said the South Korean method was different from and not comparable with the American technique. He added that the American estimate of 4.2 was unlikely to change.

In Vienna, the Comprehensive Nuclear Test Ban Treaty Organization estimated the blast's magnitude at 4.0, which is within the error margin of the American estimate.

An American intelligence official said the blast had shaken a North Korean site that the nation's spy agencies had long monitored — the flank of a mountain not far from the northeastern coast.

The small size of the explosion, he said, "tells you they have a lot of work to do in terms of weaponizing what they've got." He added, "If the lower-yield estimates are valid, then it's not a militarized system, but also not something a terrorist would reject."

North Korea's Nuclear Claim May Help U.S. Efforts On Iran (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr. And Bill Spindle

The Wall Street Journal, October 10, 2006

While a clear setback in itself, North Korea's claim of conducting an underground nuclear test could present the Bush administration with much-needed leverage on another challenge: Iran.

For months, Tehran has rejected international requests to enter discussions on its nuclear program -- which it insists is for peaceful purposes -- and has declined to suspend nuclear enrichment before even beginning such talks. Pyongyang's claims of a test Sunday also place it at odds with many in the international community.

Administration officials say they hope North Korea's action will be a wake-up call to countries such as China and Russia, which have been reluctant to support even mild economic sanctions on Iran for uranium-enrichment work many see as a sign of weapons ambitions.

By the same logic, if North Korea emerges relatively unscathed from the provocative incident, that could further embolden Iran by showing it has little to fear in moving ahead on nuclear development.

U.S. officials say the key barometer in coming days will be how China responds to Pyongyang's action. Following the announcement, the Chinese Foreign Ministry called the test "brazen," a term Chinese diplomats say was meant to show the depths of Beijing's anger. Yet the official Chinese news agency Xinhua said Chinese President Hu Jintao told Mr. Bush that all countries should "avoid actions that may lead to escalation."

China hasn't made clear what measures it may support within the United Nations. U.S. officials hope that Chinese resolve in backing U.N. action on North Korea will bolster the chances for imposing similar measures on Iran.

"All eyes are on China -- and then Russia," a U.S. State Department official said.

The international struggle over both Iran's and North Korea's nuclear programs have reached the U.N. Security Council at the same time -- a collision of contrasting diplomatic efforts that the U.S. hopes to use to its advantage.

Germany along with the council's five permanent members -- the U.S., Britain, France, China and Russia -- decided last week to take up a sanctions resolution on Iran after Tehran turned down an incentives package and refused to give up its enrichment work.

North Korea last year also broke off international talks and turned down various incentives to give up its nuclear program.

The challenge for the U.S. now is to forge a strong international consensus on punitive steps toward North Korea that might spill over into talks later on Iran.

The cases of North Korea and Iran differ in many ways, as do China's interests in both countries. China long has been a close North Korean ally and economic lifeline. As a neighbor, Beijing fears the chaos of an economic collapse in North Korea at least as much as Pyongyang's new nuclear status. In Iran, China's interests are more sharply focused, since Tehran is China's largest single supplier of oil, accounting for nearly 18% of its oil imports.

The Security Council yesterday began to consider a sanctions package on North Korea that U.S. officials said would seek to block imports of nuclear and weapons technology and restrict a range of financial transactions. The proposed restrictions are very similar to ones the U.S. would like to see incorporated in a first Iran sanctions package.

DOJ_NMG_0077177

With North Korea, the Bush administration is going to have to overcome deep concerns in China and South Korea that punitive measures will stir instability in the impoverished and isolated country.

The issues couldn't be more different in the case of Iran. All members of the Security Council except the U.S. have substantial trade and financial ties with Iran, which is one reason why they have had trouble agreeing on sanctions that would put pressure on Tehran. Sanctions that would really sting, such as blocking oil exports or substantial imports of gasoline, aren't being discussed.

Most experts believe Iran is several years away from mastering the technology needed to build a nuclear weapon.

Experts and officials inside Iran argue that Iran's leadership has become more determined not to accede to international demands, which they argue are driven by the U.S. "One of the places we have [internal] differences over is how to deal with the West, but those differences are fading," said Kazem Jalali, an Iranian legislator involved in foreign policy.

Iranian state radio responded to the incident by blaming it on the U.S., saying that North Korea was simply responding to the continued pressure of U.S. sanctions. "North Korea's nuclear test was a reaction to America's threats and humiliation," it said. U.S. officials insisted the tricky diplomacy involved in forging an agreement on a North Korea resolution shouldn't delay work on an Iranian package, which is expected to begin at the end of the week.

Experts: N. Korea Test May Embolden Iran (AP)

By Ali Akbar Dareini, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 10, 2006

North Korea's claim to have tested an atomic bomb could embolden Iran as it defies the U.N. Security Council and the United States over its own nuclear program, analysts said Monday.

For months, Iran has been under close scrutiny by the United States and Washington's allies, who claim the country is secretly developing nuclear weapons. Tehran insists its program is solely for generating electricity.

The world's attention turned abruptly from Iran to North Korea on Monday when the isolated communist nation announced it had set off an underground nuclear blast.

The announcement was met with a barrage of global condemnation, with President Bush saying it posed a threat to global peace and security. China, a longtime North Korea supporter, also strongly condemned the act.

How the Security Council reacts to North Korea will be watched "very carefully" in Tehran, said Robert Einhorn, a former U.S. assistant secretary of state for nonproliferation and a senior adviser at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington.

"If the U.S. can't build consensus for a tough reaction to North Korea, Iran may see that it can go down the nuclear path with impunity," Einhorn said.

The international community's determination to confront Iran also may be diminished because the U.N. Security Council will be preoccupied with a new crisis, said Ray Takeyh, a senior fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations in Washington.

Hamid Reza Shokouhi, a political writer at the moderate Mardomsalari (Democracy) daily newspaper in Iran, said North Korea's reported test reduces pressure on Iran.

"The test doesn't mean Iran will pursue a similar path because Iran is not after a bomb, but will help Iran to buy time and pursue its program as the world concentrates on North Korea," he said.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has repeatedly rejected Western calls to halt uranium enrichment, brushing aside an Aug. 31 Security Council deadline to stop enrichment or face possible sanctions.

But international sanctions against Iran have never been a sure bet, even after Tehran rebuffed the Security Council resolution. Strategic and political partnerships have pitted Washington and Britain calling for punitive measures on one side, and Russia and China urging negotiations on the other.

The Security Council was scheduled to discuss possible sanctions against Tehran this week.

Iran, meanwhile, has used the deadlock to continue its vocal confrontation with the United States and beef up its argument that under the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty, it has the right to have nuclear technology.

Elias Hanna, a former general of the Lebanese army and a military expert, said the North Korean test gives Iran further ammunition to go forward with its plans regardless if they are peaceful or not.

"The Iranians have the intention to go on with the program until the end. In Iran, the nuclear program is related to the nation's dignity, the continuation of the regime and the future Iranian role in the region," Hanna said.

Iran was not among the nations calling for harsh sanctions against North Korea on Monday, instead urging the U.N. not to punish Pyongyang and blaming the test on U.S. policies.

"Not only did the United States not lift the sanctions it had imposed on North Korea, it even increased the diplomatic pressure. Such pressure finally led North Korea to conduct its nuclear test," Iran's state-run radio said in a commentary.

DOJ_NMG_0077178

"North Korea's nuclear test was a reaction to America's threats and humiliation," it said.

British Prime Minister Tony Blair's spokesman declined to speculate on whether the North Korean test made resolving the standoff over Iran's nuclear program a more pressing concern, saying the "process on Iran will continue."

Einhorn said North Korea's reported test may defer Security Council talks on Iran for "days, even weeks," but that it will become the subject of intense talks again soon.

But reaching a consensus on Iran may take longer than on North Korea, he said.

"It looks like it will be somewhat easier to get consensus on North Korea because the Chinese are somewhat furious at this stage," Einhorn said.

Iran Warns Of Retaliation If Sanctions Imposed (AFP)

By Farhad Pouladi

AFP, October 10, 2006

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has vowed to impose retaliatory sanctions on world powers if the UN Security Council carries out threats to penalise Iran over its nuclear programme.

The warning came amid an intensifying global uproar Monday over North Korea's announcement of its first test of a nuclear weapon, a move which prompted Iran to declare it wanted a world free of atomic arms.

Ahmadinejad did not specify what kind of tit-for-tat measures might be imposed and Iran -- OPEC's second largest producer -- has always insisted it will not use oil as a weapon in the standoff.

"We will also impose sanctions on them," Ahmadinejad told reporters late Sunday in response to a question about a decision by the five Security Council permanent members plus Germany to discuss the prospect of sanctions.

"In the past 27 years they have always threatened us with sanctions and during this time they did everything they could," he said according to the student ISNA and semi-official ILNA news agencies.

"They do their thing and in return we will do ours."

Oil prices again spiked above 60 dollars a barrel in London trade as market players expressed fears the nuclear weapon test by North Korea might stiffen Iran's resolve in its standoff with the West.

Tehran, which is refusing to heed Western demands it suspend uranium enrichment, insists its nuclear programme is solely for peaceful energy needs, vehemently rejecting US allegations that it is seeking nuclear weapons.

Iran's foreign ministry spokesman called for negotiations after the North Korean nuclear test but stopped short of issuing an explicit condemnation of Pyongyang's actions.

"Iran's position is clear and Iran on principle believes in a world free of nuclear weapons," Mohammad Ali Hosseini was quoted as saying by a state television anchor.

"Iran is hopeful that negotiations on North Korea's nuclear activities can go ahead in the interest of both North Korea and the international community," he added.

In a meeting late on Friday, representatives from Britain, China, Germany France, Russia and the United States agreed to discuss sanctions against Iran after it refused to heed a new deadline to halt uranium enrichment.

Considerable momentum towards drafting a sanctions resolution as early as this week appeared to have been generated by the meeting between top diplomats in London after weeks of talks with Iran failed to win a breakthrough.

But it remains to be seen whether this can be maintained amid the growing uproar over the announcement by North Korea early Monday it had conducted its first test of a nuclear weapon.

The UN Security Council was expected to hold an emergency meeting later Monday to weigh how to respond to North Korea's test, which came in brazen defiance of a previous UN resolution.

Such moves could take up precious time that was to be devoted to the Iranian nuclear issue and further stave off the threat of UN action.

It also remains unclear whether Russia and China will support sanctions measures proposed by the United States and its chief ally Britain. Moscow and Beijing have always insisted on a diplomatic solution to the crisis.

The question of Iran's right to enrich uranium lies at the heart of the crisis. The process can be used to make nuclear fuel and, in highly extended form, the fissile core of an atomic bomb.

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who attended the London meeting, has said the United States wants a graduated series of sanctions, to be implemented through multiple UN resolutions that would ramp up pressure on Iran.

The first set of measures is expected to focus on preventing the supply of material and funding for Iran's nuclear or ballistic missile programmes.

Other steps could include asset freezes and travel bans on officials linked to possible Iranian weapons programmes.

Republicans Stand To Profit From Nuclear Test 'fear Factor' (FT)

By Edward Luce

Financial Times, October 10, 2006

Within hours of North Korea's proclaimed nuclear test yesterday Dennis Hastert, the Republican speaker in Congress, and John Boehner, the Republican majority leader on Capitol Hill, issued politically charged statements. With only a month to go before mid-term congressional elections many Republicans believe the tests could help restore their waning prospects.

"This reckless move by North Korea highlights the importance of a US missile defence shield capable of protecting America against madmen with weapons of mass destruction," said Mr Boehner. "It is time for the Democrats . . . to abandon their long-standing policy of voting against missile defence programmes. It is now clear that such a position would put Americans in danger."

Republicans almost always benefit from any rise in the "fear factor" among voters in the US. However, Monday's move by Pyongyang could cut both ways. "Democrats can point to the zero progress that George Bush has made on the 'Axis of Evil' states since he identified them almost five years ago," said Bob Einhorn, who was a senior official in the Clinton administration dealing with North Korea in the late 1990s. "Iraq is a fiasco, Iran is close to getting nuclear weapons, and North Korea already has them."

On Monday the US president was more circumspect than his Republican colleagues in linking the test to the US's fetid electoral climate. In a statement condemning North Korea's "provocative action", Mr Bush hinted strongly that the US would take military action if it found evidence that Pyongyang was selling nuclear material or technology to terrorist groups or to other nation states.

Republican prospects have declined in the past two weeks following a scandal over a lawmaker's suggestive e-mails to teenage interns on Capitol Hill. The scandal, which has prompted calls for Mr Hastert's resignation as speaker, followed a revival in Republican fortunes in September that was linked to the "war on terror" after a series of speeches by Mr Bush around the fifth anniversary of the September 11 attacks.

Mr Bush's own approval ratings also rose in September in part because of public sympathy for the US president following attacks on him at the United Nations in New York by Presidents Hugo Chávez of Venezuela and Mahmoud Ahmadi-Nejad of Iran. There was also a rising focus on the Democratic party's divisions over the war in Iraq, with some party leaders calling for immediate withdrawal and others for a better military strategy on the ground.

Monday's tests could help the Republicans regain control of the news agenda. "Our message has been blown off course in the last few weeks," said Saul Anuzis, head of the Republicans in Michigan, one of the key battleground states. "To the extent this focuses people's minds on the dangers America faces it will help Republicans."

However, North Korea inhabits a far smaller space in the American mindset than Iran, in part because – unlike Tehran – Pyongyang poses no direct threat to Israel or to the increasingly combustible situation in Iraq. In addition, the Bush administration has come under attack from moderate Republicans for its reluctance to hold direct talks with either Iran or North Korea.

"The best thing both parties could do is issue a joint resolution condemning North Korea," said Michael Green, a former senior Bush official now at the Centre for Strategic International Studies. "North Korea misinterprets domestic criticism of Mr Bush as weakness. They do not understand our political system."

Republicans Point To Pyongyang In Bid To Garner Voter Support (WSJ)

By John D. McKinnon

The Wall Street Journal, October 10, 2006

WASHINGTON -- North Korea's claim of a successful underground nuclear test reverberated through U.S. politics, diverting attention from congressional scandals that have hurt Republicans' election chances.

Still, it was unclear whether the incident would help or hurt Republicans trying to rebuild credibility with voters on national security.

Republicans used Pyongyang's announcement to go on the attack in tight Senate races in Ohio and Pennsylvania, suggesting they see an opening to score points with security-conscious voters. Sen. Rick Santorum (R., Pa.), trailing Democratic challenger Bob Casey Jr. in polls, said the incident showed that "this is no time for inexperienced, weak leaders -- we must remain resolute in the fight to stop the spread of nuclear weapons to rogue nations." The national Republican Senate campaign issued a statement saying Mr. Casey has been endorsed by liberal foreign-policy groups and that he would oppose a national missile-defense system.

DOJ_NMG_0077180

Democrats said President Bush's hard-line policy on North Korea and on global threats more broadly has failed. In a statement, party chairman Howard Dean said the North Korean announcement was "further evidence that President Bush has taken his eye off the ball, allowing a member of the so-called 'axis of evil' to allegedly test a nuclear weapon."

Democrats also suggested the Bush administration has paid insufficient attention to the North Korean threat while spending most of its time on Iraq and Iran. Some said Mr. Bush exacerbated the North Korean problem through his policy of refusing to negotiate with its leaders directly.

Republican strategists say that if the party's candidates can get voters to focus on terrorism and national security above all else, they will gain a significant advantage. Indeed, recent polls show that, of all the issues, national security is the one that breaks the most often in Republicans' favor. In a Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll in September, voters said they preferred Republicans over Democrats in handling the war on terrorism, by 38% to 24%. But their margin slipped substantially during 2005, and while it has climbed in recent weeks, the party hasn't recovered to 2004 levels. An ABC News/Washington Post poll yesterday found Republicans further behind in the congressional race this close to Election Day than they have been for 20 years.

To be sure, polls indicate the war in Iraq remains a bigger concern for most voters than the global war against terrorism.

Still, in the hours after North Korea's announcement, most foreign-policy experts said the incident likely would give Republicans at least a short-term boost -- and not just by changing the subject from the House leadership's responses to the Mark Foley scandal. They said a test of a North Korean nuclear weapon -- which would be the first since 1998, when India and Pakistan both set off bombs -- also underscores the danger of nuclear proliferation among groups and nations hostile to the U.S. North Korea already is an exporter of missile technology to governments unfriendly to the U.S.

"The reaction quite broadly will be validation...of North Korea as a substantial threat," said Michael Levi, a fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations. "The big picture for Democrats is that this takes away attention from...the congressional scandals" where they had scored heavy political damage. By contrast, it will be difficult for Democrats to get much attention for their criticisms "because no one wants to hear anything but condemnation of [North Korean leader] Kim Jong Il."

But others played down the effect. "We now have evidence that the wildest and craziest regime in the world has working nuclear weapons," said Richard Betts, director of Columbia University's Saltzman Institute of War and Peace Studies. But, Mr. Betts added, "It's not a shocker -- we've known this could happen anytime."

In fact, the U.S. stock market shrugged off the news. The Dow Jones Industrial Average edged up 7.60 points to finish yesterday's session at 11857.81.

History has shown that a late-breaking national-security development -- the so-called October Surprise -- can affect U.S. elections. Al Qaeda circulated a videotape of Osama bin Laden just before the 2004 election in which the terrorist leader mocked Mr. Bush and warned American voters to stop electing candidates who harm Muslims, or risk another attack like 9/11. But the tape appeared to solidify voter support for Mr. Bush.

Bush: World Leaders United Over N. Korea (AP-Y)

By Deb Riechmann

AP-Yahoo, October 10, 2006

Facing the prospect of a nuclear-armed North Korea, President Bush on Monday called the communist regime's claim of a nuclear test a provocative act and warned Pyongyang against exporting nuclear materials.

"Once again, North Korea has defied the will of the international community, and the international community will respond," Bush said.

Other world leaders joined Bush in calling for an immediate and harsh rebuke from the United Nations against North Korean leader Kim Jong Il, who wants to join the club of nuclear-armed nations.

Bush has made national security a key issue in the midterm congressional elections, and Democrats said North Korea's success in raising the stakes in the nuclear standoff was evidence that Bush's policy was flawed.

The president called the leaders of South Korea, Russia, Japan and China, and he said they all reaffirmed a commitment to a nuclear-free Korean peninsula. At the United Nations, the U.S. proposed stringent sanctions, including a trade ban on military and luxury items, the power to inspect all cargo entering or leaving the country, and freezing assets connected with its weapons programs.

While concerned that North Korea could use a nuclear weapon offensively, the United States is equally worried about it selling nuclear materials or weapons to others. North Korea is believed to have enough plutonium for as few as four and as many as a dozen nuclear bombs.

Bush said that North Korea already is one of the world's leading proliferators of missile technology, including transfers to Iran and Syria.

DOJ_NMG_0077181

"The transfer of nuclear weapons or material by North Korea to states or nonstate entities would be considered a grave threat to the United States," Bush said in a brief statement in the diplomatic reception room at the White House. "And we would hold North Korea fully accountable for the consequences of such action."

North Korea has been a major security problem for successive U.S. administrations. In 2002 the Bush administration accused the North of reneging on a 1994 nuclear freeze agreement by secretly undertaking a uranium enrichment program. That agreement became inoperative, and in the ensuing months, a defiant North Korea withdrew from the Nuclear Non-Proliferation treaty and ended the nuclear freeze.

In 2003, the United States joined with China, South Korea, Japan and Russia in an effort to negotiate the dismantlement of North Korea's nuclear weapons program in exchange for economic concessions. There have been no negotiations since November 2005 because of what Pyongyang describes as hostile U.S. policies.

Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill said a tough U.N. resolution would help protect the United States from the potential spread of nuclear technology and make it harder for North Korea to get the finances needed to fund a nuclear program.

"What the North Koreans have in mind is that if they go ahead and test, we may be angry now but at some point we'll get over it and we'll deal with them as a nuclear weapons state," Hill, the chief U.S. envoy to the North Korea nuclear talks, said in an Associated Press Television interview. "We're not going to deal with them as a nuclear weapons state. I don't think China will deal with them. I don't think any of their neighbors will deal with them."

Democrats condemned North Korea's actions and cited the reported test as evidence that Bush's foreign policy strategy is ineffective. They point to six-party talks with the United States, Russia, China, Japan, South Korea and North Korea that have stalled and so far failed to quell North Korea's nuclear ambitions.

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev, said the Bush administration has for several years been in a state of denial about the growing challenge of North Korea, and has tried to downplay the issue.

Rep. Edward Markey, D-Mass., co-chairman of the House Bipartisan Task Force on Nonproliferation, said the test might have been avoided if the Bush administration had been more willing to fully engage North Korea diplomatically. "The Bush administration has spent six years without a coherent North Korea policy, leaving the United States rudderless in the face of Pyongyang's brinkmanship," he said.

Senate Majority Whip Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., said Democrats are acting as if Bush, not North Korea, is the enemy. He said Democrats have attacked Bush for having a go-it-alone strategy in Iraq and criticize his multilateral approach to North Korea.

"The Democrats need to take a deep breath and realize that this is not about the election, and that Americans don't want anyone playing partisan politics with the threat of nuclear weapons. Rather than attack the president, we ought to be coming together to support his efforts to protect America," he said.

The United States has not yet confirmed the test.

"We're leaving it to the scientists," White House press secretary Tony Snow said Monday. "It could take as much as a couple of days. The scientists are still going through all of it."

One U.S. official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the politically sensitive situation with North Korea, said the working assumption among government experts is that, more likely than not, it was a nuclear test. However, various government agencies were still evaluating the data, the official said.

The official said it can't yet be ruled out that conventional explosives could have caused a seismic event of this size. It could also be that the test — or even one stage of it — failed. In addition, the official said, if the test was conducted in a particularly cavernous area, the shockwave could have been muffled.

Bush Seeks Action From U.N., 6 Parties (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, October 10, 2006

President Bush yesterday called for an "immediate response" from the United Nations Security Council to North Korea's assertion that it had tested a nuclear weapon, as Senate Democrats demanded that the administration engage in one-on-one talks with the nation's increasingly belligerent leader, Kim Jong-il.

The White House rejected those calls, saying direct negotiations failed miserably during the Clinton administration and that the Bush administration plans to stick with six-party talks in an effort to persuade regional leaders, such as China, to apply pressure on North Korea.

"There's strength in numbers," White House spokesman Tony Snow said.

DOJ_NMG_0077182

Using carefully crafted diplomatic language, the president said in a brief statement yesterday morning that he spoke with the leaders of China, South Korea, Russia and Japan and that all agreed "that the proclaimed actions taken by North Korea are unacceptable."

Mr. Bush stopped short of threatening a direct U.S. response, instead saying "the United States remains committed to diplomacy."

"The United States condemns this provocative act. Once again, North Korea has defied the will of the international community, and the international community will respond," he said.

He said the United States and its allies will keep all options open.

"I reaffirmed to our allies in the region, including South Korea and Japan, that the United States will meet the full range of our deterrent and security commitments," he said.

Mr. Bush did not confirm that the North Korean test was nuclear, and early reports suggested that the blast may have been a failed nuclear test. "Nonetheless, such a claim itself constitutes a threat to international peace and security," he said.

In New York, John R. Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, said the United States would move quickly to seek a Security Council resolution condemning and possibly sanctioning North Korea.

"We've been working very, very closely with the government of Japan on this," Mr. Bolton said. "We're looking, as the president said in his comments, for very swift action by the Security Council."

Congressional Democrats, meanwhile, sought political advantage from the reported nuclear test.

"On North Korea, as in other national security policies, the Bush administration and the Republican-controlled Congress have made America less secure," said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat. "Now the White House must rally the international community and must directly speak with the North Koreans so they understand we will not continue to stand on the sidelines."

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat, said: "We need a strategy that convinces the North to stop making bombs and put all of its fissile material under international monitoring. I believe that strategy must include direct engagement with the North."

Sen. John Kerry, Massachusetts Democrat, said, "Weapons of mass destruction pointed at our allies and strategic partners represents a shocking failure of President Bush's security policy, and a threat to the interests of peace and stability in the world."

House Majority Leader John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican, backed Mr. Bush. "It is critical that we support President Bush and our diplomats as they work with other members of the international community to demand North Korea's immediate disarmament," he said.

The reported test brings full circle the president's charge in his 2002 State of the Union address when he labeled Iraq, Iran and North Korea an "axis of evil."

Mr. Snow said the White House has been considering a "menu" of punitive sanctions for several weeks, but he did not indicate what action would be taken.

Earlier yesterday, he said the North Koreans alerted the Chinese about the test. The Chinese then notified the U.S. Embassy in Beijing, which passed the word to other U.S. officials.

Down, But Flush With Cash (NYT)

By John M. Broder

The New York Times, October 10, 2006

With only a month to go before the midterm elections, aftershocks of the reported nuclear test in North Korea reverberated through the political world. The crisis could prove an opportunity for President Bush and Republicans to change the subject after weeks of bad political news for them and refocus voters on the issue they think works best for the party, national security.

But the footing for Republican incumbents is still treacherous. Details emerge every day in the scandal surrounding Mark Foley's sexually explicit messages to teenage House pages and the Republican House leadership's handling of the matter. Political handicappers say the number of competitive races is expanding, with virtually all of the movement favorable to Democrats. At least 40 Republican-held House seats are considered competitive, with Democrats needing to win 15 to take control.

Republicans are fighting back with their most potent remaining weapon: money. The National Republican Congressional Committee spent $7.8 million last Friday alone on behalf of endangered incumbents. The committee reported spending an additional $300,000 on Monday. The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee spent $700,000 on Friday and over the weekend, according to finance reports.

North Korea And The Bomb (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0077183

The New York Times, October 10, 2006

Let us all agree: North Korea's government is too erratic, too brutal, and too willing to sell what it has built to have a nuclear bomb. There is also no military solution, not least because intelligence experts haven't a clue where Pyongyang has hidden its weapons labs or its stock of plutonium.

So after years of temporizing and denial, the world's leaders need to figure out how to force this terrible genie back into the bottle. It is a truism that no country that has tested a nuclear weapon has ever been pressured or cajoled into giving it up. But neither has any nuclear postulant been as vulnerable to outside pressure and bribery as this regime.

The Bush administration seems to want to impose limited sanctions on North Korea — and inspections of all cargo going into and out of the country — until it agrees to abandon its entire weapons program. We fear that won't be enough to quickly change Pyongyang's mind — while key players like China won't sign on to never-ending punishments.

We believe this must instead be a two-step process, starting with a Security Council-ordered ban on all trade, until the North agrees to stop expanding its arsenal. Pyongyang must be told that there will be no further attempt at negotiation until it halts all plutonium production, forswears additional tests and readmits United Nations inspectors.

In practice, the North Koreans are likely to back down only if China chokes off their oil supply and other essential trade. Until now Beijing has refused to use its enormous leverage, fearing that too much pressure could topple the North Korean government and unleash a mass of refugees over its border. When told they were enabling their neighbor's nuclear ambitions, Chinese diplomats blithely insisted that the North was likely bluffing about having a weapon. Now, Washington, Tokyo, Moscow and others have to make clear that China will be judged by its willingness to confront this problem.

The Security Council must also make clear that it is still demanding the complete dismantlement of Pyongyang's nuclear weapons program. For that, negotiations are the only hope. It is impossible to know whether North Korea will give up its weapons at any price. But it has never been tested — mainly because the Bush administration has not made the sort of serious offer, including security guarantees, that might make a bargain worthwhile.

The administration has indulged in its own denial and temporizing. Last year, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice dismissed the North's declaration that it had nuclear weapons as a bid for attention. "I do think the North Koreans have been, frankly, a little bit disappointed that people are not jumping up and down and running around with their hair on fire," she told The Wall Street Journal.

Since then, United States policy has whipsawed between negotiations and posturing, incentives and sanctions. It has been months since negotiators even sat down at the table. Administration hawks suggested last week that perhaps the best thing would be for the North to test, so the world would know exactly what it was dealing with. The hawks appear to have gotten their way. So why don't we feel safer?

North Korea's Nukes (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 10, 2006

With great danger comes great clarity. By ordering his country's first-ever nuclear weapons test, Kim Jong Il lay bare this generation's greatest challenge: How far will the world go to impose order on rogue states intent on acquiring weapons of mass destruction?

History offers cold comfort. Only nine nations in the post-Soviet era possess nuclear weapons, but many more, including Tehran's mullahs, are seeking them. The U.S. and other responsible democracies have persuaded a few nations -- Ukraine, South Africa, Libya -- to disarm or abandon their weapons programs. In our globalized world, however, WMD proliferation is a potent threat, as proven by Pakistan's former nuclear-secrets merchant, A.Q. Khan.

Pyongyang, like Iran today, never hid its ambitions. For over a decade, the North has built up the world's fourth-largest military, threatened its neighbors and engaged in drug dealing, counterfeiting and WMD proliferation -- with little rebuke. At one point, the Hermit Kingdom threatened to turn Seoul into a "sea of fire." In 2002, Pyongyang announced it had nuclear weapons.

The world rolled over. After signing on to the nonproliferation treaty in 1985, Pyongyang later admitted to hiding additional nuclear reactors. China and South Korea continued to trade with the regime. In 1998 after North Korea lobbed a missile over Japan, the Clinton Administration agreed to food aid, and South Korea's then-President Kim Dae Jung began a policy of appeasement. After July's missile launches, the United Nations passed a resolution with limited sanctions.

South Korea shoulders much of the blame. By sticking to its "sunshine policy," Seoul undermined every diplomatic effort to exert nonviolent pressure on the North. Two-way trade between North and South Korea passed $1 billion last year, according to the U.S. State Department, a huge chunk of the North's total income. By tolerating Pyongyang's proliferation ambitions, President Roh Moo Hyun and his foreign minister, Ban Ki Moon, have allowed the current crisis to explode on its doorstep.

China, the North's largest trading partner, shares responsibility for this crisis. Fearing a torrent of refugees over its northeastern border -- and opposed to the idea of a strong, unified democratic Korean peninsula -- Beijing has provided 80% to 90% of the North's energy needs, plus critical food aid. Beijing likes to say in public that it doesn't have much leverage over the North. Privately, Chinese officials admit that they're not powerless.

Only with the drumbeat of a possible nuclear test had the public rhetoric of both begun to shift. Seoul warned last week that "North Korea should take full responsibility for all consequences" of a nuclear test. In a rare public rebuke, a Chinese spokesman told the North to "exercise necessary calm and restraint." It remains to be seen whether Beijing's post-test response will equal its pre-test rhetoric.

A nuclear North Korea may change both countries' strategic calculations. China fears a nuclear arms race in the region, particularly with Japan whose new Prime Minister warned yesterday that the world is entering a "dangerous nuclear age." He's right. South Korea, too, may finally acknowledge the threat, not least because yesterday's test will renew the debate in Washington about the wisdom of keeping U.S. troops in the South.

What to do now? South Korea and especially China should rethink appeasement. It has failed. A full cut-off of energy supplies and foreign aid would help pressure Kim Jong Il. Opening the Chinese border to North Korean refugees would do so as well. Most important, the world should tighten the screws it already has in place, with success, on the North's external financial accounts. No dictator can run a rogue state without money. Kim might give up the nukes if the alternative was regime collapse. And to encourage the world's actors to get real about North Korea, the U.S. should make clear that a military response is not off the table.

Yesterday's test marks a new reality that will change security calculations in Asia and the world. We're about to find out how responsible an actor China wants to be on the world stage, or if it prefers having one of its clients creating trouble for the U.S. and Japan. At the very least Kim Jong Il has to know, and will have to be told, that any use of nuclear weapons by his regime or by anyone who can be traced to North Korea will result in his government's annihilation. U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill said the other day that North Korea "can have a future or it can have these weapons."

There will be renewed calls for bilateral talks between Washington and Pyongyang. This would be a mistake. Putting new money on the table and pulling sanctions off would be seen by Pyongyang and all others as a reward for defying the world and building a bomb. The next "development" will be another nuclear nation, starting with Iran.

Kim has opened a Pandora's box. Closing it won't be easy. The effort needs to be made to avoid the alternative: a new world disorder.

Responding To North Korea (WP)

The Washington Post, October 10, 2006

NORTH KOREA'S objective in the aftermath of its reported nuclear test will undoubtedly be to force its neighbors and the world to accept it as an established nuclear power. India and Pakistan succeeded in riding out sanctions and winning acceptance as "strategic partners" of the United States after their bomb tests. Kim Jong Il will try to repeat that history. Whether he succeeds will depend, above all, on the outcome of what we hope will be some serious rethinking by the governments of South Korea and China.

North Korea's neighbors, and not the United States, bear the burden of the North's decision to proceed with what it said was a nuclear explosion -- the small yield raised questions yesterday about whether the test could have been a flop or a fake. Beijing and Seoul have propped up Mr. Kim's despotic regime with heavy subsidies of fuel and food, reasoning that keeping it alive was better than a collapse that could flood their countries with refugees. The underlying logic was that the North's nuclear program was little more than a bargaining chip with the United States and did not pose a genuine military threat.

Both countries have to recalculate now. Is an outlaw dictatorship with nuclear weapons on the border really tolerable? Is the possibility that Japan or Taiwan will respond by building nuclear weapons less of a threat than a tide of refugees? What poses a greater risk of war: the possible collapse of the Kim regime, or an attempt by that regime to use its new weapon either to extort concessions from the South or to achieve its stated goal of conquering the whole Korean Peninsula? Most important: If subsidies and bribes have failed to moderate North Korean behavior over the past few years, is it reasonable to bet that they will do so in the future?

The Bush administration's response to the test should be uncomplicated. It will rightly press hard for new U.N.-sponsored sanctions. It should take any further measures that could increase the pressure on the North or prevent it from exporting its technology. It also should be prepared to talk to Mr. Kim about disarmament in the unlikely event he elects to take up the framework that was agreed on a year ago in the "six-party" negotiations. That agreement promised him substantial economic aid, security guarantees and normal relations with the United States; it's fanciful to suggest that the United States hasn't been forthcoming enough.

In the absence of workable military options, the United States probably cannot force North Korea to give up its bomb, nor can the United States overturn the regime. The real leverage lies with South Korea and China. Without their continued material support, and their insistence on shutting their borders to the North's desperate people, the Kim regime could not survive for long. Beijing and Seoul have said they would not accept the nuclearization of the Korean Peninsula. In fact, they do not have to. They do, however, have to choose between two unpleasant options: accepting a North Korean nuclear weapon or risking the "instability" in the North that they have tried so hard to prevent.

Kim Jong Il's Challenge To China (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, October 10, 2006

WHETHER NORTH KOREA'S self-proclaimed nuclear test turns out to have been a big bang or a little pop, it already has done incalculable damage to global security. Yet however radioactive the geopolitical fallout, it cannot be allowed to damage relations between Beijing and Washington.

Recriminations already have begun in Washington, with politicians and pundits simply adjusting their debate to take Monday's events into account. The question is no longer how to persuade North Korean leader Kim Jong Il to abandon his quest for nuclear weapons but whether he could have been persuaded — and whether the approach was too bellicose toward Kim or too obliging to China.

This argument is now even more fruitless. But it could turn ugly if members of Congress already hostile to China because of its position on Taiwan or because of trade issues are joined by those who ask why Beijing didn't do more to stop North Korea from going nuclear.

The Bush administration should be careful not to let criticism from members of Congress distract it from diplomatic efforts to win more complete cooperation from the Chinese. But the Chinese need to decide once and for all whether they want to play the leading role in this crisis or whether they are content to continue to criticize the U.S. for failing to do so.

Beijing has implied that the administration's refusal to hold one-on-one negotiations with North Korea has made it impossible to make headway with Pyongyang. But if China doesn't want the U.S. to behave like a global hegemonist and doesn't want Japan to abandon its pacifist constitution, then it must share the responsibility for deterring and containing North Korea — or better yet, persuade it to disarm.

Chinese officials are said to roll their eyes in private at North Korean intransigence and to downplay their influence over Kim. Their act isn't terribly convincing. China is North Korea's last friend and ally and its biggest supplier of food and fuel. In 2003, it briefly shut off gas pipelines to make the point that Pyongyang had better agree to six-party negotiations over nuclear disarmament.

Chinese and South Korean reluctance to punish North Korea economically, lest privation trigger floods of refugees across their borders, is understandable. But both nations must now realize that their interest would be far more threatened by a nuclear arms race in the region and beyond.

With South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki-moon poised to become the next United Nations secretary-general, the international community should begin planning for humanitarian assistance for North Korean refugees. Such plans would be wise in any case — in the event stiff international sanctions are applied or Kim's regime collapses because of its own suicidal economic and political policies.

Meanwhile, the best course for the U.S. and China is to present a united, anti-nuclear stance to the world. Beijing's denunciation Monday of North Korea's actions was its strongest and swiftest in years. May it soon be matched by Chinese action.

Talking With The Monsters (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, October 10, 2006

If there's one overriding lesson from North Korea's apparent nuclear test, it's this: We need to negotiate directly even with hostile and brutal regimes.

It's probably too late to clean up the mess that President Bush has made on the Korean peninsula, but there is time to apply the lesson to Syria and especially Iran — where we may soon be facing a third military conflict in a Muslim country.

As former Secretary of State James Baker noted in an ABC News interview on Sunday: "I believe in talking to your enemies. ... It's not appeasement to talk to your enemies."

The administrations of both the first President Bush and of President Clinton talked to North Korea. That engagement sometimes seemed distasteful, but it averted war and created incentives for North Korea to moderate its behavior — just a bit.

The bottom line is reflected in the plutonium obtained by North Korea. Here's the scorecard: Amount obtained during the Clinton administration, zero; amount obtained under this administration, enough for about eight nuclear weapons. (North Korea has also tried since late in the Clinton administration to enrich uranium for a separate path to nuclear weapons, but apparently still hasn't succeeded and perhaps never will.)

"By not having any contact, we've lost any way of controlling or directing the outcome," noted James Laney, a longtime Korea specialist and former ambassador to South Korea. "As this test indicates, we're completely out of the picture."

The real culprit, of course, is not President Bush but Kim Jong-il, North Korea's "Dear Leader." That said, if Colin Powell and other administration moderates had been allowed to engage North Korea as they had wanted, we would not now be caught in this nuclear crisis.

Administration hard-liners believe that North Korea's regime may collapse at any moment. Maybe. But when I visited last year, the regime seemed as solid (and repressive) as when I first visited in 1989. Sure, it will collapse at some point, but waiting for disintegration is not a strategy.

Indeed, North Korea may be less vulnerable now, partly because its economy has improved significantly since the late 1990's as a result of increasing trade with China. Last year, North Korea's trade with China was double the level of 2002 and quadruple that of 1999.

The China-North Korea border crossing at Sanhe has just expanded its operations, and trade could rise sharply if the two countries follow through on discussions to expand rail links and export Chinese containers from the North Korean port of Rajin.

Mr. Bush's push for tough U.N. resolutions is welcome but is no substitute for direct talks. The reality is that even if China and South Korea were willing to apply tough economic sanctions to the North — which they are not — the Dear Leader would stick to his guns. After all, this is a man who imported Mercedes-Benzes in the late 1990's while two million of his compatriots were dying in a famine.

So our huffing and puffing won't cause North Korea to back down, but we could drift toward greater dangers: If we move to enforce naval inspections of ships coming in and out of North Korea, the Dear Leader will threaten war. I doubt if he means it — but I still wouldn't buy real estate in Tokyo, Okinawa or Seoul right now.

So what should we do?

While proceeding with U.N. resolutions, we should also talk to North Korea directly. It's probably too late to persuade it to give up its nuclear arsenal, but it's plausible that it would freeze plutonium production and suspend missile and nuclear tests. Those are feasible goals that China might use its leverage to help achieve.

To show that talking with enemies doesn't mean rolling over, we can also insist on raising human rights issues. American conservatives have led the way in protesting brutality in North Korea, but the protests simply aren't effective. The U.S. government could add to the pressure by going public with satellite images of concentration camps and publicizing other intelligence about North Korean human rights abuses.

The challenge is larger than North Korea, though — it concerns how to stand up to all of the world's rogue regimes. Notably, in the two where Mr. Bush has tried engagement he has enjoyed bits of success. Those are Sudan and Libya.

Even though Mr. Bush says that Sudan is engaging in genocide in Darfur, we continue (quite properly) to negotiate with Khartoum — and that helped end the war between north and south Sudan, after two million deaths. Likewise, negotiations with Libya led it to give up its W.M.D. programs.

In contrast, we eschewed most direct diplomacy with North Korea and Iraq, and the result has been disastrous. So as we lurch ahead toward a showdown with Iran, let's remember the historical evidence: We sometimes do better talking to monsters than trying to slay them or wish them away.

Mutually Assured Disruption (NYT)

By David Frum

The New York Times, October 10, 2006

Washington

THE North Korean nuclear test — if that indeed is what it was — signals the catastrophic collapse of a dozen years of American policy. Over that period, two of the world's most dangerous regimes, Pakistan and North Korea, have developed nuclear weapons and the missiles to launch them. Iran, arguably the most dangerous of them all, will surely follow, unless some dramatic action is soon taken.

It is, alas, an iron law of modern diplomacy that the failure of any diplomatic process only proves the need for more of the process that has just failed. Thus those who have long supported negotiating with North Korea are now calling for the Bush administration to begin direct talks with the Kim Jong-il regime. Sorry, but all this would accomplish would be to reward an actual proliferator in order to preserve the illusion that the world still has a meaningful nonproliferation regime.

Some even suggest, in worried tones, that the North Korean test might provoke Japan to go nuclear, as if the worst possible consequence of nuclear weapons in the hands of one of America's direst enemies would be the acquisition of nuclear weapons by one of America's best friends.

A new approach is needed. America has three key strategic goals in the wake of the North Korean nuclear test. The first is to enhance the security of those American allies most directly threatened by North Korean nuclear weapons: Japan and South Korea.

The second is to exact a price from North Korea for its nuclear program severe enough to frighten Iran and any other rogue regimes considering following the North Korean path.

The last is to punish China. North Korea could not have completed its bomb if China, which provides the country an immense amount of food and energy aid, had strongly opposed it. Apparently, Beijing sees some potential gain in the uncertainty that North Korea's status brings. If China can engage in such conduct cost-free, what will deter Russia from aiding the Iranian nuclear program, or Pakistan someday aiding a Saudi or Egyptian one?

To meet these three goals, the United States should adopt four swift policy responses:

· Step up the development and deployment of existing missile defense systems.

The United States has already fielded 11 missile interceptors, nine in Alaska and two in California. The Navy has designed ship-based interceptors as well. As we well know, they are not perfect — but they are something.

Until now this lack of perfection has been allowed to block full deployment of the technology. But missile defenses do not need to be perfect to complicate any aggressive action by a comparatively weak power like North Korea against the United States or its allies.

And deploying a missile defense of growing effectiveness also helps achieve another goal — it would indirectly punish China by corroding the power of the missiles China uses to intimidate Taiwan.

· End humanitarian aid to North Korea and pressure South Korea to do the same.

Since 1995, the United States has provided more than two million tons of food aid to North Korea, plus considerable energy assistance. Officially, Washington says it has "delinked" its humanitarian aid from strategic concerns. Many United States officials believe that continuing this aid will sustain hopes for a better American-North Korean relationship in the future. Yet if the United States continues to send such aid even after an illicit nuclear test, North Korean leaders may well conclude that their aggressive actions have won them almost absolute impunity.

An end to humanitarian aid would not only exact a considerable direct price from North Korea, but it would also hurt China. Chinese leaders often justify their refusal to pressure North Korea by citing the risk of an economic collapse that would send millions of refugees northward into China. We could call that bluff: if a North Korean economic collapse is a thing China fears, why should the United States and South Korea shoulder the cost of helping to avert it? Let China pay the full cost of underwriting its aggressive client state.

· Invite Japan, South Korea, Australia, New Zealand and Singapore to join NATO — and even invite Taiwan to send observers to NATO meetings.

Perhaps North Korea and China imagine that the nuclear test has tilted the strategic balance in the Pacific in their favors. Now would be a good time to disabuse each of them of any such illusion. We need a tighter and stronger security arrangement in the Pacific region, one from which rogue states and those who support them are pointedly excluded. The NATO allies have agreed to expand the organization well beyond Western Europe; now we need to persuade them to make it global.

· Encourage Japan to renounce the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty and create its own nuclear deterrent.

World War II ended long ago, and it's time to put an end to the silly pretense that today's democratic Japan owes a burden of guilt to today's rising China. A nuclear Japan is the thing China and North Korea dread most (after, perhaps, a nuclear South Korea or Taiwan).

Not only would the nuclearization of Japan be a punishment of China and North Korea, but it would go far to meet our goal of dissuading Iran — it would show Tehran that the United States and its friends will aggressively seek to correct any attempt by rogue states to unsettle any regional nuclear balance. The analogue for Iran, of course, would be the threat of American aid to improve Israel's capacity to hit targets with nuclear weapons.

Countries like North Korea and Iran seek nuclear weapons because they imagine that those weapons will enhance their security and power. The way to contain them is to convince them otherwise. When nonproliferation can be prevented by negotiation, that is always preferred. But when negotiation fails, as it has failed in North Korea and is failing in Iran, rogue regimes must be made to suffer for their dangerous nuclear ambitions.

In A Test, A Reason To Talk (WP)

Bilateral Diplomacy Could Still Roll Back North Korea's Nuclear Arms Effort

"You have learned to live with other nuclear powers," said Vice Foreign Minister Kim Gye Gwan, North Korea's chief nuclear negotiator, leaning forward over the dinner table in Pyongyang. "So why not us? We really want to coexist with the United States peacefully, but you must learn to coexist with a North Korea that has nuclear weapons."

"That doesn't sound like you are serious when you talk about denuclearization," I replied.

"You misunderstand me," he said. "We are definitely prepared to carry out the Beijing agreement, step by step, but we won't completely and finally dismantle our nuclear weapons program until our relations with the United States are fully normalized. That will take some time, and until we reach the final target, we should find a way to coexist."

This exchange foreshadowed the North Korean test of a nuclear explosive device that has prompted demands for a naval blockade or military strikes against known North Korean nuclear facilities. But my conversations with six key North Korean leaders on a recent visit indicated that the test opens up new diplomatic opportunities and should not be viewed primarily as a military challenge.

Paradoxical as it may seem, Pyongyang staged the test as a last-ditch effort to jump-start a bilateral dialogue on the normalization of relations that the United States has so far spurned. Over and over, I was told that Pyongyang wants bilateral negotiations to set the stage for implementation of the denuclearization agreement it concluded in Beijing on Sept. 19, 2005, with the United States, China, Russia, Japan and South Korea.

Washington focuses on Article One of the accord, in which North Korea agreed to "abandon all nuclear weapons and existing nuclear programs." But what made the agreement acceptable to Pyongyang was the pledge in Article Two that the United States and North Korea would "respect each other's sovereignty, exist peacefully together and take steps to normalize relations."

In North Korean eyes, it was a flagrant violation when, four days after the agreement was signed, the United States in effect declared economic war on the Kim Jong Il regime. The Treasury Department imposed financial sanctions designed to cut off North Korean access to the international banking system, branding it a "criminal state" guilty of counterfeiting and money laundering.

The sanctions issue has given the initiative to hard-liners in Pyongyang, who can plausibly argue that the sanctions are the cutting edge of a calculated effort by dominant elements in the Bush administration to undercut the Beijing agreement, squeeze the Kim regime and eventually force its collapse.

To be sure, the United States should take action against any abuse of its currency. But the financial sanctions are not targeted solely against counterfeiting and any other illicit North Korean activity. They go much further by seeking to cut off all North Korean financial intercourse with the world. The United States has warned financial institutions everywhere, Treasury Undersecretary Stuart Levey said Aug. 23, "of the risks in holding any North Korean accounts."

Foreign businessmen and diplomats in Pyongyang told me of numerous cases in which legitimate imports of industrial equipment to make consumer goods have been blocked by the banking sanctions. This slows down the efforts of North Korean reformers to open up to the outside world and curtails economic growth. So far, the sanctions do not appear to be undermining the regime, but North Korean leaders can feel the noose tightening.

The Bush administration says that it is not pursuing a policy of "regime change," but the president did tell Bob Woodward that he would like to "topple" Kim Jong Il, according to Woodward's book "Bush at War." Recently, when a State Department official told Levey that the sanctions should distinguish between licit and illicit North Korean activity, Levey replied, "You know the president loves this stuff." Robert Joseph, John Bolton's successor as undersecretary of state for arms control, said at a recent State Department meeting that he hoped the sanctions would "put out all the lights in Pyongyang."

To advance U.S. security interests, the United States should agree to bilateral negotiations. It should press North Korea to suspend further nuclear and missile tests while negotiations on normalization proceed, freeze plutonium production and make a firm, timebound commitment to return to the six-party talks. In return, the administration should negotiate a compromise on the financial sanctions that would reopen North Korean access to the international banking system, offer large-scale energy cooperation and remove North Korea from the State Department's list of terrorist states, thus opening the way for multilateral aid from the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund and the Asian Development Bank, all of which North Korea is actively seeking to join.

Playing games with "regime change" has become much too dangerous and should now give way to a sustained diplomatic effort to roll back North Korea's nuclear weapons program while it is still in its early stages.

Iran: Sanctions Threat A 'Rusty' Weapon (AP)

By Nasser Karimi

AP, October 9, 2006

Iran called the threat of international sanctions over its disputed nuclear program a "rusty" weapon and repeated Sunday that it would not abandon uranium enrichment.

The six countries at the center of efforts to persuade Iran to drop uranium enrichment — a key step toward making nuclear weapons — said Friday they have agreed to pursue possible sanctions.

However, all five permanent security council members — the U.S., France, Britain, Russia and China — along with Germany stopped short of demanding Iran be punished by the U.N. Security Council.

"Both officials and people in Iran have always viewed threats of sanctions as a rusty and derelict weapon," Foreign Ministry spokesman Mohammad Ali Hosseini said at a weekly news briefing. "They are accustomed to the threats."

However, Hosseini said Iran does not "welcome sanctions" and that they would damage both Iran and the countries that impose them.

Although he reiterated Iran's determination to continue enriching uranium, Hosseini said "negotiation is the best way."

He said Iran will resume negotiations with European nations, talks that are seen as a final attempt to avoid a full-blown confrontation between Tehran and the Security Council. Hosseini did not offer specifics on the talks, such as when they might begin.

In September, European Union envoy Javier Solana and Iranian envoy Ali Larijani ended two days of talks in Berlin with no agreement on the enrichment issue. They insisted, however, that they had made progress on ways to open broader discussions.

Those talks came after Iran ignored an Aug. 31 deadline to suspend uranium enrichment or face punishment.

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad on Sunday told a cabinet meeting: "Some bullying powers, applying intimidation and threats, intend to confront Iran's nuclear rights but our nation has strongly and smartly resisted," according to state television.

Iran Refuses To Halt Enrichment Despite Sanctions Moves (AFP)

By Stuart Williams

AFP, October 9, 2006

Iran flatly refused to suspend uranium enrichment despite moves at the UN Security Council to draft a sanctions resolution against it for failing to halt the sensitive nuclear work.

"The suspension is completely unacceptable and we have rejected it," foreign ministry spokesman Mohammad Ali Hosseini told reporters. "It has no place in Iran's peaceful nuclear programme."

His comments marked an unequivocal refusal from Tehran to back down in the face of pressure to suspend uranium enrichment, a process which the West fears could be diverted towards making nuclear weapons.

"The greatest sanction would be for a generation to deprive its own people and future generations of nuclear technology," he added.

In a meeting late on Friday, representatives of the five UN Security Council permanent members plus Germany agreed to discuss sanctions against Tehran after it failed to suspend sensitive uranium enrichment operations.

Senior US official Nicholas Burns said the so-called "5+1" group would start drafting this week a sanctions resolution, although he admitted finding a consensus on the extent of punitive measures would be difficult.

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad also maintained his defiant stance, brushing off the intensifying moves to impose sanctions against Iran over its nuclear programme.

"The Islamic Republic of Iran is interested in talks and negotiations, and resorting to the language of force and threats will have no results with Iran," official media quoted him as saying.

Ahmadinejad also said in a meeting with his cabinet that Western powers "intend to achieve their aims through intimidation and threats".

"But our people are strong, wise and steadfast, and will not back down on their rightful position," he added, according to the ISNA news agency.

General Yahya Rahim Safavi, head of the Revolutionary Guards, warned that "in this sensitive situation we have to be ready to confront the probable foreign threats," ISNA also reported.

Alaedin Borujerdi, the head of parliament's foreign affairs committee, said any hasty measures by the West would spark "as a consequence a reaction by the parliament and national security council."

However the momentum towards imposing some kind of UN sanctions regime on Tehran appears strong after the London meeting, which gathered US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and top diplomats from the five other countries.

DOJ_NMG_0077190

In a statement issued by host Britain, the group agreed to discuss sanctions and lamented Tehran's refusal to suspend uranium enrichment, but insisted that the door remains open to negotiations if Tehran were to back down.

Burns, the US under secretary of state for political affairs, said that work on a new Security Council resolution under Article 41 of the UN charter, which allows for diplomatic and economic sanctions, would start next week.

It remains to be seen what kind of sanctions regime will be acceptable to Russia and China, which have both always insisted on the importance of a diplomatic solution to the crisis.

Hosseini claimed the world powers were split over what action to take against Iran.

"Divisions have even appeared within the UN Security Council. With the policy of Iran's government, these divisions have become more apparent," he said.

Iran's insistence on its right to enrich uranium lies at the heart of the crisis. The process can be used to make nuclear fuel and, in highly extended form, the fissile core of an atomic bomb.

Tehran insists its nuclear programme is solely for peaceful energy needs, vehemently rejecting US allegations that it is seeking to manufacture nuclear weapons.

Rice has said the United States wants a graduated series of sanctions, to be implemented through multiple UN resolutions that would ramp up pressure on Iran if it persists with its nuclear work.

The first set of measures is expected to focus on preventing the supply of material and funding for Iran's nuclear or ballistic missile programmes.

Other steps could include asset freezes and travel bans on officials linked to possible Iranian weapons programmes.

Domino Effect Of N Korean Nuclear Test Will Harden Iran's Resolve (AFP)

By David Millikin

AFP, October 9, 2006

A North Korean nuclear test could set a chain reaction rippling across Asia and to the doorstep of Iran, hardening the Islamic Republic's resolve to develop its own atomic arsenal, analysts warn.

North Korea's threat this week to carry out its first test of a nuclear bomb came just as the major world powers were finally on the verge of imposing timid sanctions against Iran over its far less developed nuclear program.

Foreign ministers from the five permanent UN Security Council members -- Britain, China, France, Russia and the United States -- plus Germany were expected at a meeting in London Friday to set in motion a UN resolution punishing Iran for refusing to suspend its nascent uranium enrichment program.

Iran insists it has the right to enrich uranium for use as fuel for nuclear power stations, but the West fears the fuel could be further enriched to provide material for nuclear weapons -- a development experts say is in any case years away.
